Decisions and Orders of the Board..... 1

This volume includes all important Decisions and Orders issued by the Board during the period November 30, 1984, through February 12, 1985.

Some Board Decisions granting routine motions for summary judgment contain nothing of precedential value and are not included in this volume. Copies of such Decisions can be obtained from the NLRB, Division of Information, Washington, D.C. 20570, by reference to volume and pamphlet number.

The page numbers of Board Decisions that carry pamphlet numbers may be found by referring to the Cross-Reference which appears immediately after the Table of Cases.

NOTE: The Board Decisions cited herein which contain the volume and pamphlet number, rather than the volume and page number, may be located in the Table of Cases or the Cross-Reference table of the particular volume cited.

30 November 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 5 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Boyce issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, December 12, Inc., Beverly Hills, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. BOYCE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried in Los Angeles, California, on July 6 and 7, 1983. The charge was filed on December 1, 1982, by Harold D. Alexander, acting in his individual capacity (Alexander). The complaint issued on March 23, 1983, and alleges that December 12, Inc.[1] (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by discharging Alexander about October 1, 1982.[2]

[1] The Company's name and the caption are as amended during the trial.

[2] Sec. 8(a)(1) states that "it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer . . . to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7." Sec. 7 states in relevant part: "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection . . . ."

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, located in Beverly Hills, California, is the corporate entity formed around the vocalist Dionne Warwick (Warwick). She is its president and board chairperson. Its annual revenues exceed $500,000, of which over $50,000 derives from performances elsewhere than in California.

Respondent is an employer engaged in and affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Facts

From January 1980 until discharged on September 30, 1982, Alexander, a percussionist, was one of six musicians providing instrumental accompaniment for Warwick. All six belonged to the American Federation of Musicians, Local 47 (AF of M); and, in Alexander's words, they looked to the AF of M "as the organization which determine[d] the conditions and terms under which [they] work[ed]." Respondent, however, was not signatory to a collective-bargaining agreement with the AF of M at any relevant time.

On September 29, 1982, Alexander returned to Los Angeles following a 49-day tour of Australia and the Orient as part of the Warwick entourage. On September 30, Respondent's accountant, Michael Donner, informed him by telephone that Respondent was eliminating the payment to each musician of $75 for every travel day on which there was no performance. The record indicates that such payments, designed to compensate the musicians for being precluded by travel from taking alternative engagements,[3] were not universal in the industry; and is inconclusive whether AF of M standards mandated them. Donner further told Alexander that those to whom this was unacceptable no longer would work for Respondent. The other musicians received a similar message from Donner.[4]

Alexander responded to Donner that, while he would need some time to decide if this was acceptable, he thought it "unfair and . . . outrageous to suggest cuts in pay" when he had yet to receive a raise in almost 3 years with Respondent and had "witnessed extremely extravagant spending of money by Ms. Warwick." He elaborated that, on the just-concluded tour, Warwick had purchased an $800 ring as a gift for a Hilton Hotels official in Australia, had bought cognac in Baccarat crystal at $200 to $300 per bottle, and had spent $800 to fly excess baggage from Singapore to Bangkok. Donner replied that he had "been trying to tell [Warwick] to cool the spending."

Later on September 30, Warwick received word from Marie Byars, Respondent's corporate secretary, that Alexander had told Donner he did not "wish to contribute to [Warwick's] extravagance" by taking a pay cut. Warwick then called Donner, who told her that Alexander "was irate" at the prospect of a pay cut, and had said he did not "want to contribute to" her extravagance. Warwick reacted: "Listen, if that's the way he feels about it, you can call him and tell him that he's part of my extravagance and I no longer need his services."

[3] Respondent's musicians did not work exclusively for Respondent.

[4] Some, stopping over in Hawaii on their return from the tour, did not receive word until later. Donner was acting on instructions from Warwick, transmitted from Hawaii.

With that, Donner called Alexander again, telling him that his "services were no longer needed." Alexander answered that he "did not accept being fired by" Donner; that, if he "were indeed to be terminated," he wanted it in writing from Warwick.

Warwick obliged with this letter, dated October 1:

> Harold:
> In lieu of the fact that you do not wish to contribute to my extravagances, the first cut in my extravagances will be you.
> Your services are no longer needed nor required.
> Sincerely
> December 12, Inc.

Alexander had served as "contractor" for the musicians during the tour to Australia and the Orient. That entailed, among other things, preparing and submitting standard AF of M "personal service" contracts on their behalf, which set forth their wage and fringe-benefit entitlements for specified radio and television appearances on the tour, and seeing that the contracts were honored.[5] Alexander had been designated for this role, with the evident approval of the other musicians, by Respondent's musical director, Robert (Joe) Kloess.

The tour was not without incident for Alexander, as contractor. On August 16, in anticipation of an appearance that day on the Don Lane television show in Melbourne,[6] Warwick called a meeting of the band in her Melbourne hotel suite. During the meeting, directing most of her remarks to Alexander as "spokesman for the group," she asked that the musicians do her "a favor" and accept Australian scale, rather than the substantially higher U.S. scale, for the appearance. Alexander answered that that would mean "go[ing] against our union" and the contract he had "filled out" concerning that show.

Warwick rejoined that they were in Australia, that they could not "get United States scale when [they were] out of the country," and that all they would be able to get "is Australian tv scale." Alexander replied that the AF of M was "aware of what [they] were doing," inasmuch as he had "already filed" copies of the contracts with it, and that he and the others consequently "could get fined" if they accepted less than the contracts called for. Warwick, pointing a finger at Alexander, exclaimed that "the union stuff . . . had to go" because it was causing her too much "grief"; that Alexander "had nerve" to protest Australian scale since she did not even need a percussionist; and that, if he did not "drop" his insistence of AF of M scale, he could find himself on a plane home—"the plane flies both ways."

About then, Wade Short, the bassist, interjected that Alexander "was just doing what he had been asked to do" as contractor, and that they "were subject to fines and suspensions . . . from the union if [they] didn't comply with [its] rules." Similarly, Steven Sullivan, the keyboard player, remarked: "All he's doing is . . . his job, that's all. That's why he's so adamant." Warwick replied, "Fine, that's why I'm talking to [Alexander]."

During the meeting, as well, Warwick thanked three of the six, who had indicated a willingness to accept Australian scale, "for helping her out," observing that she "knew who her friends were." The meeting ended without resolution otherwise. As Alexander put it, it was decided to "do the show and continue the conversation at another time."

A followup meeting was held the next day, August 17, in Warwick's hotel suite in Sydney. The atmosphere, as recalled by Short, was "much more amicable" than in the previous meeting. Warwick began by apologizing to Alexander for her harsh words in Melbourne, explaining that she had not understood "the position" the musicians "were in" with the AF of M, and that she now realized that he was only doing what he "had to do, or had been asked to do."[7] Alexander expressed acceptance of the apology, and it was settled that the musicians—including those who had agreed to a lesser scale—would receive AF of M scale for the entire tour, including the August 16 Don Lane Show.

The discussion then turned to a forthcoming trip to Europe. Warwick or Joe Grant, her personal manager, asked if there were some way "to get around" the AF of M as concerns overseas work, such as not filing copies of the contracts. Alexander and Kloess answered that this "would probably be impossible, because those television shows are monitored so well." Grant asked that Alexander supply him with an AF of M wage schedule for the European tour; and the meeting ended, according to Short, with matters "up in the air" whether there would be sufficient funding for that tour.[8]

[5] These contracts, one of which is in evidence, were not between the musicians and Respondent, but rather between them and the producers, so called, of the performances. The contract in evidence thus was between the musicians, each of whom is named, and one Peter Gromotka, acting for the Sydney Hilton, a hotel, and concerns a 1-hour radio broadcast on a program called "FM Radio Australia."

[7] Further with regard to the apology, Warwick testified: "I [had been] made aware of the fact that, not only could a fine be levied, but the guys could be blackballed from the union. They could, just in general, lose their livelihoods."

[8] The description of the August 16 meeting derives from an amalgam of the unconflicting and credible testimony of Alexander, Short, and Sullivan. That concerning the August 17 meeting is based on their testimony, plus that of Warwick. Warwick testified variously that she could not recall a Melbourne meeting; that she could remember only one meeting; that she "thought both of the meetings were in Sydney"; and that, if there were two meetings, both were in Sydney. Alexander, Short, and Sullivan not only were eminently believable that there was an August 16 meeting in Melbourne, but Warwick's testimony about the August 17 meeting, particularly with respect to her apology, would have made no sense had there not been a prior meeting.

Alexander provided Grant with the requested information "a few days later."

Nothing of note occurred thereafter until September 23, in Manila, when Warwick presented Alexander with a carved-wood hand depicting that gesture of contempt commonly known as "the finger." A card accompanying it, in Warwick's writing, stated:

> To Harold
> Let your finger do the talking.
> From Dionne

Warwick testified that she "gave gifts to all of the members of [her] group," and that she chose this for Alexander "because it was apropos to" him. She elaborated that it was given "in jest," both Alexander and she having "a warped sense of humor." She also explained that Alexander "received the finger because he always gave [her] the finger."[9]

Asked the reason for Alexander's discharge, Warwick testified that "she had no more use for his expertise." She enlarged that he "was a luxury"; that "the kind of show that [she does] does not necessarily require a percussionist"; and that "percussionists are available" on an as-needed basis. She later testified that the remark reportedly made by Alexander to Donner about not wishing to contribute to her extravagance was "typically Harold"; that she "didn't need that around [her]—a negativity"; that she does not "function well around negative action"; and that she consequently "felt that it was time to eliminate that."

Regarding the timing of the discharge decision, Warwick initially testified that it was made while she "was still in Australia"—whether before or after the Don Lane Show she could not be sure—incidental to a telephone conversation with Donner in Los Angeles in which he impressed upon her "the kinds of dollars [she] was spending" and that "the extravagance of the payroll . . . had gotten beyond control." She testified elsewhere that the decision was made October 1—the day she composed the termination letter. As earlier set forth, she instructed Donner on September 30 to tell Alexander he no longer would be needed.

Warwick averred that Alexander's stand in Australia concerning AF of M scale had "nothing whatsoever [to do] with [her] firing him." With respect to those encounters, she testified:

> I believe he was doing something he felt absolutely right to do. Harold is a union person . . . . [T]hat was established inside the group when he first joined it . . . . He was making me aware of the actuality of it all. He was not going to perform under any other circumstances, other than what the union said he had to perform under. That's what he was doing.

Asked by Respondent's counsel what other economies had been effected in the fall of 1982, besides terminating Alexander and eliminating the $75 allowance for nonperformance travel days, Warwick testified that she reduced the salaries of Respondent's office staff, cut the amounts spent on herself "drastically," and discharged her full-time lighting technician, giving those duties to her road manager. To counsel's question if there were any other discharges, she testified, "I can't think of anybody else." Then, led by counsel, she asserted that she also released her sound man and her wardrobe man; and later, questioned by counsel for the General Counsel, she testified that she let her makeup lady and her hair stylist go, as well. Except for that of the lighting technician, Respondent did not supply precise dates or other details of these several alleged discharges.

Respondent has used percussionists from time to time, but not regularly, since Alexander's discharge. Warwick testified that he was hired specifically for an "Earth, Wind, and Fire" medley; and that, after the discharge, "we did not do that particular medley any longer."

B. Conclusion and Reasons

In Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980), the Board stated:

> [We] shall henceforth employ the following causation test in all cases alleging violation of Section 8(a)(3) or violations of Section 8(a)(1) turning on employer motivation. First, we shall require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct.[10]

It is concluded that the General Counsel has made the requisite prima facie showing. Thus:

(a) Alexander's insistence during the Melbourne and Sydney meetings that AF of M scale be paid, asserted in his role as contractor on behalf of the several musicians, was an activity protected by the Act.[11]

(b) Warwick resented that activity mightily, as witnessed by her remarks to Alexander on August 16 that "the union stuff . . . had to go," that Alexander "had nerve" to protest Australian scale since she did not even need a percussionist, and that he could find himself on a plane home if he did not "drop" his insistence on AF of M scale.

(c) Despite Warwick's August 17 apology to Alexander, her resentment of his protected activity persisted, as is shown by her bestowal on him of the carved-wood "finger," together with the let-your-finger-do-the-talking note, more than a month after the Melbourne and [9] Warwick testified that she meant this literally; i.e., that Alexander indeed had made the physical gesture to her at times. She was unable, however, to recall a specific instance.

[10] This formulation received Supreme Court approval in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

[11] That Alexander's activities occurred outside the United States did not render them any less protected. Cf. American President Lines, 267 NLRB 1198 (1983).

Sydney meetings and about a week before the discharge.[12]

(d) Resolution of the pay issue for purposes of the tour then in progress did not remove Alexander as a likely future irritant on the subject. In the Sydney meeting, Respondent was still looking for ways "to get around" AF of M scale on the coming European tour; and Warwick, aware that Alexander "was not going to perform under any other circumstances, other than what the union said he had to perform under," doubtless viewed him as an impediment to that objective.

(e) Warwick admitted at one point that the discharge decision was made while she "was still in Australia"; and her additional testimony that she was not sure if it was before or after the Don Lane Show indicates probable nexus between the decision and Alexander's protected activity on August 16 and 17.

As concerns Respondent's burden, the discharge seemingly was triggered by the report to Warwick on September 30 that Alexander had protested to Donner that he did not want to "contribute to [her] extravagance"—a protest that hardly can be said to have been protected.[13] Then there was Warwick's testimony that the decision was prompted by Donner's call to her in Australia that "the extravagance of the payroll . . . had gotten beyond control"; and, elswhere, that Alexander was discharged because she "felt that it was time to eliminate" his "negativity."

It is concluded, on consideration of these elements, that Respondent has failed to overcome the General Counsel's prima facie showing that protected conduct was a motivating factor in the discharge; and, therefore, that the discharge did violate Section 8(a)(1) as alleged. The reasons for Respondent's failure are these:

(a) Warwick's admission that the discharge decision was made in Australia reveals that the September 30 report was seized on as a pretext; or, at the very least, would not have provoked the action without the impetus of the earlier protected activity.

(b) Warwick's later testimony that the decision was made October 1, apart from the harm done generally to her credibility, undermined her assertion that the decision was grounded on Donner's call to her in Australia about an untoward economic situation.

(c) The economic defense suffered additional damage from the unconvincing character of Warwick's recital—in terms of both demeanor and testimonial content—about the several discharges and other steps supposedly effected in the name of frugality.[14]

(d) Finally, Warwick's testimony that Alexander was discharged because of his "negativity" further detracted from economics as the motivation. That testimony came across, moreover, as an allusion to Alexander's protected insistence that AF of M standards be observed no less than to his comment about not wanting to contribute to Warwick's extravagance. Indeed, Warwick's depiction of Alexander's comment about her extravagance as "typically Harold" reveals that more was involved than that one comment.[15]

CONCLUSION OF LAW

By discharging Alexander on September 30, 1982, as found herein, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[16]

ORDER

The Respondent, December 12, Inc., Beverly Hills, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees for insisting on behalf of themselves and their coworkers that Respondent observe pay scales and other terms and conditions of employment in conformity with the standards of the American Federation of Musicians.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to Harold D. Alexander immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the unlawful discharge of him, with interest on lost earnings.[17]

(b) Expunge from its files any reference to the discharge of Alexander which occurred September 30, 1982, and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of that unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against him.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

[12] Warwick's testimony that Alexander "received the finger because he always gave [her] the finger" belied her testimony, elsewhere, that she gave him the carving "in jest."

[13] See Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984).

[14] Warwick is believed that the lighting technician was discharged. Her testimony about other discharges, Alexander excluded, was vague, heavily dependent on leading, and thus unconvincing.

[15] In Winn-Dixie Greenville, 157 NLRB 657, 662 (1966), the Board found a management reference to a dischargee's "negative attitude" to be an indirect reference to the dischargee's union activity. In Virginia Metalcrafters, 158 NLRB 958, 962 (1966), the Board found a like correlation with respect to a dischargee's supposed "bad attitude."

[16] All outstanding motions inconsistent with this recommended Order are denied. If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[17] Backpay is to be computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed as set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

(d) Post at its offices in Beverly Hills, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[18] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[18] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against employees for insisting on behalf of themselves and their coworkers that we observe pay scales and other terms and conditions of employment in conformity with the standards of the American Federation of Musicians.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Harold D. Alexander immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges, and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the unlawful discharge of him, with interest on lost earnings.

WE WILL expunge from our files any reference to the discharge of Alexander which occurred September 30, 1982, and WE WILL notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of that unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against him.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 16 August 1984 Administrative Law Judge Joel A. Harmatz issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief. The Respondent also filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In fn. 5 of his decision, the judge discredited Keith Lawler's testimony that Personnel Manager Gabe Hikel told him at the time of his discharge that "they were going to start weeding out the troublemakers." In so doing, the judge relied on his conclusion that "[i]mportant segments of [Lawler's] testimony seemed internally inconsistent," as well as on his observation of Lawler's demeanor. Although our review of Lawler's testimony reveals no significant inconsistencies, we affirm the judge's credibility resolution on demeanor grounds.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL A. HARMATZ, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding was heard by me in Bangor, Maine, on September 13 and 14, 1983, and March 22, 1984, on an original unfair labor practice charge filed on October 1, 1981, and a consolidated complaint issued on May 26, 1983, alleging that Irving Tanning Company (Respondent) independently violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by coercive interrogation, surveillance of union activity, and by threatening employees with various reprisals, including a statement that a prounion employee had been causing trouble and "troublemakers" would be "weeded out." In addition, the complaint alleged that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Keith Lawler and Russell Stackhouse because of their activity on behalf of the Union. In its duly filed answer, Respondent denied that any unfair labor practices were committed. Following close of the hearing briefs were filed by the General Counsel and Respondent.

On the entire record in this proceeding, including my opportunity directly to observe the demeanor of the witnesses while testifying,[1] and consideration of the post-hearing briefs I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Delaware corporation with a principal office and place of business in Hartland, Maine, from which it is engaged in the manufacturer and distribution of skins, leather, and related products. In the course of said operation, Respondent annually ships goods valued in excess of $50,000 from the aforesaid facility directly to points located outside the State of Maine.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent is now and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Local 592, United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO is now and at all times material herein has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

There is no history of collective bargaining for the 500 production and maintenance employees at Respondent's Hartland facility. In August 1981, the Union opened an organization campaign at that location. Thereafter, pursuant to an RC petition filed on February 12, 1982, an election was conducted on May 7, 1982. The Union failed to obtain designation by a vote of 172 for representation and 255 against. On August 11, 1982, the Union's loss at the polls was confirmed, when the Regional Director for Region 1 issued a "Certification of Results."

The instant complaint includes allegations that during the early stages of the campaign in September 1981, some 5 months prior to the filing of the representation petition, Supervisors Keith Bubar and Doug Robinson interfered with the organizational effort by coercive interrogation, threats, and surveillance. Beyond that, the more critical issues of discrimination arose well after the termination of the 1981–1982 organization drive.[2] Thus, Keith Lawler was terminated about November 23, 1982, 6 months after the election, while Russell Stackhouse was terminated on March 31, 1983, almost 11 months after the election. Respondent argues that both terminations were legitimately founded upon the failure of the dischargees to comply with attendance policies, while the General Counsel urges that the reasons assigned were pretextual and incredible, with both having been terminated as belated punishment for their union activity.

[1] The fact that credibility resolutions hereinafter made are accompanied by objective rationale does not discount, but merely is intended to reinforce, impressions gained from my first-hand observation of the witnesses. Furthermore, testimony, whether or not contradicted, is rejected to the extent that it includes matter which might not be reconciled with expressly credited evidence. See Professional Care, Inc., 271 NLRB 324 fn. 2 (1984).

B. Concluding Findings

1. Interference, restraint, and coercion during the organization campaign

a. By Keith Bubar

The independent 8(a)(1) allegations imputing misconduct to Supervisor Keith Bubar all occurred in early September 1981 during the early stages of the campaign, some 5 months prior to the filing of the representation petition and 8 months prior to the election held on May 7, 1982.

In this connection, Lester Summerhill, a former employee discharged by Respondent in September 1981, testified that his supervisor, Bubar, following a union meeting held during the prior week, approached Summerhill and coworker Julius Lawrence and inquired as to whether they "heard anything about the Union or seen any of the union cards going around." Bubar allegedly went on to state, "The Union wouldn't help you guys up here," in that they would not clean up the messy working conditions at the tannery. He added that it would hurt, because "they" would cut employees down to 8 hours and require employees to confine themselves to their specific jobs.

Lawrence, who also had not been employed by Respondent for 2-1/2 years prior to his testimony, gave a slightly different version, accusing Bubar of stating: "You know if the union gets in it will cut your hours, you'll lose your overtime, you'll be restricted to one job," and "they will not be able to help us much in cleaning the tannery up with its odors and stuff like that." Bubar also allegedly asked Lawrence if he had any union cards.

Lawrence testified to a further conversation with Bubar in that same month. He claims that after Summerhill was fired, in the presence of two other employees, Bubar stated, "Well, you know the union can hurt you," explaining that "the plant would not be able to pay union scales, it would close down." My assessment of Lawrence's credibility has not overlooked the fact that the complaint includes no allegation suggesting that Bubar at any time threatened that the plant would close in the event of unionization.

Bubar testified that he could not recall ever having discussed the Union with Summerhill or Lawrence. He admits to overhearing a conversation between Lawrence and another employee Stanley Williamson, during which, from Lawrence, he first learned that unions placed restrictions on job performance. He denied ever questioning employees concerning union activity, ever informing employees that the Company would close down if they voted for the Union, or to ever informing Summerhill or Lawrence that the Union would reduce work to 8 hours or eliminate overtime or that it would cause the Company to do so. Though the statements imputed to Bubar were made some 2 years ago, he indicated that if he had made them, he believes he would have recalled having done so. He did not remember the conversation described by Lawrence and Summerhill. Bubar impressed me as straightforward and honest. His implication by the two former employees is not shown by credible evidence to have been associated with any pattern of unlawful interference with employee rights by supervisors during the preelection period. I prefer Bubar's testimony over that of previously terminated employees Summerhill and Lawrence.

b. By Doug Robinson

The allegations involving Robinson rest on the uncorroborated testimony of Fred Loubier, whose employment with Respondent ended in December 1981 when he was laid off. Loubier testified that in September 1981 he was unloading a truck when coworker Terry Rowel solicited signatures to union authorization cards from among Loubier's crew. Loubier assertedly signed a card at the time. Respondent is charged with unlawful surveillance under Section 8(a)(1), because, according to Loubier, Robinson stood nearby observing this entire process. However, Loubier admitted that Robinson was standing at that location prior to Rowel's arrival and never moved from said position where "he often stood around . . . and watched us unload the conveyor belt." On the face of Loubier's testimony it is apparent that the presence of Supervisor Robinson was known to employees at the time they opted to suspend work briefly to engage in union activity, a presence dictated by legitimate considerations totally unrelated to union activity. Under established Board precedent, an employer cannot be faulted where union activity is willfully conducted on plant premises under the eyes of company representatives.[3] The allegation that Respondent thereby engaged in surveillance violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act shall be dismissed.

Loubier went on to testify that during the same work shift, but later in the day, Robinson unlawfully threatened closure of the plant while Loubier and a coworker were discussing the Union. Loubier described the incident as follows:

> Well, me and Manuel [a coworker] was talking about the Union, and he [Robinson] spoke up, he said, "maybe if the Union—Well if I remember right, he said, "probably if the Union got in that Tanning might close the doors."

[2] See testimony of Robert Perry, a nonemployee union organizer, who related that the recent organization effort ended with the election.

[3] See Knogo Corp., 265 NLRB 935, 945 (1982), and cases cited at fn. 33 thereof.

Although Robinson admitted that he might have expressed to employees that he did not think the Union would help in any way, he denied the closedown threat. Here again, in the face of Loubier's professed uncertainty as to the precise words used, the testimony of Supervisor Robinson is regarded as more reliable. It is preferred over the uncorroborated testimony of this former employee. Hence the allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) in this respect shall be dismissed.

2. The alleged discrimination

a. The discharge of Keith Lawler

Lawler was among the early supporters of the Union. In August 1981 he executed a union authorization card and distributed designations to coworkers, securing signatures, and returning completed cards and a list of employee names and addresses to the Union. He served on the in-plant organizing committee after its establishment in December 1981, attended union meetings, and distributed literature at plant gates as well as within the plant, on several occasions. He was among the team that attended the postelection vote count on May 7, 1982. Respondent acknowledged that Lawler was a known union adherent.

Lawler was hired in the spring of 1977. At times material his immediate supervisor was Keith Osborne. The decision to discharge him was made on Tuesday, November 23, 1982.[4] Lawler, who had recently separated from his wife, spent the previous weekend establishing a new residence by moving to a cabin he owned in the woods. The cabin was located some 3 miles from the highway and some 12 to 14 miles from the plant. He had neither automobile, nor telephone. In order to get to work, Lawler planned to walk to the highway, and to hitchhike the balance of the trip. He was aware of the Company's requirement that he call in when absent.

Lawler's work hours were from 6 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. He admittedly was absent on Monday, November 22, without calling in. According to his testimony, on Tuesday, November 23, he walked the 3 miles to the highway, then hitched a ride for the 12- to 14-mile trip to the plant, arriving at work about 5:30 a.m., only to find that his timecard was not in the rack. Osborne allegedly told Lawler that it had been pulled because he missed work. Lawler explained that he had been sick and had moved over the weekend. Osborne responded that Lawler would have to take his case to Personnel Manager Gabe Hikel. Lawler did so, and according to the sense of his testimony, Hikel was not aware of the reason for the termination but after telephoning Osborne, told Lawler that "they was letting me go because of absenteeism." Lawler argued that there were others including his estranged wife, that had missed more time than he had and that "a lot of them never called in."[5]

In order to maintain the instant allegation, the General Counsel, by virtue of Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), bears the initial burden of presenting evidence "sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a motivating factor in the employer's decision." Initially, the General Counsel's theory that Lawler was terminated on grounds proscribed by Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act is complicated by the fact that the timing was remote from any form of protected activity.[6] In addition, there is no evidence that Respondent prior thereto had engaged in any conduct reflecting a propensity on its part to engage in unlawful discrimination.[7] Indeed, on the credible evidence the General Counsel's affirmative proof is limited to establishing that a known union adherent was terminated 5 months after culmination of an organization drive in which employees rejected representation in resounding fashion. The General Counsel's cause is further complicated by the concession that in 1981 Lawler was absent 12 days, 10 of which were either Monday or Friday. During that period he received warnings in June and December 1981. In 1982 prior to his discharge, he declined to report to work on 8 occasions, half of which resulted in extended weekends. Against this background, Lawler engaged in a clear and knowing breach of Respondent's attendance policy by

[5] According to Lawler, in response to this plea, Hikel side-stepped the observation, by stating "that they were going to start weeding out the troublemakers." Although Hikel was not questioned concerning this statement, and hence Lawler's testimony stands uncontradicted, I did not believe that any such statement was made. Lawler was considered unreliable. Important segments of his testimony seemed internally inconsistent. As Respondent observes, the remark he attributes to Hikel, being a less than equivocal admission of wrongful motive, is difficult to reconcile with the sole theory of a violation available to the General Counsel on this record. Thus, Lawler's cause rests upon assumption that Respondent, following the termination of union activity, patiently, with predetermination, lay in wait for the development of grounds for discharge in order to eliminate this union protagonist. Yet, if Lawler is to be believed, Hikel betrayed this delicate scheme by admitting to illegality in resisting Lawler's protests during the discharge process. Considering the circumstances, together with my adverse reaction to the demeanor of Lawler in observing him testify, his testimony in this respect is rejected. In all likelihood, failure to examine Hikel in this respect was attributable to oversight. The allegation that Respondent independently violated Sec. 8(a)(1) in this connection is therefore dismissed.

[6] The General Counsel engaged in an unpersuasive effort to establish that Lawler's union activity persisted following the May election. Robert Perry, an organizer employed by the Charging Party Union, testified that following the election, he continued to meet with employees, including Lawler. He also testified that until November 1982 he continued to make contact with Lawler by telephone or visitation. However, he could not recall what was discussed on those occasions. Indeed, on cross-examination, Perry testified the campaign ended on the day of the election. Lawler confirmed that his direct contacts with Perry ended when the latter moved from the area a few weeks after the election. The testimony as to the postelection involvement with the Union is not only vague, but there is no basis for whatever for inferring that employer representatives were aware of it. Also noteworthy is another uncorroborated assertion on the part of Lawler that following the election, he told employees that a pay cut would not have emerged if the Union had gotten in. Testimony as to the frequency of these expressions was exacted through prejudicially leading examination on the part of the General Counsel. In any event Lawler was not regarded as a trustworthy witness, and if he made this point to coworkers, I am unwilling to find that he did so on an other than isolated basis. There clearly is no evidence that any such comment was made within earshot of any representative of Respondent. Here again, there is no basis for inferring that Respondent was aware of any union activity on the part of Lawler at times proximate to his discharge.

[7] Apart from the instant proceeding, there does not appear to be an unfair labor practice history at Respondent's plant. As shall be seen infra, the independent 8(a)(1) allegations herein have been deemed nonmeritorious.

declining to work or call in on Monday, November 22, 1982.[8]

To overcome these shortcomings, the General Counsel attacks the credibility of certain testimony underlying the defense, while claiming that pretext is indicated by evidence that Respondent applied its attendance policy disparately.

This effort at impeachment is made possible by the fact that Respondent's case against Lawler extended beyond his November 22 absence. Thus, Supervisor Osborne and Personnel Director Hikel insist that Lawler, in addition to the Monday absence, also failed to report for work or call in on Tuesday, November 23. As their mutually corroborative account goes, Osborne reported the absence to Hikel on Monday, who in turn told him to issue a warning if Lawler showed up on Tuesday, but if he neither appeared nor called on Tuesday to discharge him. On Tuesday afternoon when Lawler neither reported nor called, after again consulting with Hikel, Osborne asserts that he pulled his card. Osborne claims that he informed Lawler of the discharge when he finally reported on Wednesday morning.

Thus, Respondent's witnesses are emphatic in their assertion that Lawler was terminated on Wednesday, November 24, after having failed to report for work on both Monday, November 22, and Tuesday, November 23, while Lawler insists that he reported for work prior to his shift on Tuesday, November 23, only to find that he had been terminated. Despite my misgivings concerning the truthfulness of Lawler, in this instance, persuasive evidence tends strongly to confirm that he was absent only on Monday, November 22.

Thus, it is documented fact that Lawler on December 6, 1982, within 3 weeks of his termination, filed an unemployment claim. His report, in support thereof, made to Robin Scanlin, a claims deputy with the Maine Bureau of Employment Security, in material part, was summarized by the latter, as follows: "I was absent on Monday 11/22 . . . . I went in Tuesday and my card was pulled."[9] Scanlin further testified that, although she had no independent recollection of the transactions, it would have been her standard procedure to call the Company and speak to the person in charge of the personnel department. She would "usually tell . . . what the claimant has told her," ask for a response, and clarification of anything vague in the claimant's statement. Scanlin related that she would then prepare a written summary of the personnel director's statement. In evidence is her summary of Hikel's response, prepared in connection with Lawler's claim, which in material part, is set forth below: "He was laid off & recalled 11/15/82. He worked five days and was absent 11/22 and did not call in. He was discharged for continuing record of absences."[10]

Scanlin next testified that on the basis of the information collected, she would prepare a written determination as to whether or not the claim is allowed. That prepared in the case of Lawler disqaulified him for benefits, reciting in material part as follows:

> You were laid off in October and recalled in November. You worked 5 days and then you were absent 1 day and did not notify the employer. You were discharged for absenteeism and for failing to notify the employer.[11]

Respondent argued strenuously that the documents prepared by Scanlin in processing Lawler's unemployment claim and their content were improperly received and should have been excluded as incompetent hearsay. Upon further consideration, there is no merit in this claim. In accordance with Section 10(b) of the Act, the "Rules of Evidence applicable in the District Courts of the United States . . ." are the preferred reference point in resolving such issues as they arise in unfair labor practice proceedings. Rule 803(8) of the Federal Rules of Evidence recognizes an exception to the hearsay rule with respect to "Records, reports, statements, or data compilations, in any form, of public offices or agencies, setting forth . . . matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report . . . ." The documents prepared by Scanlin were well within the scope of Section 803(8) and Respondent's objection goes more to the weight, than the admissibility. Accordingly, the ruling fostering receipt of these documents made at the hearing is reaffirmed.[12]

Respondent also seeks to discredit the substantive content of these documents on a number of grounds, challenging specifically the intimation that at the time of the unemployment filing there was no claim that Lawler was absent on Tuesday, November 23. In weighing the import of this documentation it is first noted that the testimony of Osborne and Hikel that Lawler was absent that day is unsubstantiated by any form of business record.[13] On the other hand, payroll records tend to un-

[8] Respondent's employee handbook (G.C. Exh. 2, p. 8) recites as follows:

> You are expected to be on the job everyday for which you have been scheduled to work. When you are unable to report for work for any reason, it is your responsibility to notify your foreman or the main office at least 2 hours after the start of the first shift and one hour before the start of the second and third shift.

[9] See G.C. Exh. 8(b). This representation was affirmed by signature of Lawler on a form which bore the admonition "I Realize That The Law Provides Penalties For Willful Misrepresentation Of Fact."

[11] See G.C. Exh. 8(e).

[12] Contrary to Respondent, Heal v. Maine Employment Security Commission, 447 A.2d. 1223 (Me. Sup. Ct., 1982), warrants no different result. Unlike the raw, unsworn, unverified statements involved there, which were unidentified as to how they were prepared, and relied on without benefit of the author's testimony, the sworn accounting by Claim Deputy Scanlin as to her standard operating procedure and as to how she compiled G.C. Exhs. 8(a), (b), and (c) does in fact "supply . . . assurances of reliability," and is properly described as the "kind of evidence upon which reasonable persons are accustomed to rely in the conduct of serious affairs." See Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. (1979) § 905(2), 447 A.2d. at p. 1226.

[13] Respondent in its posthearing brief suggests that the timecard of Lawler in evidence as R. Exh. 1 is objective documentation corroborative of Osborne and Hikel. I cannot agree. Upon examination of the timecard, the handwritten entry under Tuesday, November 23, of "NC," although normally the entry used to signify a failure to "call in," does not constitute reliable, objective proof that Lawler was absent that day. Apart from the fact that Respondent made no effort to identify when the entry was made or by whose hand, it is also a fact that the authenticity of dermine Respondent's position in this respect. One would think that caution would have been exercised in maintaining accuracy of entries pertinent to the discharge of a known union protagonist. The document in question, General Counsel Exhibit 5, includes the familiar "NC," signifying "absent without calling in," on November 22, but does not duplicate that notation under November 23. Instead that document under November 23 simply states "ALL DONE." There is no suggestion that this document was shown to Lawler at any time. Nonetheless, the entries, which according to Personnel Manager Hikel would have been his work,[14] are entirely symmetrical with Lawler's consistently maintained position that he was absent on November 22 and informed of his termination when he reported in on November 23.

Respondent's assault against the content of the aforedescribed documents continued with rebuttal testimony by Hikel who swore to specific recollection of a telephonic conversation with Scanlin about December 9, 1982. He testified that when Scanlin inquired of the circumstances surrounding the Lawler discharge, including previous absences, Hikel informed her "the absence was one day with no call and then a second day we waited until late in the afternoon before we decided to terminate him because we had not received another call." Hikel related that he could "clearly remember" that Scanlin went on to state "well, it doesn't make any difference, one day is enough." His recall of that conversation was admittedly independent, as he made no notes, nor did he have any other basis for refreshing his recollection as what transpired. Contrary to Hikel, it is considered unlikely that Scanlin would have overlooked an absence on November 23 had it been reported. She disqualified Lawler for benefits. That determination was reviewable. I would place greater stock in the probability that a public official in denying an unemployment claim would explore and report every fact tending to support that determination, than the somewhat self-serving testimony of Hikel. I am convinced that the November 23 absence went unnoticed in Scanlin's reports for the same reason that it was not denoted in General Counsel's Exhibit 5, namely, she was never informed thereof, as the absence never occurred.

Based on the confirmation appearing in the reports prepared by an official representative of the State Unemployment Insurance Agency,[15] and the timing of that compilation in relation to the discharge, together with the fact that Respondent's own business records tend to support Lawler's view of the facts, the latter's testimony is accepted over that of Osborne and Hikel.

Unquestionably, the breakdown in the credibility of Osborne and Hikel strengthens the General Counsel's claim of discrimination. However, the pretext issue must be evaluated in the light of other factors, and while the issue is not free from doubt, this discrepancy in light of the overall record is not deemed sufficient to support a fair inference that Respondent resorted to a pretexual discharge.[16] On balance, the credible evidence herein merely indicates that a known union adherent was terminated for admitted violation of company policy. Just why Lawler would have been singled out from any number of known union supporters is left to imagination. The timing of the termination was not inherently suspect, nor was there evidence of any conduct on Respondent's part suggesting a proclivity to engage in reprisals against union adherents. Nor is the claim of discrimination aided by convincing showing that Lawler was a victim of disparate application of Respondent's attendance policy.[17] In short, the claim of discrimination has not been carried beyond the speculative, and on the totality of the record, the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the evidence that Lawler was discharged on November 23, 1982, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

b. The discharge of Russell Stackhouse

Stackhouse began his most recent employment with Respondent on May 12, 1980. He was discharged on the assigned ground that he was absent on March 30, 1983, without calling in as required by Respondent's policy.

At the time of his discharge, Stackhouse's immediate supervisor was Richard Emery. Stackhouse was assigned to the second shift, with work hours of 3 to 11 p.m. It will be recalled that under Respondent's published attendance policy, second-shift personnel are required to call in their absence at least 2 hours prior to the commencement of their shift.

that notation is of no greater reliability than the truthfulness of the parol testimony of Supervisor Osborne, through whom that document was offered. Thus, R. Exh. 1, at best, presents a collateral question of credibility. It does not stand as an objective factor influencing resolution of the basic conflict in testimony.

[14] It is noted that the "NC" entries on R. Exh. 1 appear to be by the same hand as that inscribed on G.C. Exh. 5.

[15] The Public Records exception is based on the assumption that a public official in the course of his duties will record facts accurately in the proper performance of his duties. See, e.g., Wong Wing Foo v. McGrath, 196 F.2d 120 (9th Cir. 1952), and Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. v. U.S., 250 U.S. 123 (1919).

[16] I do not subscribe to the notion that the oath should be enforced through a process whereby the offender is automatically penalized by adverse ruling on the merits. Cf. Shattuck Denn Mining Corp v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966). Although a testimonial breakdown will always arouse suspicion, it ought not be dispositive where the surrounding circumstances suggest innocence. There are a number of explanations for false testimony other than guilt. Exaggeration, entailing a disregard of the oath might well be a function of innocently confused perception or relentless desire to win, rather than an admission that one's legal position is unfounded. All of us have encountered those who would lie themselves to trouble even when the truth would absolve. Neither side in this case can claim innocence on this score. Lawler's false assertion as to the "troublemaker" comment, if believed, would have provided "smoking gun" evidence of discriminatory intent. It was no less reprehensible than Respondent's false effort to remove ambiguity and strengthen its defense to unassailable dimensions; for as Hikel was to explain eslewhere: "I don't recall ever having a person out two consecutive days, no call, and still is working and was not terminated as a result."

[17] A number of Respondent's employees had been discharged since 1981 for absenteeism. Testimony of Hikel persuades that there is no consistency in the manner in which attendance is enforced. He offers the entirely credible explanation that supervisors are afforded latitude in this area, and discipline will vary with the needs of individual supervisors, their attitude and their separate evaluation of a number of factors reflecting on the individual employee's performance. In these circumstances, contrary to the General Counsel, no firm conclusion can be drawn from raw attendance data of other employees, for it would be unreasonable to conclude that any were situated identically to Lawler.

It appears that on Monday, March 28, 1983, Stackhouse's wife, also an employee of Respondent, was injured on the job. On Tuesday, March 29, Stackhouse did not go to work. However, he called the plant about 2 p.m., speaking to Ron Tasker, an acknowledged supervisor, reporting that his wife was in severe pain, that he would have to stay home with her to take care of the children, and that she had an appointment the next day to see a specialist. Tasker indicated that he would report the matter to Emery as soon as the latter arrived. Stackhouse testified that he believed that he informed Tasker that he intended to report on Wednesday, March 30.

On Wednesday, March 30, the scheduled medical appointment was canceled. According to Stackhouse, having apparently made up his mind not to work that day, he twice unsuccessfully attempted to reach Supervisor Emery at his home. He later called the plant, attempting to reach Emery but hung up before Emery could be summoned to the phone.[18] For unknown reasons, he did not immediately recall the plant, but drove his wife to seek emergency room treatment at a hospital in Waterville, Maine, some 28 miles from his home. It was not until 4:15 or 4:30 that afternoon that he again attempted to contact the plant. Stackhouse left a message with coworker Bob Richards, informing him, "Well look, I've got to take Becky to the hospital right away." When Richards inquired as to the problem, Stackhouse replied "she had hurt her back and was in a lot of pain and I had to get her to a doctor right away." Richards indicated that he would give the message to Emery as soon as he arrived.

On Thursday, March 31, Stackhouse, prior to the commencement of his shift, called in seeking information as to whether there would be work the next day, which was "Good Friday." He was at that time informed by Emery that he had been fired for failing to call in the previous evening. Stackhouse claims to have thereafter discussed the matter with Hikel and to have appealed again to Emery. Thereafter he met with Hikel who responded to Stackhouse's pleas and explanations, stating: "Well, you should have taken more steps to protect your job." To this, Stackhouse responded "Well . . . I was more worried about my wife than I was anything else." The discharge was allowed to stand.

Emery testified that it was he who recommended the termination of Stackhouse. He claims to have warned Stackhouse twice in 1983 concerning his excessive absenteeism.[19] Emery added that on March 30 he arrived to find that Stackhouse did not show up and there was no call. He claims to have decided, after talking with Hikel, that if Stackhouse failed to show up by 3:30 a.m., his card would be pulled and he would be discharged.[20] Emery admitted that he received Stackhouse's message through Robert Richards, but according to Emery, his records reveal that it was received at 4:45 p.m., after the termination.[21]

Stackhouse, with confirmation from Union Representative Robert Perry, described his efforts on behalf of the Union as extensive. They allegedly included distribution of union literature at a plant gate on one occasion, and his having solicited execution of a union authorization card from the son of his supervisor. Although Stackhouse might well have had union leanings, it was my impression that the testimony defining his activity on the part of the Union was highly exaggerated and I am not persuaded that his sentiment in this respect was ever pursued in a manner likely to come to the attention of management.

Emery and Hikel both denied they regarded Stackhouse as a prounion employee, claiming that they learned of his alleged union activity only in the course of the instant unfair labor practice hearing. Certain action on the part of management shortly after the May 1982 election lends convincing support to their testimony. Thus, Respondent's Exhibit 2 was identified by Hikel as a list of 37 employees known by Respondent to be active on behalf of the Union. That list was furnished the NLRB on June 17, 1982, and was used in this proceeding by the General Counsel in examining witnesses. Although, by its nature, that list would have served Respondent's interests if maintained in the most comprehensive form attainable, Stackhouse was not listed. On balance, it is concluded that there is neither direct nor credible evidence warranting a reasonable inference that management knew or suspected that Stackhouse was a prounion employee. Accordingly, in connection with the termination of Stackhouse, the General Counsel has failed to make a prima facie showing that union activity was to any extent a contributing factor to the discipline imposed. The 8(a)(3) and (1) allegation in his case shall be dismissed.

[18] Stackhouse testified that while waiting for Emery to come to the phone, his daughter started to head for the street, and that in order to stop her, he hung up.

[19] Stackhouse could not recall any such warnings. I regarded Emery on this point as the more credible witness.

[20] Stackhouse had no telephone in his home. He lived a quarter of a mile distant from his mother-in-law Catherine Munn. The latter, as a witness for the General Counsel, confirmed that Emery called her approximately a half hour after the scheduled start of Stackhouse's shift on March 30, indicating that it was unnecessary that she make "a special trip" but that if Stackhouse came over, to have him call Emery. Emery confirmed that he made this effort to reach Stackhouse.

[21] In his testimony, Stackhouse asserts that Emery denied that the discharge decision was his own. However, the testimony in this respect was not entirely consistent. Stackhouse first related that Emery did not identify who it was that had instructed him to effect the termination, but that Emery simply stated that it was "the office." Later he testified that Emery expressed disagreement with the discharge, adding that the discharge decision was "out of his hands," stating that it was in the hands of Hikel. He also testified that the next day in a further conversation with Emery, Emery allegedly told him that he had to let him go, that there was nothing he could do, and that Hikel wanted him terminated. Bob Richards tended to corroborate Stackhouse. He testified that after he relayed the message to Emery, the latter responded, "It was a good thing he [Stackhouse] called, because they wanted me to pull his card." Emery credibly denied such a statement. The testimony of Emery that he made the decision is the more probable. For, it is unlikely that Hikel would have had information as to the absence were it not for Emery's having initiated the action resulting in the discharge. Contrary to Stackhouse, it is difficult to believe that Emery would have taken this step if he did not himself contemplate discipline. I believe that the discharge at the least was recommended by him, and that he at no time denied responsibility for that action or expressed disagreement with it.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent did not commit the independent 8(a)(1) violations set forth in the complaint.

3. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act on November 23, 1982, by discharging Keith Lawler and on March 31, 1983, by discharging Russell Stackhouse.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[22]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[22] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Painters Local Union No. 64 and Painters District Council No. 5 and International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO (Saxon Enterprises, Inc.) and Frederick T. Rasmussen. Case 19–CB–4937

30 November 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 8 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Russell L. Stevens issued the attached decision. The Respondents filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified.[2]

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 3.

"3. By conducting union trials against, and imposing court-collectible fines on, former members of Respondent Painters Local Union No. 64 who had duly resigned, for their postresignation crossing of a sanctioned picket line and working during a strike at Saxon Enterprises, Inc., Respondent Painters District Council No. 5 restrained and coerced employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A)."

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondents have engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, we shall order that they cease and desist and take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall order Respondent Painters District Council No. 5 to rescind all fines illegally imposed against former members of Respondent Painters Local Union No. 64 and to refund any money they may have paid to District Council No. 5 in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

We shall further order that the Respondents expunge from the constitution of Respondent International Brotherhood of Painters and their governing documents those portions of section 125 (Resignation) conditioning a resignation on a vote of the local's membership and prohibiting a resignation during a strike or lockout.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that

A. Respondent Painters District Council No. 5, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Restraining or coercing persons who have resigned from, and are no longer members of, Respondent Painters Local Union No. 64 in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, by trying those persons and imposing court-collectible fines on them because of their postresignation conduct in working at Saxon Enterprises, Inc. during the strike which began on 22 July 1983.

(b) Maintaining in its governing documents those portions of section 125 of the constitution of Respondent International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO, reading "by vote of the membership" and "No resignation shall be accepted during a strike or lockout."

(c) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind the fines levied on Respondent Painters Local Union No. 64's former members, Marla

[1] We herein correct several inadvertent errors of the judge. The second amended complaint issued on 1 February 1984 not on 17 January 1984. Further, the amended charge was received by Respondent International on 19 January 1984 and the amended complaint was received by it on 25 January 1984. (The respective dates for the service by mail were 13 and 17 January 1984, as service is defined in Sec. 102.113 of the Board's Rules and Regulations.)

[2] In the absence of evidence revealing any involvement by Respondent Painters Local Union No. 64 in the imposition of illegal fines on former union members by Respondent Painters District Council No. 5 we shall dismiss that portion of the 8(b)(1)(A) complaint as to the Local. We also find merit in Respondent International's exception to the judge's finding that it participated in the imposition of fines. We specifically note that the second amended complaint as amended does not allege such a violation and the evidence does not indicate the International's involvement in the fines. Accordingly we reverse the judge's conclusion that Respondent International violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) in this respect.

In adopting the judge's finding of 8(b)(1)(A) violations with respect to maintenance of two provisions of sec. 125 of Respondent International's constitution and his consequent expunction remedy we rely solely on the rationale in Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984). We therefore find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's analysis. Further, in the absence of exceptions to the judge's failure to find violations with respect to other portions of sec. 125 we find it unnecessary to pass on the issues as to whether the Respondent's maintenance of those provisions constitute an unfair labor practice.

Member Zimmerman agrees with the violations found by his colleagues, but in reaching this result relies on the analysis used by the judge, and, to the extent that it is applicable, his partial dissent in Neufeld Porsche-Audi.

Sanders, Maynard Linman, Mack Hombel, David Watson, Steven Linman, and Ron Bogle, and refund to those individuals any money they may have paid pursuant to any fine found herein to have been illegal, with interest, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this Decision and Order.

(b) Expunge from its governing documents those portions of section 125 of the constitution of Respondent International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO, reading "by vote of the membership" and "No resignation shall be accepted during a strike or lockout."

(c) Post at its business office and other places where notices to its members are customarily posted copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

B. Respondents Painters Local Union No. 64 and International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO, their officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Maintaining in its governing documents and constitution those portions of section 125 reading "by vote of the membership" and "No resignation shall be accepted during a strike or lockout."

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Expunge from its governing documents and constitution those portions of section 125 reading "by vote of the membership" and "No resignation shall be accepted during a strike or lockout."

(b) Post at their business offices and other places where notices to members are customarily posted copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

PAINTERS LOCAL UNION NO. 64

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF PAINTERS AND ALLIED TRADES, AFL–CIO

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RUSSELL L. STEVENS, Administrative Law Judge. The original complaint, issued November 16, 1983, was based on a charge filed October 9, 1983, by Frederick T. Rasmussen. The complaint alleged that Painters Local Union No. 64 (Local) and Painters District Council No. 5 (Council)[1] had violated, inter alia, Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) by illegally imposing court collectible fines on certain employees of Saxon Enterprises, Inc. (Saxon) a client of Rasmussen. On November 17, 1983, counsel for Respondents filed an answer to the complaint, admitting some allegations and denying others, and setting forth an affirmative defense that the proceeding was a nullity because it was supported, directed, or financed, directly or indirectly, by the Employer (Saxon). On January 17, 1984, a first amended complaint was issued based on an amended charge filed by Rasmussen on January 12, 1984, making minor changes in the original complaint, including the addition of International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO (International) as a party Respondent. On January 17, 1984, a second amended complaint was issued[2] which basically was the same as the first amended complaint, but which contained some minor changes. On February 7, 1984, counsel for Respondents answered the second amended complaint. Some allegations were admitted, and some were denied. The answer included five affirmative defenses. The fourth affirmative defense stated, inter alia, that the alleged unfair labor practice "was directly solicited by counsel for general counsel." The fifth affirmative defense stated, inter alia, that the Employer "is directly or indirectly financing, encouraging or participating in this case," in violation of Title I of the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act (LMRDA).

Trial of this controversy was scheduled for March 13, 1984, in Seattle, Washington. Prior to the trial date counsel for Respondents attempted to obtain by subpoena duces tecum certain information in support of Respondent's fifth affirmative defense. Counsel Saxon filed a petition to revoke the subpoena duces tecum, and counsel for the General Counsel filed a petition in support of the Charging Party's petition to revoke subpoena. The subpoena controversy was referred to the Administrative Law Judge for disposition. On March 9 a telephone pretrial conference was held between counsel for the General Counsel, counsel for Respondents, and myself. During the conference it was agreed that, if the subpoena were to be revoked, a trial would not be necessary since the facts controlling the basic issues were not in dispute, and could be submitted by stipulation. By order dated March 9, 1984, I revoked Respondents' subpoena duces tecum, set aside the trial, established a date for stipulation of facts, and established a date (April 9, 1984) for submission of briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were submitted by counsel for the General Counsel, Respondents, and the Charging Party.

On the entire record, and stipulations of fact submitted by counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Saxon Enterprises, Inc. is a State of Washington corporation with an office and place of business on Federal Way, Washington, where it is engaged in the business of industrial and commercial painting and contracting. During the past 12 months, which period is representative of all times material herein, in the course and conduct of its business operations, Saxon had gross sales of goods and services valued in excess of $300,000, and provided services from its facilities within the State of Washington to customers within the State, including but not limited to McChord Air Force Base, Daringold Farms, and Zidell Marine Corporation, which customers were themselves engaged in interstate commerce by other than indirect means, of a total value in excess of $50,000.

Respondents admit, and I find, that Saxon, at all times material, has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[1] Local, Council, and International jointly are referred to as Respondents.

[2] The second amended complaint further was amended, in minor detail, by stipulation of the parties.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

Painters Local Union No. 64 and Painters District Council No. 5 and International are, and at all times material herein have been, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The following facts are admitted by Respondents in their pleadings:

About July 22, 1983, under direction of Respondent Local 64, members of Respondents engaged in an economic strike against Saxon. About July 14, 1983, and prior to the economic strike, the following members of Respondent Local 64 tendered resignations from Respondent Local 64 membership: Marla Sanders, Maynard Linman, Mack Hombel, David Watson, Steven Linman, and Ron Bogle, and continued to work thereafter at Saxon's jobsites performing painting functions during the strike referred to above.

At all times material Respondents jointly and individually have maintained the following rule, contained in the International constitution of Respondent International Brotherhood, which reads in relevant part:

> Sec. 125. (RESIGNATION) Any member may sever his connections with the Brotherhood by written resignation, provided he has paid all dues and arrearages, he does not continue to work as a journeyman at any branch of the trade, and his Local Union accepts his resignation by vote of the membership. No resignation shall be accepted during a strike or lockout. A member who resigns shall not thereafter be entitled to any Brotherhood Benefits.

Respondent International Brotherhood adopted the rule more than 6 months prior to the filing of the charges herein. The rule at all times material herein has been, and presently is, a part of the constitution.

About August 3, 1983, Robert Goodwin, the business agent of Respondent, District Council, brought charges against employees Marla Sanders, Maynard Linman, Mack Hombel, David Watson, Steven Linman, and Ron Bogle because they continued to work during the strike after their resignation from Respondent Local 64. About August 3, 1983, Respondent District Council accepted and processed the charges brought by Robert Goodwin.

About September 1, Respondent District Council imposed court collectible fines on employees Marla Sanders, Maynard Linman, Mack Hombel, David Watson, Steve Linman, and Ron Bogle because they continued to work during the strike after their resignation from Respondent Local 64.

The following facts are stipulated by the parties:

Respondent International Brotherhood adopted the provision identified in paragraph 6(a) of the second amended complaint more than 6 months prior to the filing of the charges. Said provision has been a part of the constitution and is presently part of the constitution.

On January 13, 1984, a true copy of the amended charge filed was deposited in the United States mail, addressed to Respondent International Brotherhood, by certified mail, and was received in the office of Respondent International Brotherhood on January 19, 1984.

The amended complaint and notice of hearing was issued by the Regional Director on January 17, 1984, and on January 17, 1984, a true copy of the amended complaint and notice of hearing was deposited in the United States mail, addressed to Respondent International Brotherhood, sent by certified mail, and was received in the office of Respondent International Brotherhood on January 25, 1984.

Immediately prior to the filing of the amended charge, the Charging Party was informed by the General Counsel of the Board's holding in Engineers & Scientists Guild (Lockheed-California), 268 NLRB 311 (1983), and informed of its right to file an amended charge covering the question, whether or not it is legal for a union to maintain a constitutional provision presented herein, and recommended that an amended charge be filed, in light of Respondents Local No. 64 and District Council's inability to modify or amend the constitutional provision adopted by Respondent International Brotherhood.

Frederick T. Rasmussen, at all times relevant, for purposes of the proceedings herein, and continuing to date, has been, and is, counsel for the Employer, Saxon Enterprises, Inc.

This stipulation is made without prejudice to any objection that any party may have as to the materiality, relevancy, or competency of any facts stated.

Discussion

A. Restrictions on Employees' Right to Resign

The constitutional provision quoted above runs afoul of Board law in two ways. First, the proscription against resigning from union membership only during nonstrike periods is an unreasonable restriction of employee rights under Section 7 of the Act. Second, the requirement that employee resignations are dependent on vote of the union membership imposes an illegal restriction on resignation even during nonstrike periods.

It is noted at the outset, prior to discussion of the two restrictions mentioned above, that the employees here involved resigned during a nonstrike period. Their resignations were tendered to the Union on July 14, 1983. The strike did not commence until July 22, 1983. An otherwise valid resignation is effective on its receipt by the Union.[3] The resignations of July 14, 1983, were valid, whether or not the union membership agreed to the resignations. (See discussion infra.) It is further noted that, regardless of union constitutional restrictions, there is no evidence that those restrictions were communicated to members of the two Respondent Unions. Absent such communication, the restrictions could not be enforced.[4]

[3] Carpenters San Diego Council (Campbell Industries), 243 NLRB 147, 148 (1979); TKB International Corp., 240 NLRB 1082, 1098 fn. 3 (1979), and cases cited therein. The fact that the Union received the resignations on July 14, 1983, is not in dispute.

[4] Menasco, Inc., 267 NLRB 1147 (1983); Electrical Workers Local 1012 (General Electric), 187 NLRB 375 (1970).

1. The resignation clause disallows resignations during a strike or lockout. Such language leaves the inference that the Union will permit its members to resign only during nonstrike periods. The Board has held that a member's right to resign from a union applies both to strike and nonstrike situations. Therefore, "a union rule which limits the right of a union member to resign only to nonstrike periods constitutes an unreasonable restriction on a member's Section 7 right to resign."[5] The Board's rationale in Dalmo Victor was that there is an overriding interest of the employee's right to refrain from concerted activities. Such a right "encompasses the right of a member to resign from a union having once joined. [T]his right to resign is not forever and irrevocably lost merely because an employee chooses to become a union member."[6]

In addition, in a recent case,[7] the Board held that "the mere maintenance of such a constitutional provision restrains and coerces employees, who may be unaware of the provision's unenforceability, from exercising their Section 7 rights. [E]mployees who wanted to resign from the Union and return to work during the strike may have been discouraged from doing so by [the] . . . section . . . in the Union's constitution." Id.

Applying the rationale and the holding of the Board in Dalmo Victor and Engineers & Scientists Guild to the case at hand, I find that Respondents' constitutional provision which states "no resignation shall be accepted during a strike or lockout" is an unreasonable restriction on a member's Section 7 right to resign, as it permits members to resign only during nonstrike periods.

2. In addition to the restriction of resignations mentioned above, the Union's constitution imposes an additional restriction which requires that no resignation will be effective until "his Local Union accepts his resignation by vote of the membership." Such a restriction has been held invalid by prior Board law.[8] In Carpenters San Diego Council, the Board looked at the Union's constitution which stated that "[a] member can withdraw or sever his connection with the United Brotherhood by resigning in writing, and it shall require a majority of the members present at a regular meeting to accept a resignation."[9] The Board in its decision held "that the resignation procedure which requires membership approval without setting standards for such approval is unduly restrictive and, therefore, presents no bar to resignation at any time."[10]

The case at hand requires such membership approval before a member's resignation will become effective. However, the Union's constitution sets forth no standards to be used in making such approval. As a result, I find that the requirement of membership approval is unduly restrictive. As such, the resignations tendered about July 14 were valid at that time.[11]

B. Respondents' Affirmative Defense

1. Respondents argue that Section 411(a)(4) of the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act (LMRDA), which prohibits nonparty interested employers, such as Saxon, from indirectly encouraging employee litigation, bars this action.

Respondents base their argument on NLRB v. Shipbuilders, 391 U.S. 418 (1968), and some other cases of similar vein, but none of those cases is applicable to the argument. NLRB v. Shipbuilders was a case of narrow application involving a section of LMRDA[12] concerning exhaustion of administrative remedies before filing an action in court. The holding of the Supreme Court was:

> We conclude that unions were authorized to have hearing procedures for processing grievances of members, provided those procedures did not consume more than four months of time; but that a court or agency might consider whether a particular procedure was "reasonable" and entertain the complaint even though those procedures had not been "exhausted." We also conclude, for reasons stated earlier in this opinion, that where the complaint or grievance does not concern an internal union matter, but touches a part of the public domain covered by the Act, failure to resort to any intra-union grievance procedure is not grounds for expulsion from a union. We hold that the Board properly entertained the complaint of the Holder and that its order should be enforced.

The question here is quite different. Respondents were charged with illegally fining former union members, in violation of their rights under Section 7 of the Act. A complaint was issued and, as found herein, the charge was substantiated—Respondents did fine former union members over whom they no longer exercised any control. The proceeding here involved was limited to an alleged unfair labor practice. The duty of the administrative law judge is "to inquire fully into the facts as to whether the Respondent has engaged in or is engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce as set forth in the complaint or amended complaint."[13] Assuming, arguendo, that Saxon indirectly encouraged this litigation, such a fact would not be a defense to the commission of unfair labor practices. Possibly such a fact would be cause for proceeding in some other forum, under some other statute, against persons or firms not party to this controversy, but that fact would be collateral, and irrelevant, to the complaint involved in this controversy. This argument is without merit.[14]

[11] Since such resignations were valid prior to the strike that took place about July 22, the fines levied on the employees are unenforceable. In addition, by fining such members, Respondent Union committed an unfair labor practice under Sec. 8(b)(1)(A). See NLRB v. Textile Workers Local 1029, supra at 217, wherein it was held that "[w]here a member lawfully resigns from a union and thereafter engages in conduct which the union rule proscribes, the union commits an unfair labor practice when it seeks enforcement of fines for that conduct. That is to say, when there is a lawful dissolution of a union-member relation, the union has no more control over the former member than it has over the man in the street."

Respondents state in brief that "Since the above facts give rise to an inference that Saxon has employed its attorney as a surrogate participant, Respondents respectfully request that upon reconsideration this action should be dismissed." Such an inference is not warranted. A charge may be made under the Act "by any person."[15]

2. Respondents argue that the International has engaged in no actions within the 6-month period established by Section 10(b) which are in any way connected with the unfair labor practice charges at issue in this case.

The authorities cited by Respondents deal with different factual situations, and shed no light on the issue at hand. Respondents cite Machinists Local 1424 v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411, 515 (1980), for the proposition that a complaint predicated on the execution of an agreement is barred by Section 10(b) if the execution occurred more than 6 months before the charge was filed. That holding, however, is applied only when the contract in question is lawful on its face.[16]

The issue here deals with a different factual situation. The provision of the International's constitution (sec. 125) is unlawful on its face, since it allows resignations only during nonstrike periods, and only after the union membership has voted to accept the resignations. (See discussion, supra.) Therefore, since the provision in question is unlawful on its face, the continued maintenance of an adherence to the clause constitutes an alleged unfair labor practice which continued up to and even after the filing of the charge and the complaint. Accordingly, the limitations set by Section 10(b) of the Act are not applicable.[17]

This argument is without merit.

3. Respondents argue that, since the International enacted its resignation rule, it has had no involvement of any kind with the fines in issue, hence, the International has not violated the Act.

As discussed above, the resignation rule is invalid; Section 10(b) of the Act does not preclude a finding of invalidity; continued maintenance of the rule is a violation of the Act. Thus, this argument is without validity.[18]

Respondents argue that the Board solicited the Charging Party to file an amended charge to name the International as a party; that the amended charge therefore is invalid; and that such facts present a litigable issue that invalidates the administrative law judge's order revoking Respondents' subpoena.

As noted supra the fact that Rasmussen filed the original and amended charges is immaterial, in and of itself. Respondents argue that the reason for the alleged solicitation was that the Board legally cannot, of its own volition, initiate a charge. The alleged initiation was launched, according to Respondents, because of "a new legal theory derived from a recent Board case." (Stipulated fact 4.) Respondents acknowledge that "this second requested charge was not based on new facts discovered during an investigation." Therefore, according to Respondents, the second charge was invalid, and "the Board lacks jurisdiction to proceed against the International." Respondents cite as their authority Tabernacle Sand & Gravel Corp., 232 NLRB 957 (1977), and cases cited therein.

Respondents' reliance on Tabernacle Sand & Gravel is misplaced. There, as here, Respondents argued that evidence of solicitation of a charge was improperly excluded. There, the administrative law judge, with Board concurrence, concluded that since all the facts surrounding the reason for the amended charge were known to the respondents, the excluded testimony was irrelevant. Stipulated facts and pleading admissions here also show that the International was aware of all the facts relied on by the General Counsel. The administrative law judge concluded, in Tabernacle Sand & Gravel, supra at 961:

> In sum, I find that the context surrounding the filing of the first amended charge herein reveals nothing which would show, even if Waldron would have been permitted to testify further on the subject, that the amendment was improperly solicited. Moreover, I find that, in the circumstances herein, the excluded testimony is irrelevant. Accordingly, I conclude there is no merit to Respondent's third affirmative defense.

Respondents complain that counsel for the General Counsel conferred with Rasmussen concerning the International, but that matter also is irrelevant. As the administrative law judge stated in Tabernacle Sand & Gravel:

> An effective remedial order can be issued only against employers and labor organizations who are named as Respondents in a case, and only those persons against whom charges are filed may be made respondents to a complaint. (Hod Carriers, Local 783, supra at 972.) Even if Waldron had been advised that Pasquale Nalbone earlier gave evidence contradicting Waldron's, what was said by the Board agent to Waldron is irrelevant, for it is quite proper for such differences to be resolved at a hearing. Even the dissent in Hod Carriers, Local 783, supra at 982, acknowledges that "Regional personnel should acquaint a Charging Party with his rights, assist him in the formulation of his charges and, where investigation reveals that additional charges can be made or that additional parties should be added as Respondents, advise him of his right to do so." Insofar as Respondent herein asserts that the investigating agent exceeded the bounds of giving advice to Waldron of his right to file an amended charge, in the face of Waldron's personal knowledge of facts as depicted in paragraph 4 of his affidavit, it is illogical, and straining, to conceive that anything else of which he may have been informed placed the Board in a position tantamount to becoming the initiator of the amendments.[19]

This argument is without merit.

4. Finally, Respondents argue that International did not have a reasonable time within which to respond to the charge against it. That argument does not have the support of the record. The amended charge was served on the International January 19, 1984. The amended complaint was served on International January 25, 1984. The charge against the International was that it was maintaining an invalid rule in its constitution. That rule was at the core of this controversy. No complicated or extensive set of facts was at issue. The International was well aware of all facts at issue, had notice well in advance of proposal litigation, and had ample opportunity to defend itself. Notice is taken of the Board's common practice of permitting amendments of complaints, even so late as trial date, and even when new facts are involved, if, as here, no surprise or undue disadvantage is involved.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Saxon Enterprises, Inc. is, and at all times material has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Painters Local Union No. 64, Painters District Council No. 5 and International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO are, and each of them is, and at all times material have been, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By conducting union trials against, and imposing court-collectible fines on, former members of the Unions, who had duly resigned from the Unions, for their postresignation crossing of a sanctioned picket line and working during a strike at Saxon Enterprises, Inc., Respondents restrained and coerced employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby engaged in, and are engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. By maintaining in their constitution in Section 125 thereof a resignation proviso "by vote of the membership" and a proviso reaching "No resignation shall be accepted during a strike or lockout," Respondents have violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, I shall recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the act.

It is recommended that fines illegally imposed against former union members be ordered rescinded, and that any money they may have paid to Respondents be refunded to those members, with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

It is further recommended that Respondents be ordered to expunge from their constitution the two provisos in Section 125 quoted above.[20]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 15 February 1984 Administrative Law Judge Earldean V. S. Robbins issued the attached decision. The Respondents filed exceptions and a supporting statement, and the Charging Party filed a brief in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, statement, and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order[2] as modified.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondents, Houshang Vazin, an individual, d/b/a Super Save; Parviz Paul Vazin, an individual, d/b/a Super Save; Houshang Vazin and Parviz Paul Vazin, a partnership, d/b/a Super Save; and Shelun Company, Inc. d/b/a Super Saver, Riverside, California, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Add the following to paragraph 2(c).

"Any backpay due the employees under this provision shall bear interest to be computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977) (see generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962))."

2. Insert the following as paragraph 2(e) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(e) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way."

3. Add the following as paragraph 2(h).

"(h) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply."

4. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 1167, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the unit found appropriate.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to execute our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union agreed to on 8 September 1982.

WE WILL NOT repudiate our obligation to abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to make contractually required contributions to the various benefit trust funds nor fail and refuse to grant the cost-of-living increases as provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally reduce wage rates nor eliminate any of the fringe benefits provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement.

[1] The Charging Party's motion to strike the Respondent's exceptions is denied as the exceptions conform to the requirements of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

The Charging Party's motion for attorneys fees and expenses is denied as an award of such fees and expenses is appropriate only when a respondent has raised patently frivolous defenses. Tiidee Products, 194 NLRB 1234 (1972). Our review of the record reveals that the Respondents' defenses, while unpersuasive, are not patently frivolous.

[2] We correct the judge's inadvertent reference in her remedy and recommended Order to "September 8, 1983," rather than "September 8, 1982," as the date on which the Respondents and the Union reached agreement on the contract.

[3] We shall modify the recommended Order to require that the Respondents provide interest on all backpay due the employees, expunge the discharged employees' files, and notify the Regional Director of its compliance efforts.

WE WILL NOT bypass the Union and bargain directly with our employees with regard to the terms and conditions of their continued employment.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees in an attempt to avoid our obligation to abide by the collective-bargaining agreement and our obligation to recognize and bargain with the Union.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that we can only hire a certain percentage of the Super Save employees in order to keep our Riverside store from being a union shop.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that they cannot be rehired for at least 30 days in order to avoid having our Riverside store become a union shop.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that they will have to obtain withdrawal cards from the Union as a condition of their continued employment.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL recognize the above-named Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of our employees in the appropriate unit described below and, on request, meet and bargain with the Union concerning wages, hours, pension and welfare benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment; and. if an understanding is reached, WE WILL embody it in a signed document. The appropriate unit is:

> All food clerks, bakery, health and beauty aides, and household hardware clerks, general merchandise clerks, clerk's helpers, and snack bar and take-out food department employees employed by us at our 3981 Chicago Avenue, Riverside, California facility; excluding all office clerical employees, meat department employees, janitorial employees, maintenance employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL acknowledge that we are bound by the Retail Food, Bakery, Candy, and General Merchandise Agreement between the Union and certain other unions and Food Employers Council, Inc. and Independent Retail Operators effective by its terms from 27 July 1981 to 29 July 1984 as modified by us and the Union on 8 September 1982 and WE WILL abide by the terms of the agreement both retroactively and prospectively.

WE WILL make our employees whole by paying retroactively the wage rate and health welfare trust fund contributions as provided in the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union which have not been paid, and which would have been paid absent our unlawful reduction and/or unilateral discontinuance of these payments, and WE WILL pay interest on any retroactive wages due our employees.

WE WILL offer the employees named below immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges; and WE WILL make each of them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, plus interest:

Robert Blair	Miles Tilghman
Michael Elder	Robert Robbins
Diane Ferneding	Richard Heimstra
Verna Fuches	Jack McMillan
Luis Guerrero	Stephen Wakeman
Ed Horne	Anthony Bullock
Barbara Luce	Michele Gracia
Denise Martin	Jack Summers
Sue Ellen Mott	Barry Swift
Mary Snyder	Roy Webb
Larry Delgado	Joseph Vargas
Leo Smith Jr.	Mark McCoy
Anna Guzman	Kenya Tapscott

WE WILL notify each of the above-named employees that we have removed from our files any reference to his or her discharge and that the discharge will not be used against him or her in any way.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

EARLDEAN V. S. ROBBINS, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard before me in Riverside, California, on October 11, 12, and 13, 1983. The charge was filed by United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 1167, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC (the Union) on March 3, 1983, and served on Houshang Vazin, an individual, d/b/a Super Save, and Parviz Paul Vazin, an individual, d/b/a Super Save, and Houshang Vazin and Parviz Paul Vazin, a partnership, d/b/a Super Save (Respondent Vazin) on March 4, 1983; and a first amended charge was filed by the Union on April 25, 1983 and served on Respondent Vazin and Shelun Company, Inc., d/b/a Super Saver (Respondent Shelun and collectively Respondents) on April 27, 1983. The amended complaint, which issued on July 8, 1983, alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The basic issues are:

1. Whether Respondent Vazin is a successor employer to Market Basket obligated to recognize and bargain with the Union and whether Respondent Shelun is the alter ego of Respondent Vazin.

2. Whether Respondents unlawfully refused to bargain by unilaterally reducing wage rates and ceasing to make contributions into the various trust funds as required by the collective-bargaining agreement.

3. Whether Respondents unlawfully refused to bargain by refusing to execute a written contract embodying an agreement reached with the Union.

4. Whether Respondents repudiated their collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and bypassed the Union and dealt directly with the employees concerning their wage rates and other terms and conditions of employment.

5. Whether Respondents unlawfully discharged and refused to reinstate a majority of the unit employees.

6. Whether Respondent unlawfully restrained and coerced employees by various statements and by conditioning continued employment on the employees' obtaining withdrawal cards from the Union.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material since about the middle of September 1982, and continuing through about February 19, 1983, Respondent Vazin, doing business under the trade name Super Save, was engaged in the business of operating a supermarket located at 3981 Chicago Avenue, Riverside, California (Riverside Market). At all times material, since about February 21, 1983, and continuing to date, Respondent Shelun, a California corporation, doing business under the trade name Super Saver, has been engaged in the business of operating the Riverside Market. In the normal course and conduct of the business operations, it is projected that Respondents will, within the 12-month period commencing about September 12, 1982, derive gross revenues in excess of $500,000 from the operation of the Riverside facility and will, during the same period of time, purchase and receive products originating from outside the State of California valued in excess of $50,000.

The complaint alleges and on the foregoing I find that at all times material Respondent Vazin and Respondent Shelun have been employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, and I find, that the Union is now, and at all times material herein has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Purchase of the Riverside Market and Respondent Vazin's Status as a Successor to Market Basket

The owners and most of the agents of Respondent involved are of Iranian descent and are members of the same family. Houshang Vazin, referred to as Houshang, Harry, or H. Vazin, came to the United States about July 1982.[1] On his arrival in the United States, he and his family lived with his brother Parviz Paul Vazin, referred to as Paul Vazin, at Paul Vazin's home in Palos Verdes, California, for approximately 1 month. Thereafter, Harry Vazin lived with Mohammad Afsari, referred to as Afsari, and his wife Shahnaz, who is the sister of Harry and Paul Vazin, at their home in Riverside, California, until at least February 1983.

Darioush Khaledi is married to the sister of Paul Vazin's wife. Khaledi and Paul Vazin have lived in the United States for some period of time prior to July and at all times material herein have been co-owners and president and vice president, respectively, of K.V. Mart, a company which operates a chain of retail grocery stores under the name of Top Value.

Afsari has lived in the United States since 1974, attended college here, and worked for 2 years as an engineer in the employ of an electrical firm. In mid-1979, Harry and Paul Vazin's brother, Nader Vazin, the owner of a Manhattan Beach, California restaurant called the House of Ribs, returned to Iran and left Afsari with the full power of attorney to operate or dispose of the House of Ribs. Afsari managed the House of Ribs until it was sold in the latter part of 1982 or the first part of 1983. Mohammad Vazin, the brother of Harry, Paul, and Nader Vazin, worked at the House of Ribs as Afsari's assistant manager until the House of Ribs was sold, or shortly before, at which time he began working at the K. V. Mart produce warehouse.

Harry Vazin, who spoke some English but was not fluent, came to the United States with the intent of investing in some business venture. Within the first month or two of his arrival, he discussed with Paul Vazin the nature of such investment. He admits that, in view of Paul Vazin's business experience in this country, he relied heavily on him to decide in what business he should invest.

At some time prior to September 12, 1982, Paul Vazin learned that the Riverside Market, which was then owned by the Kroger Company and operated as one of the Market Basket chain of grocery stores in Southern California, was for sale; and it was decided that Harry Vazin should invest in the purchase of the Riverside Market. Khaledi was to be president and Harry Vazin was to be either vice president or secretary. Harry Vazin agreed that Khaledi and Paul Vazin would handle all of the negotiations for the purchase of the Riverside Market and the lease agreement for the property where the market is located.

[1] Unless otherwise indicated, all dates in July through December are in 1982 and in January through June are in 1983.

The purchase and sale agreement names Houshang Vazin as purchaser within the body of the agreement; however, the agreement is signed both by Houshang Vazin and Darioush Khaledi on August 31, and by a representative of the Kroger Company on September 1. The agreement provides for a closing date of no later than September 11 and further provides, inter alia:

> . . . .
> (b) Seller, as a member of the Southern California Food Employers' [sp.] Council, Inc., is a party to the various labor contracts covering the Store(s) which are described herein and more particularly described below: (See Exhibit E).
> Purchaser agrees to become a successor to all of said applicable contracts and to abide by all relevant terms and conditions thereof.
> Further, Purchaser agrees to contribute to the multi-employer pension plan(s) listed on Exhibit F for those employees who are currently participants in said plan(s) and who are retained and employed by Purchaser in accordance with the terms and conditions of the labor agreement(s) listed in Exhibit E.
> . . . .
> (LABOR CONTRACTS)
> 1. Collective bargaining agreement between Food Employers Council, Inc. and UCFW, Retail Clerks covering clerks, stockers, box people, and general merchandise clerks at the stores currently or to be operated by Seller at the store location(s) which expires on or about July 29, 1984.
> . . . .
> EXHIBIT F
> (PENSION PLANS)
> The following Pension Plans covering union employees at the store location(s):
> 1. The Southern California Retail Clerks Union and Food Employers Joint Pension Trust Fund.

The lease names Houshang Vazin as the lessee. However, Khaledi and Paul Vazin signed the lease as guarantors both individually and as K.V. Mart Co. At some point between the signing of the lease and the purchase and sale agreement on September 1 and the closing of escrow on September 11, Khaledi withdrew from the partnership arrangement. Thereafter, insofar as the record reveals, he had no involvement with Respondent's operations. Prior to this withdrawal, however, in late August he instructed Ed Gund of Gund, Gund & Associates, the labor consultant for K.V. Mart, to negotiate with the Union in an attempt to secure some modifications in the collective-bargaining agreement. Gund was able to secure some concessions from the Union which were embodied in a letter of understanding signed by Gund on September 9, and by Kenneth M. Schwartz, the Union's attorney, on September 20.

The body of this letter reads:

> This letter is to confirm our telephone conversation of September 8, 1982 regarding the above-captioned market.
> Mr. Houshang Vazin, the purchaser, has agreed to the terms we discussed. They are as follows:
> 1. The seniority of all employees (present and future) will start as of the take-over of the market.
> 2. All holidays (which under the terms of the contract would be triple time) will be paid at the rate of double time.
> 3. Present contract shall run until July 29, 1984.
> If this letter correctly states your understanding, please sign on the line provided and return to us. Please retain the enclosed executed copy for your files.

After the withdrawal of Khaledi from the partnership arrangement,[2] Paul Vazin continued to act on behalf of Respondent Vazin; and, although the record contains no formal partnership agreement between Harry Vazin and Paul Vazin, the application for, and subsequent transfer of, alcoholic beverage license is in the names of Houshang Vazin and Parviz P. Vazin. The business tax certificate, dated September 7, 1982, is in the names of Houshang Vazin and Paul Vazin. Respondent's account with the State Employment Development Department is also in the names of Parviz Paul and Houshang Vazin. A county of Riverside health permit, dated January 27, is issued in the names of Houshang and Paul Vazin, d/b/a Super Save Market. On the other hand, a fictitious business name statement was filed on September 7 naming Houshang Vazin as the registrant for the fictitious business name Super Save Market and the original application for alcoholic beverage license was filed in the name of Houshang Vazin only, but was later modified to include Paul Vazin.

The Riverside Market was open to the public until 4 p.m. on September 11 under the name of Market Basket. After 4 p.m., an inventory was taken and the store was opened to the public on the morning of September 12 under the operation of Respondent Vazin with substantially the same employees,[3] substantially the same inventory and the same store manager as had been utilized by Market Basket. Essentially the only changes in the operation of the Riverside market were its ownership and its name.[4] In these circumstances, I find that Paul Vazin is a co-owner of Respondent Vazin and that Respondent Vazin is a successor to Kroger Company. NLRB v. Burns Security Service, 406 U.S. 272 (1972).

[2] Harry Vazin places the date of Khaledi's withdrawal as September 11. Khaledi places it as 3 to 5 days prior to September 11.

[3] With the exception of four or five employees, the entire Market Basket staff was retained by Respondent Vazin.

[4] I find that the record does not support Respondent's argument that Market Basket did not have a meat department and did not have a produce department. The record indicates only that the inventory in these departments was substantially depleted at the time of the takeover.

B. The Refusal to Execute the Collective-Bargaining Agreement

Union attorney Arnold Schwartz testified without contradiction that in early December, during a telephone conversation, he told Gund that he would like for Respondent Vazin to execute a copy of the contract and that he would send him three copies of the current agreement signed by the Union. In accordance therewith, Schwartz sent Gund copies of the contract with the cover letter dated December 7, the body of which reads:

> Re: Super Save Market and
> UFCW, Local 1167
> Dear Ed:
> Pursuant to our discussions, enclosed please find three (3) copies of the current Food Agreement which has been agreed upon by your client and UFCW, Local 770.
> So that our records are complete, please execute all three (3) copies and return two (2) of the executed copies for our files.[5]

Sometime later Schwartz telephoned Gund and asked why he had not received copies of the contract. According to Schwartz' undenied testimony, Gund replied, "I sent them to the client. Apparently he refuses to sign them."

Schwartz then sent another letter to Gund, the body of which reads:

> Re: Super Save Market and
> Dear Ed:
> On December 7, 1982, we sent you three (3) copies of the Industry Food Agreement to be executed by your client. As we both know, an executed copy is not required in that your client has agreed to be bound by its terms until July 29, 1984, with the exception of the items listed in your letter of September 9, 1982.
> Nonetheless, we feel that in order to have our files complete, it was believed it would be helpful if a formal copy were executed.
> It would be appreciated if you could have two (2) copies executed by you or your client and have same returned to our office for our files.
> Season's Greetings.

Schwartz had no further communication with Gund or with Respondents regarding this matter, nor was Schwartz or the Union ever notified, insofar as the record reveals, that Gund no longer represented Respondent Vazin.

[5] Schwartz testified that the reference to Local 770 in the body of the letter was inadvertent.

C. Afsari's Status at the Riverside Market Prior to February 20

Within a few days after Respondent Vazin commenced the operation of the Riverside Market, Afsari began working in the market full time. In view of his lack of experience in the grocery business, he worked in all areas in an attempt to gain experience. Harry Vazin testified that although Afsari worked in the store, he was not an officially employed person, but rather assisted him. According to Harry Vazin, Afsari conducted some of the business of the store for him and he consulted Afsari regarding matters relating to the operation of the store. Also, Afsari could sign checks for the store, and did so.

Afsari testified that Harry Vazin requested that Afsari assist him in operating the Riverside Market since Harry Vazin had a language barrier and that Afsari look after Harry Vazin's interests to see that things ran smoothly. According to Afsari, sometimes he worked 40 to 50 hours a week at the Riverside Market and sometimes he was just there walking around and he continued in that kind of arrangement from a few days after the store opened until February when Respondent Shelun purchased the store. Afsari was not paid a salary, but Harry Vazin paid the rent on the house shared by them and took care of some of Afsari's other living expenses.

Harry Vazin testified that he had a draw of $1000 a week, $500 for himself and $500 for Afsari, but that this was not as a salary; rather it was the total of their living expenses. He did not actually give Afsari $500 a week; he just used the $1,000 weekly to pay the expenses of the two families and, if Afsari needed money for other things, he would give it to him. He denies that Afsari had any direct responsibilities for performing any duties in the market but, rather, was mostly helping him with the language. It is undisputed that Afsari was the spokesman and interpreter for Harry Vazin.

However, employee witnesses testified, without contradiction, that Afsari made work assignments, worked in the cashier's office, approved customer checks, picked up money drawers from checkers, closed the store and was generally in charge of the night shift, granted time off to employees, signed checks for the store to buy cash from the bank, authorized customer refunds, resolved disputes when the cashier felt a customer was not entitled to a refund, authorized employees to take groceries from the store on an IOU basis, and directed the day-to-day work of employees. They further testified they considered him as a boss and felt obligated to follow his orders. Employee Anna Guzman testified that when she complained that she was receiving conflicting orders from Munt and Afsari, Munt told her to follow Afsari's orders. Employee Luis Guerrero testified that Afsari told him he owned a small interest in the store.

Harry Vazin admits that Afsari spoke to the union representatives who came to the store but denied that he spoke to them on Harry Vazin's behalf. According to him, he told Afsari to tell the union representatives that Respondent Vazin had not signed any contract or agreement with the Union and were not bound to the Union. However, the record is clear that Afsari was Respondent Vazin's spokesman in dealings with the Union. Thus, when the Union filed grievances in November and December regarding contractually guaranteed minimum pay for holidays and weekends, it was Afsari who resolved the grievances with the Union. It was also Afsari who resolved the grievances concerning the persons who were employed in violation of the employment procedures provision of the collective-bargaining agreement and the failure to schedule employees as required by the agreement. When the Union demanded in November that Afsari's wife, Shahnaz, join the Union as required by the union-security provision of the contract, the demand was addressed to Afsari and, in compliance with the demand, Shahnaz did join the Union.

In late December, the Union learned that Respondent had not been making the contractually required contributions to the health and welfare funds. Further, they had reports that there was a clerk working in the store who was not receiving the contractual rate of pay. About January 18, Union Representatives Susie Prior and Frank Mott visited the store. First, they requested that bookkeeper Waldo Foltz permit them to audit the books. Foltz said he could not do that without authorization from Afsari or Harry Vazin. Prior and Mott then discussed the matter with Munt and advised him of what Foltz had said. Munt agreed to show them the timecards. During their discussion, Afsari came into the office and Prior and Mott began discussing with Afsari and Munt the requirements of the collective-bargaining agreement. They discussed the benefits and the rate of pay and at some point, according to Mott's undenied testimony, Afsari said, "Well, I know what you're telling me, or I understand what you are telling me, but that certainly makes it hard to run a business. When I have my restaurant, we don't have to do it that way. I call my relatives when I want. I bring them in when I want, and it's much easier to run it on that basis." Mott replied, "But this is not the House of Ribs. This is the grocery store, and you've got to do it a different way." They continued to discuss the contractual wage and benefit requirement and the difference in the operation at the House of Ribs. Some remark was made regarding Afsari's wife being a member of the Union and Afsari asked if he would have to join the Union. Mott said he did not know, they would have to check it out, but if he was an owner he probably would not have to. Afsari did not respond but, as Prior and Mott were leaving, Prior jokingly said, "Come on, Mo,[6] you can really tell us. Don't you own some of this?" Afsari laughed and replied, "Well, yeah, but it's not on paper."

On February 18, Prior and Munt returned to the market and spoke to Afsari. Mott asked Afsari if he was paying the health and welfare contributions. Afsari replied that they would have to talk to his attorney. Mott asked, "Who is your attorney?" Afsari said, "Mr. Jones of Jones, Jones & Jones." Mott asked several times whether Afsari was making the required contributions to the fund. Each time Afsari said he did not know, that they would have to talk to his attorney. Mott then asked if they could reach his attorney. Afsari said he had a telephone number but it was difficult to reach him. Prior and Mott left the office, called the Union's attorney and asked him to call Jones. The attorney called back 5 or 10 minutes later and said he could not reach Jones.

Prior and Mott then went back to Afsari, told him they could not reach Jones and that this was a serious problem. Afsari said, "I know. We don't want to do anything wrong, but you know, I can't say anything more about it until you talk to my attorney on it." According to Mott, he replied, "Mohammad, you are telling me, and you've told me before, what good employees you've got here, what a good job they do, and how nice people they are. But you are not paying the insurance." Afsari said, "I can't talk about it. You'll have to talk to my attorney." Mott said, "Mo, if you're not paying those benefits, you're shafting those people." Again Afsari said, "I can't talk to you about it." Mott replied, "Okay, fine. Is your attorney going to be in?" Afsari said, "He should be here this afternoon about 3:00." Munt said, "We'll come back." Afsari said, "I don't think he's going to want to talk to you." Mott said, "We'll be back." At some point during the conversation, Mott asked to look at the records and Afsari said he did not have the records, that they were in Los Angeles.

D. The Termination of Respondent Vazin's Employees

As Mott and Prior were leaving the store following their February 18 conversation with Afsari, employee Ed Horne approached them and said, "What the heck does this mean? The store is closing down." According to Mott, since Afsari had made no mention of closing the store, he thought Horne was kidding, so he started to laugh and said, "Yeah, tell us another one." Horne said, "No," and pulled out an unsigned letter which read:

> February 17, 1983
> H.V., A partnership dba
> Super Save
> 3981 Chicago Avenue
> Riverside, CA 92507
> Ladies and Gentlemen:
> We are sorry to report that we are going out of business as of midnight, February 19, 1983.
> Any monies due you from working and not paid for in the check will be available on Thursday. (They will be mailed to your home.)
> There might be a company that will lease the building and be in the Retail Food Business, but as of today we are not sure.
> Should a new business start-up, then if you are interested in working for them you can contact them directly for employment.
> Thank you for your help, but conditions are such as we have no other choice but to go out of business.

All of Respondent Vazin's employees received identical letters with their paychecks on either February 18 or February 19.

Immediately following their conversation with Horne, Prior and Mott reentered the store and asked Afsari what this was all about. Afsari replied, "What can I tell you? We're closing down. We're not doing any business." Mott then walked away because other employees were approaching them with letters that they had just received with their paychecks. After some conversation with employees, Mott returned to Afsari and asked, "What are you doing?" Afsari replied, "You know what we're doing. We can't make any money. We are closing down." Mott asked, "Are you terminating these people or what?" Afsari said, "There is no work for them." Mott asked, "Are you terminating them, laying them off?" Afsari said, "There's no work for them." Mott said, "That's not an answer. What's happening?"

After a short interchange of a similar nature, Mott asked, "Are you going to open up again?" Afsari said, "I don't know. It's a new company." Mott asked, "What are they going to do?" Afsari said, "I don't know." Mott asked, "Are they going to open up?" Afsari replied, "They may, they may not. It may be a retail establishment. It may not be." Mott said, "At this point in time, I'm telling you, if you're going to open up a retail business here or a grocery business, I'm telling you, every one of these employees is willing to come back to work for you." Afsari said, "Well, fine, they can fill out an application if a new company comes in." At some point during the conversation, according to Mott's undenied testimony, he asked Afsari who the new owners of the company would be. To which Afsari replied, "I don't know anything about it."

E. The Formation of Respondent Shelun and the Operation of the Riverside Market Subsequent to February 20

Harry Vazin testified that he decided to sell the Riverside Market about 2 or 3 months after Respondent Vazin began operating the market because he was losing money. He admits that one of the reasons he was losing money was because the payroll was too high. He also admits that he did not advertise that the store was for sale and did not receive offers from anyone other than Afsari and Mohammad Vazin. Afsari testified that sometime in mid-January he and Mohammad Vazin decided to purchase the Riverside Market for themselves and on behalf of a friend, Mehdi Loloee, who was attempting to enter the United States. At the time Mohammad Vazin was working at the K.V. Mart produce warehouse.

At the beginning of February, Afsari sold the House of Ribs for $60,000; $50,000 was cleared from the sale of which Afsari received $15,000 and Mohammad Vazin $35,000. Mohammad Vazin and Afsari formed the corporation Shelun Company, Inc., on January 24, 1983. According to individual financial affidavits filed with Shelun's application for an alcoholic beverage license, Afsari stated that his total financial contribution was $24,000 for the purchase of 1,000 shares of stock which sum was obtained as a gift from his family in Iran. Afsari's affidavit also listed him as vice president, secretary, and chief financial officer. Mohammad Vazin's affidavit lists him as president and states that his financial contribution was $48,000 for the purchase of 2000 shares of stock which sum was obtained as a loan from his brothers.

As of April 13, according to a corporate questionnaire signed by Afsari for the State Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, Shelun had outstanding only the 3000 shares of stock owned by Mohammad Vazin and Afsari with no stock pending issuance. According to the purchase and sales agreement, and the testimony of Harry Vazin, the grocery portion of the Riverside Market was sold to Shelun for $10,000 in cash, a $20,000 promissory note and assumption of a $70,000 loan. The liquor portion of the market was also to be sold to Shelun for a purchase price of $84,000. However, that purchase and sale was never consummated and Respondent Vazin still owns the liquor department of the Riverside Market.

Afsari testified that in the beginning of February he and Mohammad Vazin sought advice from Norman Jones, labor consultant, who is representing Respondents because they were interested in purchasing the Riverside Market and wanted to operate it as a nonunion store. After several discussions with Jones, they determined that they could avoid becoming a union operation by not hiring union employees. Specifically, they determined that they would hire no more than 30 percent of Respondent Vazin's employees. At that time Respondent Vazin had about 34 employees, all members of the Union except for possibly 4 or 5 employees who had been hired within the preceding 30 days. Respondent Shelun hired about eight of them.

Although Respondent Vazin retained its ownership of the liquor department and Respondent Shelun was the nominal owner of the grocery departments, it is undisputed that the Riverside Market continued to operate much as it had prior to February 9. The store was closed for one day on February 20 and reopened on February 21. Sandy McKovitch replaced Munt as store manager. No inventory of merchandise was taken at the time of the sale. According to Afsari this was because Shelun had assumed Respondent Vazin's liabilities. Afsari admits that he continued to manage the liquor department; further, he also did the bookkeeping for the liquor department. A paid bookkeeper did the bookkeeping for the grocery department. The liquor department employees were on Shelun's payroll. However, according to Harry Vazin and Afsari, Respondent Vazin reimbursed Shelun for their wages.

According to the undenied testimony of Leeper, who was the produce manager, after February 21, Harry Vazin continued to give him orders. If Harry Vazin found merchandise that he thought was unsatisfactory he would tell Leeper to send it back or to write credits on it or not to receive it at all. He would inspect the produce and give Leeper orders as to removing certain produce that he considered unsatisfactory and putting out new produce. Leeper also testified that on February 21, Harry Vazin asked him, "Don, what's the matter? You're not happy." Leeper said, "No, Harry, six months ago when I started to work for this company your brother, Paul, introduced us and said you would be my new boss. Now nobody will tell me anything: who my new boss is, who I'm working for, or anything." Harry Vazin replied, "Don, I'm still your boss. Don't be unhappy. Everything will be okay." Also after February 21, Harry Vazin told Leeper to continue to buy produce from different people he knew at warehouses in Riverside.

Elder testified that on February 19, Harry Vazin told him they liked him and the way he worked. Elder said that he liked working there. Harry Vazin said they would like for Elder to work for them but they could not do it then and he did not know at what time in the future Elder could be rehired. Elder was rehired on February 24 and, according to him, from that time until he left in August 1983, Harry Vazin was continuing to give orders and work assignments, he was in the office overseeing the books and the cashier and he stocked, unloaded trucks and received goods at the back door. According to him, Afsari also continued to do the same things he had before except that he was in the office more.

Elder also testified that in August McKovitch asked him to come to the office, which he did. At that time McKovitch told him he was going to have to let him go. Elder asked what the problem was, what he had done. McKovitch said that Harry and Frank (Loloee) and Afsari did not particularly like the job he was doing, feeling he would be happier some place else. Elder further testified that after February 21, Harry Vazin continued to give him orders such as stocking the milk case or the shelves. McMillan, who worked for Respondent Vazin as a liquor clerk, testified that on February 22, when he returned to the market to turn in a key, Harry Vazin told him that in approximately 3 to 5 months there was a possibility he would be hired back. Edgar Horne testified that on February 19 he turned his keys in to Harry Vazin, Harry thanked him for the job he did, and said he would call Horne in 2 weeks.

On March 28, the Union established an informational picket line which continued at least through the date of the hearing. According to Mott, he usually visits the picket line 6 days a week during which time he has an opportunity to observe duties that Harry Vazin performs on the outside. According to him, the market receives one or two grocery loads a week and, at least once a week, he has observed Harry Vazin assist in unloading a grocery truck with the forklift and about once every 2 weeks he would observe him assisting in moving meat around in the back area. Richard Hiemstra testified that sometime in about May when he was on the picket line he asked Harry Vazin why he had not been recalled to work. Harry Vazin replied they were going to call everyone back in 30 days but "because of all this, I can't call you back." As he said this he pointed to the picketers.

F. The Alleged Unlawful Statements

Afsari admits that prior to Shelun taking over the operation of the Riverside Market, he told several unit employees that he could only hire 30 percent of Respondent Vazin employees when the store reopened. He also admits that he asked all eight of the employees of Respondent Vazin hired by Respondent Shelun to withdraw from the Union; that he offered a job to one box person, in part, because he was not a member of the Union; and that he discussed with employees the terms and conditions of their continued employment by Shelun. Some were told that they would receive less wages and no benefits, one employee was told he would receive a wage increase, and some employees were told that insurance benefits would be provided in the near future. Other unit employees were told by Afsari that he would have jobs for them after 30 days.

On February 18, according to the undenied testimony of employee Don Leeper, Afsari told him that the company was on the verge of going bankrupt but a new company would probably open the following Monday, that he would like for Leeper to work for the new company as produce manager, but that it would be nonunion and he would receive a 10-cent-an-hour raise in pay. Afsari further told Leeper that at a future time the employees would receive health and welfare coverage. Leeper was required to fill out a new application.

Employee Robert Blair testified that on February 18, after he received his termination letter, Munt told him that the store was closing because they did not want to pay union wages, that Paul did not want the Union in there, that they were paying less wages in Los Angeles for the same kind of work.[7] Blair further testified that on February 19 Afsari asked him if he wanted to remain in Respondent Shelun's employ. Blair said, no, that Munt had told him it would be a nonunion store and he needed the benefits. Afsari said they were going to have an insurance plan available to the new employees. Blair asked if it would be a nonunion store; Afsari said it would.

Employee Luis Guerrero testified that on February 19 Afsari told him he would have to wait 30 days before they would let him know if he would be employed again. Afsari said their lawyers advised that they could only keep a certain percentage of the employees so they would have to wait 30 days. Employee Richard Hiemstra testified that on February 19 he asked Afsari what the deal was, if they were going to be called back. Afsari said not to worry about it, they would probably call everyone back, or most everyone, in 30 days.

Employee Diane Ferneding testified that on February 19, when she asked Afsari what they should do, he said to come back in and apply; they would be given a call. Afsari further said they could only hire a percentage of the Super Save employees at that time but after 30 days they could rehire all they wanted. He said, if they recalled more than a certain percentage, the market would be considered a union store again. The following week, according to Ferneding's undenied testimony, she returned to the store to fill out an application. At that time Front End Supervisor Denise McCormick, in the presence of Afsari, told her she would be called back after 30 days at a quoted wage rate which was roughly half the rate she had received at Super Save and that there would be no benefits.

Employee Mary Snyder testified that on February 19, after she had received her termination notice, she asked Afsari what was going to happen. He replied, "Don't worry, it will be okay." He then told her to come in on Monday and fill out an application. He further said he was sorry but they had to close the store because they were just not making it; the business was not what they had expected it to be and it was costing too much money. At some point in the conversation, when they were discussing why it cost so much money, Snyder said she had been surprised that Respondent Vazin retained the Union when they bought the store. Afsari said that was the only way it could be purchased. He further said they owed $50,000 to the Union and they were going to have to pay it.

Employee Verna Fuches testified that on February 21, she asked Manager Sandy McKovitch what was going on. McKovitch said he did not know. Fuches asked what was going to happen with the employees who had not been rehired. McKovitch said they could only keep a certain percentage and the rest would probably be called back within 30 days. Fuches asked if it were going to be a union store and McKovitch said no.

Employee Michael Elder testified that on Tuesday, February 22, he and three other Super Save employees applied for work with Respondent Shelun. On February 24, Mohammad Vazin hired him to work for Respondent Shelun. At that time, Mohammad Vazin told Elder his rate of pay, which was $3 to $4 less than he was paid by Respondent Vazin. When Elder asked if there were going to be any benefits, Vazin said, "Not at this time." When Elder asked if the store was going to be union or nonunion, Vazin said, "nonunion" and that Elder would need to get a withdrawal card from the Union. Several months later, according to Elder, Store Manager Sandy McKovitch told him, "they" said he needed to send a registered letter to the Union requesting a withdrawal card. McKovitch said those employees who did not get a withdrawal card were not going to be able to work.

G. The Alter Ego Issue

Although a determination as to whether two employers are alter egos, of necessity, must turn on the facts of the particular case, it is well established that the factors to be considered are: (1) interrelation of operations; (2) common management; (3) common ownership; and (4) centralized control of labor relations. Sakrete of Northern California, 137 NLRB 1220, 1222 (1962), enfd. 332 F.2d 902 (9th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 380 U.S. 255 (1964).

Thus, the Board has generally found alter ego status where the two enterprises have substantially identical management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision, as well as ownership. Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976); Denzil S. Alkire, 259 NLRB 1323 (1982). No one factor is controlling and all need not be present. Complete identity in ownership is not a requisite, particularly when ownership resides in members of the same family. Crawford Door Sales Co., supra; Shield-Pacific, 245 NLRB 409 (1979); Nabco Corp,. 266 NLRB 687 (1983). However, centralized control of labor relations is the most important single factor. J. M. Tanaka Construction v. NLRB, 675 F.2d 1029 (9th Cir. 1982).

Here, prior to February 20, Respondent Vazin owned and operated the Riverside Market which included two major departments—liquor and grocery. Although Munt was the store manager, it is clear from the record that Afsari's authority superseded that of Munt, that Munt deferred to him in matters of labor relations, management, and supervision, and that Afsari in fact exercised control in these areas.

Further, although it appears that Harry Vazin remained in the background to a certain extent, he was in the store regularly and, in his relationship with the employees, did exercise supervisory control. The extent to which he had actual, as opposed to potential, management control of the operations is unclear from the record. There is no convincing evidence in the record that he maintained actual control, with Afsari merely serving as a conduit for the relay of instructions and decisions.

After a hiatus of 1 day, Respondent Shelun ostensibly took over the operation of the grocery department on February 21. Although the store had a new manager, Sandy McKovitch, Afsari, now openly an owner of the market, continued in much the same management and supervisory role. The evidence establishes that Afsari and Mohammad Vazin established labor relations policy. Respondent Vazin continued to operate the liquor department. However, it is undisputed that the Riverside Market continued to operate much as it had prior to February 20. Afsari admits that he continued to manage the liquor department. He did most of the bookkeeping for the liquor department, a paid bookkeeper did most of the bookkeeping for the grocery department. The liquor department employees were on Shelun's payroll, although allegedly Respondent Vazin reimbursed Respondent Shelun for these wages. Shelun employees staffed the liquor department when the regular liquor clerks were out.

Outwardly, Harry Vazin's role remained unchanged. He continued to inspect produce and to give instructions to the produce manager as to the removal from display in the store, and the return to the supplier, of produce considered by him to be unsatisfactory. He also instructed the manager of the produce department as to what suppliers he should utilize. He continued to give orders and assignments to grocery department employees, to stock, unload trucks, and receive goods for the grocery department. When an employee complained of the uncertainty engendered by the change of ownership, Harry Vazin assured the employee that he was still the employees' boss.

These circumstances all indicate an interrelation of Respondent Vazin and Respondent Shelun operations, common supervision and management, and common control of labor relations. Further, it is clear that their combined operations at the Riverside Market had the same business purpose, equipment, and customers as had Respondent Vazin prior to February 20 and that the Riverside Market, both before and after February 20, had management and supervision which, though somewhat different, had a substantial thread of commonality and that the same person continued in active, if not sole, control of labor relations.

When these circumstances are viewed in the context of the less than arm's-length transaction[8] and the familial relationship involved, it is apparent that Respondent Shelun is a disguised continuance of Respondent Vazin. All of the owners involved here are members of the same family—a family which has a history of some family members operating enterprises for the benefit of other family members without regard to the niceties of legal ownership. In this regard, Harry Vazin testified that it is the custom in his country that business arrangements between members of the immediate family—father, mother, sister and brother and sometimes the spouse of the sister and brother—are not reduced to writing. Thus, even though he was not a legal owner of the family business because he was in the military and such ownership was prohibited in the military, he did have an unwritten business arrangement with his family. When he retired from the military, he worked in the family business. He received no salary but drew money from the business as he needed it.

Similarly, Paul Vazin invested no money in Respondent Vazin but, as found above, had an ownership interest therein. Afsari was not a legal owner of the House of Ribs; yet he had Nader Vazin's power of attorney to operate and dispose of that business. He did sell it and distributed 70 percent of the proceeds of the sale to Mohammad Vazin, who also was not a legal owner of the restaurant. Further, though Afsari had no legal ownership in Respondent Vazin, he worked full time for Respondent Vazin without salary. Rather, Harry Vazin gave him half of Vazin's regular draw from the business and whatever other funds he needed. Also, at the time that Respondent Vazin was operating the Riverside Market, Harry Vazin and his family lived with Afsari and his family.

In all of the circumstances, I find that Respondent Shelun is an alter ego of Respondent Vazin. Further, in the circumstances set forth above, coupled with Harry Vazin's admission that he wanted to divest himself of the ownership of the market because the union contract was causing Respondent to lose money, and the statements of Afsari and Mohammad Vazin that they would hire no more than 30 percent of Respondent Vazin's employees because they wanted to avoid becoming a union operation, that those hired would have to withdraw from the Union and the other employees of Respondent Vazin would be hired after 30 days when their hire would not affect Respondent Shelun's nonunion status, I find that Respondent Shelun was created in an attempt to evade and avoid Respondent Vazin's contractual and statutory bargaining obligations.

H. Conclusions as to the Alleged Unfair Labor Practices

The complaint alleges that Respondents unlawfully refused to execute the September 8 agreement with the Union. Respondents do not deny that Gund and Schwartz reached such an agreement. Rather, Respondents argue that Gund represented Khaledi and/or K.V. Mart Co., but never represented Respondent Vazin, and that the agreement reached by Gund was on behalf of a proposed corporation which never came into being. I find no merit in this contention. In this regard, I note that Harry Vazin admits that Khaledi and Paul Vazin had full authority to negotiate the purchase of the market, and that they negotiated a discount of $25,000 from the purchase price because of the requirement that the purchaser adopt the union contract, that Khaledi retained Gund to negotiate some modification of that agreement, and that in so doing Gund purported to represent the purchaser of the market and specifically named Harry Vazin as having agreed to the terms of the modification. Further, although Respondent never made any contribution to the various benefit funds as required by the agreement, Respondent Vazin made no attempt to repudiate the agreement and, in fact, implemented it in a number of regards, including grievance provisions. Accordingly, in view of the terms of the purchase and sale agreement and the modification agreement signed by Schwartz and Gund, and Respondent Vazin's subsequent implementation of the wage and grievance provisions of the agreement, I find that Respondent Vazin adopted Market Basket's collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and was therefore obligated to execute and abide by the agreement. I therefore find that by refusing to execute the agreement reached with the Union on September 8, Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. NLRB v. Burns, supra. I further find that by failing to grant employees the contractually required cost-of-living wage increase on January 31, 1983, by failing to make the contractually required contributions to the benefit trust funds, by bypassing the Union and dealing directly with employees as to their wages and other terms and conditions of employment, and by withdrawing recognition from the Union and repudiating its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

I also find that the employees terminated by Respondents on February 18 and 19 were terminated because they were represented by the Union in an attempt by Respondents to evade their contractual and statutory obligation. Accordingly, I find that they were unlawfully terminated in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

I further find that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by telling employees that, in order to avoid being a union store, Respondent could only hire a certain percentage of Respondent Vazin's employees; that they could not be hired for 30 days in order to avoid having the Riverside store remain a union store and that they would have to obtain withdrawal cards from the Union in order to continue their employment.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Houshang Vazin, an Individual, d/b/a Super Save; and Parviz Paul Vazin, an Individual, d/b/a Super Save; and Houshang Vazin and Parviz Paul Vazin, a partnership, d/b/a Super Save; and Shelun Company, Inc. d/b/a Super Saver are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 1167, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent Vazin is a successor to Kroger Company, obligated to recognize and bargain with the Union and to abide by the terms of Kroger's collective-bargaining agreement with the Union as modified by the Union and Respondent Vazin.

4. Respondent Shelun is the alter ego of Respondent Vazin established for the purpose of evading Respondent Vazin's obligation to bargain with the Union and to abide by the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

5. The following employees of Respondents constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All food clerks, bakery, health and beauty aids, and household hardware clerks, general merchandise clerks, clerk's helpers, and snack bar and take-out food department employees employed by Respondents at their 3981 Chicago Avenue, Riverside, California facility; excluding all office clerical employees, meat department employees, janitorial employees, maintenance employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

6. At all times material, the Union has been, and is now, the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

7. On or about September 8, 1982, Respondents and the Union reached full and complete agreement with respect to terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the appropriate unit described above.

8. Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (l) of the Act by:

(a) Failing and refusing to execute the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(b) Failing and refusing to make the contractually required contributions to the various benefit trust funds and by failing and refusing to grant the January 31, 1983, cost-of-living increase as provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(c) On and after February 18, 1983, bypassing the Union and bargaining directly with the employees with regard to the terms and conditions of their continued employment.

(d) Unilaterally changing wage rates and eliminating certain fringe benefits on February 21, 1983.

(e) Withdrawing recognition from the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described above and repudiating its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

9. By discharging the following employees and failing and refusing to reinstate them to their former positions of employment, because said employees were members of, or represented by the Union, and in an attempt to evade its bargaining obligation with the Union and its obligation to abide by the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act:

Robert Blair	Miles Tilghman
Michael Elder	Robert Robbins
Diane Ferneding	Richard Heimstra
Verna Fuches	Jack McMillan
Luis Guerrero	Stephen Wakeman
Ed Horne	Anthony Bullock
Barbara Luce	Michele Gracia
Denise Martin	Jack Summers
Sue Ellen Mott	Barry Swift
Mary Snyder	Roy Webb
Larry Delgado	Joseph Vargas
Leo Smith Jr.	Mark McCoy
Anna Guzman	Kenya Tapscott

10. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by:

(a) Telling employees they could only hire a certain percentage of Respondent Vazin's employees in order to keep it from being a union shop.

(b) Telling employees they could not be rehired for at least 30 days in order to avoid having the Riverside Market remain a union store.

(c) Telling employees that they would have to obtain withdrawal cards from the Union as a condition of their continued employment.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that they cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent Vazin and Respondent Shelun are alter egos and that Respondents have unlawfully withdrawn recognition from the Union, have unlawfully repudiated its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, and have unlawfully unilaterally reduced the wage rates of employees and failed and refused to make contractually required contributions to the various benefit trust funds, I shall recommend that Respondent recognize and, on request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, that Respondent acknowledge that it is bound by the collective-bargaining agreement agreed to with the Union on about September 8, 1983, that it abide by the agreement and that it make the employees in the appropriate unit whole by paying retroactively the wage rates provided for in its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and by paying all contractually required contributions to the various trust funds which have not been paid and which would have been paid absent Respondents' unlawful unilateral discontinuance of such payments.[9]

[9] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide for interest at a fixed rate on fund payments due as part of a "make-whole" remedy. We therefore leave to further proceedings the question of how much interest Respondent must pay into the benefit fund in order to satisfy our "make-whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending on the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the fund at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 at fn. 7 (1979).

Having found that Respondent unlawfully discharged its employees named below in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer each of them immediate and full reinstatement to his or her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his or her seniority or any other right and privilege previously enjoyed, and make each of them whole for any loss of earnings he or she may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, plus interest, in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1961):[10]

As the unfair labor practices committed by the Respondent are of a character striking at the very heart of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from infringing in any other manner on the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[11]

ORDER

The Respondents, Houshang Vazin, an Individual, d/b/a Super Save; Parviz Paul Vazin, an Individual, d/b/a Super Save; Houshang Vazin and Pariz Paul Vazin, a Partnership, d/b/a Super Save; and Shelun Company, Inc. d/b/a Super Saver, Riverside, California, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the unit found appropriate herein.

(b) Failing and refusing to execute its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union agreed to on September 8, 1983.

(c) Repudiating its obligation to abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement.

(d) Failing and refusing to make contractually required contributions to the various benefit trust funds and failing and refusing to grant the January 31, 1983, cost-of-living increase as provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement.

(e) Unilaterally reducing wage rates and eliminating certain fringe benefits provided for in said collective-bargaining agreement.

(f) Bypassing the Union and bargaining directly with the employees with regard to the terms and conditions of their continued employment.

(g) Discharging employees in an attempt to avoid its obligation to abide by said collective-bargaining agreement and its obligation to recognize and bargain with the Union.

(h) Telling employees that Respondent could only hire a certain percentage of Respondent Vazin's employees in order to keep the Riverside Market from being a union shop.

(i) Telling employees that they could not be rehired for at least 30 days in order to avoid having the Riverside Market remain a union shop.

(j) Telling employees that they would have to obtain withdrawal cards from the Union as a condition of their continued employment.

(k) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize the above-named Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the appropriate unit described below and, upon request, meet and bargain with the aforesaid Union concerning wages, hours, pension, and welfare benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment; and, if an understanding is reached, embody it in a signed document. The appropriate unit is:

> All food clerks, bakery, health and beauty aids, and household hardware clerks, general merchandise clerks, clerk's helpers, and snack bar and takeout food department employees employed by Respondents at their 3981 Chicago Avenue, Riverside, California facility; excluding all office clerical employees, meat department employees, janitorial employees, maintenance employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Acknowledge that it is bound by the Retail Food, Bakery, Candy, and General Merchandise Agreement between the Union and certain other unions and Food Employers Council, Inc., and Independent Retail Operators effective by its terms from July 27, 1981, to July 29, 1984, as modified by Respondents and the Union on September 8, 1983; and abide by the terms of said agreement both retroactively and prospectively.

(c) Make its employees whole by paying retroactively the wage rate and health and welfare trust contributions as provided in said collective-bargaining agreement with the Union which have not been paid, and which would have been paid absent its unlawful reduction and/or unilateral discontinuance of such payment.

(d) Offer the employees named below immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if such posi-

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 16 February 1984 the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit enforced an Order issued by the National Labor Relations Board on 8 April 1983[1] directing the Respondent, inter alia, to make whole discriminatee Darcy Farrell for any losses resulting from the Respondent's unfair labor practices. A controversy having arisen over the amount of backpay owed Farrell, the Regional Director for Region 3, on 12 April 1984, issued and caused to be served on the parties a backpay specification and notice of hearing alleging the amount of backpay due under the terms of the Board's Order. On 21 May 1984 the Regional Director issued and caused to be served on the parties an amendment to the backpay specification and notice of hearing. On 25 April and 1 June 1984 the Respondent filed an answer to the backpay specification and an answer to the amended specification, respectively.

On 13 July 1984 the General Counsel filed with the Board a Motion to Strike Respondent's Answer as to Gross Backpay Computations; to Strike Certain Affirmative Defenses; for Summary Judgment as to Computations of Gross Backpay. On 16 July 1984 the General Counsel filed an amended motion. On 19 July 1984 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the General Counsel's motion should not be granted. Thereafter, the Respondent filed a statement in opposition to the General Counsel's motion.

The Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.54(b) and (c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides as follows:

> (b) Contents of the answer to specification.—The answer to the specification shall be in writing, the original being signed and sworn to by the respondent or by a duly authorized agent with appropriate power of attorney affixed, and shall contain the post office address of the respondent. The respondent shall specifically admit, deny, or explain each and every allegation of the specification, unless the respondent is without knowledge, in which case the respondent shall so state, such statement operating as a denial. Denials shall fairly meet the substance of the allegations of the specification denied. When a respondent intends to deny only a part of an allegation, the respondent shall specify so much of it as is true and shall deny only the remainder. As to all matters within the knowledge of the respondent, including but not limited to the various factors entering into the computation of gross backpay, a general denial shall not suffice. As to such matters, if the respondent disputes either the accuracy of the figures in the specification or the premises on which they are based, he shall specifically state the basis for his disagreement, setting forth in detail his position as to the applicable premises and furnishing the appropriate supporting figures.
> (c) Effect of failure to answer or to plead specifically and in detail to the specification.—If the respondent fails to file any answer to the specification within the time prescribed by this section, the Board may, either with or without taking evidence in support of the allegations of the specification and without notice to the respondent, find the specification to be true and enter such order as may be appropriate. If the respondent files an answer to the specification but fails to deny any allegation of the specification in the manner required by subsection (b) of this section, and the failure so to deny is not adequately explained, such allegation shall be deemed to be admitted to be true, and may be so found by the Board without the taking of evidence supporting such allegation, and the respondent shall be precluded from introducing any evidence controverting said allegation.

In the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding, the Board found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to hire Darcy Farrell on 28 September 1981 because he was designated as union steward when he was referred by the Union in response to the Respondent's request for steamfitters. The backpay period alleged in the backpay specification is 28 September 1981 through 7 January 1983, excluding the period between 2 June and 21 July 1982 during which time the Respondent employed no steamfitters because of an economic strike by the Union.

In its answer to the backpay specification, the Respondent offered general denials to the allegations concerning the formula used to compute gross backpay, the method of computing net backpay, the computation of gross backpay for Farrell, interim earnings, and the fringe benefit funds payments due on behalf of Farrell under the collective-bargaining agreement. In addition, the Respondent contended that Farrell is not entitled to any backpay for the period after the conclusion of the strike on 21 July 1982 because he would not have been rehired when work resumed in view of his prior unsatisfactory work record and the Respondent's practice of seeking referrals from the Union only as a last resort when it could not hire sufficient numbers of steamfitters through its own recruitment. The Respondent claimed that, in fact, it did not obtain referrals from the Union after the strike.

The General Counsel asserts that the Respondent's general denials regarding certain allegations of the backpay specification do not comply with the specificity requirements of Section 102.54(b) and (c). As to the Respondent's affirmative defense that Farrell would not have been rehired after the strike, the General Counsel contends that this allegation raises issues which were litigated and adjudicated by the Board and reviewed by the Second Circuit in the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding. Further, the General Counsel argues that if there is uncertainty regarding the backpay period, the claimant should receive the benefit of any doubt, not the Respondent. Accordingly, the General Counsel asserts that the allegations of the backpay specification relating to gross backpay should be deemed admitted as true and that the Board should grant summary judgment as to the computation of gross backpay.

We agree with the General Counsel's contentions, except we will not at this time order the Respondent to make payments into the industry advancement program because the Board has generally found that such programs are nonmandatory subjects of bargaining.[2] Inasmuch as the data at issue covering the period between the unlawful refusal to hire Farrell and the commencement of the June 1982 strike is within the Respondent's knowledge and control, its failure to set forth fully its position regarding the applicable premises or to furnish appropriate supporting figures is contrary to the specificity requirements of Section 102.54(b).

We also find that the Respondent's answer fails to raise a genuine issue of material fact concerning whether Farrell is entitled to backpay for the period after the cessation of the Union's strike, i.e., between 21 July 1982 and 7 January 1983. As mentioned above, the Respondent contends that Farrell would not have been recalled after the strike because of his prior unsatisfactory work record and the Respondent's practice of seeking referrals from the Union only as a last resort. We agree with the General Counsel that the Respondent cannot rely on Farrell's alleged unsatisfactory work record in this backpay proceeding since that allegation was litigated and rejected in the unfair labor practice proceeding. Specifically, the Board found pretextual the Respondent's contention that Farrell was not hired on 28 September 1981 because he was not a dependable worker. Inasmuch as Farrell was not employed by the Respondent subsequent to that date, the Respondent's claim that Farrell was an unsatisfactory worker fails to raise a new issue warranting a hearing in this compliance proceeding.

The Respondent's contention that Farrell is not entitled to poststrike backpay because it did not obtain referrals from the Union after the strike also fails to raise any litigable issue. There is no evidence or contention that the Respondent offered to hire Farrell before the strike. Thus, the Respondent has not yet complied with the Board's order that it offer him immediate employment in a job he would have received had it not unlawfully discriminated against him in September 1981. Further, it is uncontroverted that the Respondent employed steamfitters after the strike. Accordingly, even accepting as true the Respondent's asserted referral practices as to new poststrike hires, those practices have no relevance to the Respondent's continuing obligation to offer Farrell the job he should have held before and after the strike, nor could they operate to toll the Respondent's backpay obligation prior to such an offer of employment.

Thus, we shall grant the General Counsel's motion to strike the Respondent's answer as to gross backpay computations and to strike certain affirmative defenses, and we shall grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment as to computations of gross backpay, except insofar as they relate to payments into the industry advancement program. We find, however, that the Respondent's general denial is sufficient to place interim earnings into issue because that information is generally not within the knowledge of the Respondent.[3] Accordingly, we shall order a hearing to determine Farrell's interim earnings, including the availability to him of interim employment and his failure to seek and/or retain such interim employment.

ORDER

It is ordered that the General Counsel's motion to strike the Respondent's answer is granted in part.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment as to computations of gross backpay and fringe benefit funds payments, excluding industry advancement program payments, is granted.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that this proceeding is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 3 for the purpose of arranging and giving notice of a hearing before an administrative law judge, at which hearing the interim earnings of Darcy Farrell shall be determined.[4]

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 20 April 1984 Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Linton issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, San Angelo, Texas, its officer, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election held on 30 September 1983 in Case 16–RC–8611 is set aside and that the case is remanded to the Regional Director to conduct another election when he deems the circumstances permit the free choice of bargaining representative.[2]

[Direction of Second Election omitted from publication.]

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In the absence of exceptions, we adopt, pro forma, the judge's recommendation to overrule the Union's Objections 5, 9, and 10.

We agree with the judge that Supervisor Hoover violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening an employee that if the Union won the election the Respondent would close, the Respondent could rehire employees at minimum wage, and the employees could lose their present level of benefits. Member Hunter, who would dismiss the latter two violations because the General Counsel allegedly failed to show the "context" in which the latter two remarks were made, ignores the fact that these remarks were made in the same conversation, thus establishing that the latter two remarks were made in the context of an unlawful threat of plant closure.

Member Hunter agrees with the judge's finding that Supervisor Hoover violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by stating in the presence of an employee that the Respondent could close down the plant if employees voted for the Union, but finds the evidence insufficient to establish that Hoover threatened employees with loss of benefits, replacement, and rehiring at the Federal minimum wage given the General Counsel's failure to show the context in which Hoover's other statements were made.

In so finding, Member Hunter notes that, contrary to the implication of his colleagues, the record fails to show that Hoover's plant closing remark was directed to the employee rather than to a fellow supervisor present in the same room. In addition, while the employee recounted Hoover's remaining statements as if made in succession, it is clear, as found by the judge, that the employee's version "runs several topics together," and fails to describe the specific topics addressed by Hoover's remarks or the transition from topic to topic. Under the circumstances, Hoover's comments may be lawful or unlawful depending on the subject matter at issue. As the record does not reveal the specific subject matter to which Hoover's remarks were directed, the General Counsel has failed to carry his burden of showing that Hoover's remarks would reasonably coerce employees in the exercise of rights under the Act.

[2] We agree with the judge that the Notice of Second Election should include language in accord with the Board's decision in Lufkin Rule Co., 147 NLRB 341 (1964).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. LINTON, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were tried before me in San Angelo, Texas, on January 23, 1984, pursuant to the November 16, 1983 complaint issued by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Regional Director for Region 16 of the Board in Case 16–CA–11335, and the November 18, 1983 report on objections, order consolidating cases, and notice of hearing issued by the Regional Director in Case 16–RC–8611.

The complaint is based on a charge filed October 7, 1983, by United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America (Charging Party, Union, or URW) against The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company (Respondent or Goodyear).[1]

In the complaint the General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by the conduct of Plant Manager Richard J. Olsen and Shift Supervisor John H. Hoover. On or about September 7, 9, and 13, Olsen allegedly threatened Respondent's employees with loss of benefits, plant closure, and subcontracting work then being performed by Goodyear's employees, in the event the Union was successful in its organizational attempt.[2]

Hoover, it is alleged, on or about September 15 orally threatened Respondent's employees with loss of benefits, plant closure, replacing them on their jobs and rehiring them at the Federal minimum wage in the event the Union was successful in its organizational attempt.[3]

By its answer Respondent admits certain factual matters but denies violating the Act.

The petition was filed on August 18, 1983. That date opens the preelection "critical" period. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 138 NLRB 453 (1962). Pursuant to a stipulation for certification upon consent election approved on September 1, an election by secret ballot was conducted on September 30, under the supervision of the Regional Director for the employees in the following unit stipulated to be appropriate:

[1] All dates are for 1983 unless otherwise indicated.
[2] Complaint par. 7(a).
[3] Complaint par. 7(b).

> All drivers, mechanics, tire and test technicians, janitors and building/groundkeepers employed by the Employer at its facility in San Angelo, Texas, but excluding all office clerical employees, guards working leaders, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The tally of ballots reflected that of approximately 235 eligible voters, all but 1 cast a ballot. None was challenged, and there were no void ballots. Of the 234 valid votes counted, 86 votes were cast for the Union, and 148 were cast against it. On October 7 the Union filed timely objections.

In his November 18 report on objections, the Regional Director overruled some objections and consolidated others (1, 2, 5, 9, 10, and 12) for hearing with the complaint allegations. Objections 1 and 2 are included within the complaint allegations. Objection 5 (the portion not overruled) relates to an announcement by Goodyear that it was dropping a potential 7-day rotation schedule. Objections 9 and 10 pertain to a party given by Goodyear the day of the election, and Objection 12 is that Goodyear failed to comply with the requirements of Excelsior Underwear, 156 NLRB 1236 (1966), regarding timely submission of a list of the names and addresses of eligible voters.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, the Union, and the Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Goodyear, an Ohio corporation with its principal office and headquarters located in Akron, Ohio, operates a proving grounds near San Angelo, Texas, where it is engaged in testing rubber products. During the past 12 months Respondent purchased and received goods valued in excess of $50,000 at its San Angelo, Texas facility directly from points located outside the State of Texas. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The record does not reflect the precise date the Union began its current campaign at Respondent's San Angelo proving grounds, but it seems clear that by May 1983 URW authorization cards were being distributed among employees. By his May 20 memo to the employees, Richard J. Olsen, manager of the proving grounds, acknowledged this fact and cautioned employees to ask themselves some questions before jumping on any band wagon (C.P. Exh. 2).[4]

As the memo not only shows the background tone of the campaign, but also makes reference to the 7-day rotation schedule, the full text is set forth here:

> Dear Fellow Employees:
> Our goal here at the Goodyear Proving Grounds is to provide a work place that all of us can be proud of. Besides the excellent pay and benefits, we have all worked hard to build a team effort in solving and overcoming the daily challenges of operating a facility like ours.
> Unfortunately, sometimes in our efforts to build this team and improve the job security for all of us, we make mistakes, or our communication breaks down. Two such examples involve the 30 minute "lap over" time and the seven day work schedule. Hopefully, in the recent department meetings which Bill Vandiver and I attended, we have answered all the questions concerning these two items. However, if any questions still remain unanswered, please don't hesitate to discuss them with supervisors, Bill Vandiver, or myself.
> We realize there is a union organizing card signing campaign underway, and before you jump on the "band-wagon" and sign a union organization card, ask yourself these questions:
> 1) Can this union guarantee me that my wages and benefits will go up?
> 2) Can this union guarantee me that my wages and benefits won't go down?
> 3) Can the union officials guarantee me that they will solve my problems on the job?
> 4) Can the union guarantee me a wage substitute equal to my present pay if they take us out on strike?
> The answer to each of these important questions is "NO." So let's not get swept up into this union organization drive because when you stop to think about it, you're better off without the union. You don't have to worry about union dues and fines being taken from your paycheck. You can speak for yourself when you have a problem. You don't have to worry about losing your paycheck during a strike. You can count on your job.
> I know we have some problems in our plant. Every plant does. But we've made progress, and we'll continue to make more progress. As you know, we have had a lot of discussions on cost reductions for the Proving Grounds, and a union campaign certainly is an added cost to the Proving Grounds operation. We don't need an outsider to come in here and drive a wedge between us. We can settle our problems by ourselves, without the cost and disruptions a union would bring.

[4] Olsen testified without contradiction that the election of September 30, 1983, was the fourth in 8 years at the San Angelo facility, and that the Excelsior list furnished for the previous election was submitted about April 1982 (Tr. 84–85).

Sincerely,
Rich Olsen
Manager

Olsen testimonially explained that the 7-day rotation schedule for the drivers arose at a brainstorming meeting, held in March 1983 attended by a committee of supervisors and nonsupervisors (Tr. 99–100). One of the ideas the committee generated for possibly improving efficiency related to alternate work schedules. One suggestion on this topic was to have a 6-day workweek, and the other idea was for a 7-day week.[5] A volunteer committee was chosen to pursue the modified workweek topic (Tr. 100). Olsen testified that the matter seemed to languish, so when Bill Vandiver arrived in about May as the new personnel manager, Olsen assigned him the task of getting the volunteer committees together and bringing forth decisions for them (Tr. 100–101). Olsen testified that after Vandiver held his first meeting with the workweek committee, Vandiver reported that the committee recommended that the subject be dropped (Tr. 101). Haston Fields, a driver called as a witness by the URW, testified that he expressed his disapproval of the work schedule changes to Vandiver at the meeting, that the topic was tabled, and the members were told that Vandiver would look into it further (Tr. 78–80). Thereafter, Fields testified, a notice was posted on the bulletin board that the idea for a modified workweek had been dropped (Tr. 80). No copy of the bulletin board notice was offered in evidence. Olsen testified that on receiving Vandiver's report in mid-May he decided to drop the matter and informed supervision of his decision (Tr. 109). He testified that he mentioned the subject in a "25th hour" speech he gave to employees on Wednesday, September 28 (Tr. 92, 99, 109).[6]

The record fails to reflect what campaign events transpired in June and July, but apparently in early August the URW mailed or distributed a legal-size report to the employees ending with a notice of a meeting to be held at a Holiday Inn on Saturday, August 13 (R. Exh. 11). Four of the paragraphs are particularly relevant in this description of the background. They read:

> Many of you have told us that certain members of management have made statements that once you win your election and begin to bargain, "You will start from scratch," "with a blank sheet of paper." This is utter NONSENSE!! NOTHING could be further from the truth. IT IS AGAINST THE LAW FOR THE COMPANY TO TAKE AWAY OR TO THREATEN TO TAKE AWAY ANY OF THE EXISTING BENEFITS THAT YOU NOW HAVE.
> When you have your legal right to bargain by winning your election, you will be in the same position as an established Local Union negotiating a new agreement. You will put the wages that you now have, including, all other benefits, into a written agreement and then make the other improvements that you feel are needed. Remember . . . without a written agreement signed by the Union (YOU) and the company (Goodyear), YOU HAVE NOTHING!!
> Management has demonstrated to you time and again that without a contract they CAN take AWAY benefits, do away with your COLA (cost of living allowance) and change rules, to say nothing about your sick leave benefit, which has been turned into a state of confusion. They harass you and bully you without a reason. Ask yourselves. WHERE CAN I GO FOR HELP? NOWHERE NOW . . . But with a UNION under the U.R.W. you will have all the resources for help with your problems at your disposal.
> We understand that some RUMORS are being circulated at the grounds that the company made some statements about closing the plant if you are successful in forming your UNION. Let me assure you that IT IS AGAINST THE LAW FOR THE COMPANY THROUGH ANY OF ITS OFFICIALS TO THREATEN TO CLOSE THE GROUNDS SIMPLY BECAUSE YOU CHOSE TO ORGANIZE!!! We doubt that the company would be foolish enough to make such threats.

This sparked a reply from Olsen who testified that a number of employees gave copies of the URW's Holiday Inn notice to supervision (Tr. 89). Olsen's letter of August 9, mailed to the employees' homes, reads (R. Exh. 2):

> Dear Fellow Employees:
> After reading the letter the union mailed to employees' homes recently, I'm sure the same basic question came to your mind as it did mine—what is the real goal of the statements they made about threatening to reduce benefits, harassing and bullying employees, sick leave being in a state of confusion, and statements about plant closure? Certainly those comments were not made by any member of management. Nor is management responsible for any rumors such as those alluded to in the union's letter.
> As you know, many unions attempt to convince employees that they are somewhat being abused and need the union's protection. The union's letter seems to me to be just an effort to create need where none exists.

As earlier noted, the URW filed its petition on August 18, and the election agreement, approved by the Acting Regional Director on September 1, scheduled an election date of Friday, September 30. Hours set for the election were 5:45 to 6:45 a.m., and 1:45 to 2:45 p.m. (C.P. Exh. 4.)

By a "special invitation" flyer, the URW invited employees to attend a picnic to be held at nearby Lake Nasworthy on Saturday, September 24 (R. Exh. 3). Presumably the leaflet was distributed within a week or so before the picnic. Apparently between then and the picnic the URW distributed another flyer. This one also undated, bears the headline title of "MORE THAN WAGES." (R. Exh. 4.) Two paragraphs which refer to the subcontracting issue read:

> All things stand right now, the company has the right to sub contract your work or even hire new employees to do the same work for less pay and benefits. They don't need your agreement to do these things.
> Once you are organized however, the issue of sub contracting becomes a subject for negotiations, and you can take the steps you feel are necessary to protect your jobs. Don't you think it would be better to have the legal right to deal with these problems, rather than to live with the threat always hanging over your head?

If Respondent made a specific written reply to the URW's undated flyer, it is not mentioned in the evidence.[7]

As we prepare to turn to the allegations, it may be helpful to note Olsen's uncontradicted testimony that he left the plant shortly after lunch on Wednesday, September 7, for the airport where he boarded a plane and flew to the corporate headquarters at Akron, Ohio. After attending meetings there on Thursday and Friday he arrived back in San Angelo about 8 p.m. on Friday, September 9, but did not go to the plant until Monday morning, September 12 (Tr.111–112).[8] On Tuesday, September 13, Olsen attended a Chamber of Commerce breakfast in San Angelo and arrived for work about 9 a.m. (Tr. 114).

[7] Attached to the Regional Director's November 18, 1983 report on objections are several documents, including three letters from Olsen to employees. The letters are dated August 24, 1983, September 14, 1983, and September 23, 1983. They discuss campaign issues. None was offered as an independent exhibit in this proceeding. No party contends that the letters are of any particular relevance to our issues here.

[8] Respondent did not offer in evidence a copy of Olsen's air travel ticket, motel receipt, or any other documentary evidence concerning the trip.

B. Manager Olsen's Breaktime Remarks

1. The testimony

As earlier noted, paragraph 7(a) of the complaint alleges (with emphasis added) that "On or about September 7, 9, and 13, R. J. Olsen orally threatened" Respondent's employees "with loss of benefits, plant closure, and subcontracting work then being performed" by Respondent's employees in the event the URW was successful in organizing.

Called by the General Counsel as witnesses in support of this allegation were drivers H. L. Braziel and Billy F. Brown. Employed 29 years at Respondent's San Angelo Proving Grounds, Braziel testified that he was working the second shift, 6 a.m. to 2:30 p.m., in September (Tr. 13–14). He testified that at either the 8:20 or 10:35 morning break about Tuesday, September 13,[9] Shift Foreman Earl Kennedy made some remarks to about 25 to 30 employees in the lunchroom (Tr. 15). Braziel testified without contradiction that it was normal for the foreman to hold meetings with employees at breaks (Tr. 19).[10]

Olsen was present and seated in the reverse position on a chair (Tr. 20). Kennedy discussed several topics, unspecified by Braziel, and then remarked that a rumor had been circulating that union cards were being distributed to hold another election (Tr. 19). At that point, according to Braziel, Olsen spoke up by saying, "If this place goes union, I'll close the goddamn gates."[11] Pointing first to himself and then to the employees, Olsen stated that he had a job "tomorrow," but "what about you?" Olsen added that Respondent could farm the work out to outsiders for about a third of what Goodyear was paying the drivers, and that the employees had more to lose than to gain by going union (Tr. 16, 20–21). Braziel testified that, although Olsen made further remarks, he could not describe them because at that point in the meeting Braziel bowed his head while considering these "thanks" of Goodyear for working half his life at all hours in all kinds of weather conditions (Tr. 21, 24). Braziel described the "thanks" as his perception of Goodyear's indifference to his long service, "that it didn't make a damn if I had a paycheck coming next week or if my job was terminated tomorrow or whether the election was over."

Driver R. T. Allard also testified that he was working the second shift in September (Tr. 50). According to Allard, about September 9, at a morning break, Olsen spoke for some 5 to 6 minutes to 25 or 30 employees gathered in the lunchroom (Tr. 50, 58).[12] Allard testified

[9] On cross-examination Braziel admitted that he could not fix the exact date and placed the event as occurring sometime between September 7 and 15 (Tr. 17, 23). Olsen testified that there is only one break before and one break after the lunch period.

[10] Kennedy did not testify.

[12] The name of any foreman present is not given in the record. Although Allard testified in response to a question about September 9, I note that his own phrasing describes the meeting as being 2 to 3 weeks before the election of September 30 (Tr.–59). That time frame would be September 9, 1983 to September 16, 1983. It is unclear whether this meeting is the same or different from the one described by Braziel. The General Counsel makes no contention either way.

that on this occasion Olsen told employees that economic conditions made it an extremely poor time to organize, that unemployment was very high, and that anyone employed should be proud of it. Olsen reminded employees that Goodyear already subcontracted some of the work at $7 an hour, and that such a figure was much cheaper than the amount it cost Goodyear for its own drivers. According to Allard, Olsen stated that he was the only one who had job security, and that if the gates were closed right then he still had a job and the employees would be the ones out in the cold. Olsen added that he felt he could almost guarantee that the gates would be shut if the employees organized, and that there was no possible way employees could be guaranteed that employees would keep the benefits they presently enjoyed (Tr. 51–52).

Driver Billy F. Brown apparently was working the third shift, 2 to 10:30 p.m. in September. He testified that about 7 p.m. on Wednesday, September 7, or Thursday, September 8,[13] Shift Foreman Wilbur Brown (who did not testify) called a meeting at breaktime. After discussing a few items, Brown "introduced" Olsen who made some remarks about the union campaign to the approximately 25 employees present. Olsen reminded everyone of the pending election, said he wanted everyone to vote, remarked that Goodyear did not want the Union, reminded them that Goodyear had been farming out some of the work, that it was cheaper to do so, that Goodyear could do so with all of it if the employees voted in the Union, and warned that the employees had more to lose than to gain by going union (Tr. 26, 28–29).

At the time of the hearing, Olsen had been manager for 2-1/2 years. He was present during the 1982 election campaign, and he testified that he was familiar with the documents of the first two election campaigns (Tr. 84). Olsen testified that Respondent's supervision has received extensive training in the campaigning regarding TIPS—an acronym meaning no threats, interrogation, promises, or spying (Tr. 90).

When asked if he ever utilized breaktime to deliver business messages to employees, Olsen testified, "Not to the best of my recollection." Other than making himself available in his office when employees would have questions, Olsen has never, "to the best of my recollection," gone into the lunchroom and addressed a group of employees on their break. Consistent with the position expressed in his letter of August 9 (R. Exh. 2), Olsen specificially denies making the statements attributed to him (Tr. 88).

The General Counsel requests that an adverse inference be drawn from the failure of Shift Foreman Earl Kennedy to testify (Br. at 5). I shall not draw any inferences. I note that the evidence of both sides could have been aided by additional weight.

[13] Brown testified that he was positive it was a Wednesday or Thursday in "early" September (Tr. 29). As a calendar shows, September 1, 1983, fell on a Thursday. Thus, the first Wednesday and Thursday in September were September 7 and 8, and the second occurrence of such days fell on September 14 and 15. Respondent also contends that Braziel and Allard do not corroborate each other.

2. Conclusions

Notwithstanding certain discrepancies in the testimony, I credit the General Counsel's witnesses. The demeanor of each was satisfactory. This is particularly true as to Braziel whose deep and sincere emotion was obvious as he described Olsen's words.

Respondent contends that Braziel's credibility particularly suffers from his testimony that Shift Foreman Kennedy stated that there was a rumor of union cards being distributed "to go union again," to have another election. Respondent argues that it is "incredulous" that in September any foreman would have made such a comment since the election agreement had been approved on September 1 (Br. at 24). Goodyear's argument would carry more weight if Kennedy had denied making such a remark. There is nothing inherently improbable about Braziel's testimony, for it could well be that the URW continued to distribute cards even after September 1 as a locking-in psychology.

Respondent also contends that Braziel and Allard do not corroborate each other. However, the General Counsel does not contend that they attended the same meeting, nor do they. Although the dates of the meetings they described are rather general, the time frame of early to mid-September allows several potential dates outside the days that Olsen was absent.

Finally, I note that Olsen did not unequivocally deny ever speaking to employees on their breaks in the lunchroom. I do not credit his denial that he made these remarks.

In light of the foregoing, I find that Respondent, through Plant Manager Olsen, threatened employees as alleged in complaint paragraph 7(a) and that by so doing Goodyear violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

C. Supervisor Hoover's Remarks

1. The testimony

About September 15, complaint paragraph 7(b) alleges, John Hoover (admitted to be a statutory supervisor) orally threatened Respondent's employees "with loss of benefits, plant closure, replacing them on their jobs, and rehiring them at the federal minimum wage in the event the Union was successful in its organizational attempts." Test driver Andrew I. Anderson testified as the General Counsel's witness in support of this allegation, and Supervisor Hoover testified as Respondent's witness in denial.

In September Anderson worked the third shift, 2 until 10:30 p.m. At that time he was working in the supervisor's building as part of a voluntary 90-day program to familiarize employees, selected by seniority, with the work of the supervisors (Tr. 31, 42, 47). The building is nicknamed the Sugar Shack (Tr. 31).

Anderson testified that about Thursday, September 15, he was seated at a desk in the Sugar Shack, a small office with dimensions of about 8 feet by 10 feet, with Supervisors Hoover and Bill Wallace (Tr. 31, 43, 45, 48). The men were discussing various topics, and eventually they took up the union subject. At the hearing Anderson could not recall who raised it, but testified that he did not think he had done so (Tr. 44). Supervisor Hoover remarked that, if the Union got in, Goodyear would close down the plant, the employees could lose more than they could gain, that "we could start with a blank sheet of paper," and that Goodyear could rehire employees at minimum wage or could hire new employees at minimum wage. Hoover added that employees could lose what benefits they then enjoyed (Tr. 32). When asked on cross-examination whether Hoover was speaking to him or Supervisor Wallace, Anderson responded by observing that the room was very small and the statements could have been made directly to him or for his benefit, but they were made. "I was bound to hear it." (Tr. 45.)[14]

Supervisor Hoover testified that he listened to Anderson's testimony, that he had been trained not to make any such remarks, and denied making the statements attributed to him by Anderson (Tr. 68–69). Supervisor Wallace did not testify. In the circumstances here, I draw an inference adverse to Goodyear's position from Respondent's failure to call Supervisor Wallace.

Instead of calling Wallace, Respondent called drivers Ray Fisher, James Hall, and Teddy J. Holt who testified that they had never heard Hoover or any supervisor making threats of the nature attributed to Hoover. Such evidence, even if credited, is of extremely slight value. The material question is whether Hoover spoke in the Sugar Shack as described by Anderson. Respondent does not contend that Fisher and Hall were present in the Sugar Shack. Supervisor Wallace was, yet Respondent did not call him as a witness. That other employees never heard Hoover or other supervisors making threats on other occasions may have some remote relevance to the question of whether Hoover spoke in the Sugar Shack as alleged, but the weight of such evidence is so slight as to be just about without any probative value.

2. Conclusions

Anderson's demeanor in testifying was satisfactory, and I credit him. It seems clear that his account of Hoover's remarks runs several topics together. A perfect reconstruction of the remarks very likely would show more context and clarify the transition from topic to topic. On the surface it would seem inconsistent for Hoover to begin with a statement about the plant closing if the Union were selected, then shifting, without a transition context, to what could happen in negotiations or as a result of unionization.[15] But these are attributes of ordinary human recollection. The law does not require employees to possess tape recorder memories.

The plant closing threat is a clear violation of Section 8(a)(1). In a context explaining the negotiating process, a statement that employees "could" lose their present benefits might not be unlawful. Here, however, the tenor of Hoover's brief remarks is that Goodyear would penalize employees if they voted for the Union. I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) as alleged in complaint paragraph 7(b).

IV. PETITIONER'S OBJECTIONS TO THE ELECTION

A. Introduction

The URW's Objections 1 and 2 are covered by the evidence treated under complaint paragraphs 7(a) and (b), and I recommend that these objections be sustained. Objections 5, 9–10, and 12 present additional issues.

B. Manager Olsen's Speech of September 28, 1983

The portion of Objection 5 set for hearing relates to Plant Manager Olsen's speech of September 28 in which he made reference to the 7-day rotation schedule. The Union's contention regarding this topic seems to be that Respondent held up a decision on whether to change to a rotation schedule, and then announced that decision on September 28 in a manner calculated to persuade employees that they did not need a union for management to listen to them.

The initial problem with the URW's position is that driver Haston Fields credibly testified that he observed a bulletin board memo announcing Goodyear's decision to drop the rotation idea.[16] Fields could not recall the date he saw the memo (Tr. 80–81). It would seem to have been at least as far back as early to midsummer, however. Driver Andrew I. Anderson recalled that Olsen stated in his September 28 speech that the 7-day rotation idea was being shelved (Tr. 34–35). I find Anderson's recollection of this point to be unreliable.

Driver Ernest M. Aguero quoted Olsen as saying on September 28 that as the employees did not want the 7-day rotation schedule, "We dropped it." (Tr. 65, emphasis added.)

During cross-examination by the URW, Olsen testified that he mentioned the subject in his September 28 speech as an example of how employees and management can work together without need for a third party (Tr. 110).[17] As Olsen's decision previously had been posted on the bulletin board, and as Aguero's testimony of "dropped," indicating a decision made in the past, is consistent with Olsen's testimony, I shall recommend that Objection 5 be overruled in its entirety.

C. Goodyear's Election Party

Olsen authorized supervisors to hold a party for employees about 6:30 p.m. on September 30, following the [14] On redirect examination Anderson testified that Hoover was "more or less" pointed in his direction (Tr. 48). That adds little, however, for the evidence does not describe the location of the three individuals in the small room in relation to each other.

[15] Anderson's testimony about rehiring employees at the minimum wage supports a finding, which I make, that Hoover said Goodyear could reduce the wages of current employees to the Federal minimum in the event the employees voted in the Union.

[16] Driver R. T. Allard recalled that the announcement came from Personnel Manager Vandiver at some meeting held at some unspecified time (Tr. 53).

[17] When Respondent sought to introduce written excerpts from the text of Olsen's September 29, 1983 speech, the URW objected unless the entire written text be offered in order to show the full context and nature of the limited excerpts (Tr. 94–97, 103). I sustained the objection. A credibility issue was raised concerning whether Olsen referred to the excerpted topics elsewhere in his speech. The rule of completeness supports my ruling. Fed.R.Evid.106. Moreover, Respondent did not offer to produce the entire text for the URW's inspection. The excerpts are included in the rejected exhibit file as R. Exhs. 8 and 9.

close of the polls (Tr. 107, Olsen). The issues raised by Objections 9 and 10 are whether supervisors invited employees before the polls closed and whether a map was posted by Respondent before the polls closed.

Driver Anderson testified that he observed a map, showing directions to the San Angelo Boat Club at Lake Nasworthy, posted on the lunchroom bulletin board around 6 to 6:30 p.m. (Tr. 36–39; C.P. Exh. 5.) Anderson testified that on September 30, at a time subsequent to Anderson's observing the map, Supervisor Hoover invited him to the party and told him he would be paid for the time (Tr. 36, 39). Anderson testified that he voted about 2 p.m. (Tr. 40). This establishes no objectionable conduct inasmuch as all events occurred after the polls closed.

Driver Allard testified that he observed the map posted around 10:30 a.m. on election day (Tr. 55), and Driver Aguero testified that he observed it on the bulletin board about 12:30 p.m. (Tr. 66). Allard testified that "supervisor" J. D. Martin invited him to the party (Tr. 55), and Aguero testified that an unidentified "supervisor" likewise invited him (Tr. 66). There is no pleading, evidence, or stipulation establishing that Martin and the other "supervisor" are statutory supervisors or otherwise agents of Goodyear.

Olsen testified that he did his best to assure that the bulletin boards were kept free of campaign literature (Tr. 86–87). That may well be, but it does not directly contradict the positive evidence that the map was in fact posted over several hours on election day.

However, the fact that the map was posted does not show objectionable conduct by Goodyear. The map is unsigned, and there is no evidence that an agent of Goodyear posted it. I shall recommend that Objections 9 and 10 be overruled.

D. The Excelsior List Objection

Objection 12 is that Goodyear failed to submit the list of eligible voters and their addresses in a timely manner, and that the URW did not receive the list until September 13.

The parties stipulated that the URW received a copy of the list on Tuesday, September 13, 1983, at 9 a.m. (Tr. 81–82; C.P. Exh. 1.)[18] The URW contends that Respondent's failure to comply with the 7-day deadline established by the Board in Excelsior Underwear, 156 NLRB 1236 (1966), is objectionable as a matter of law.

As the Board recently noted, the Excelsior rule requires an employer, within 7 days after the approval of an election agreement, or after an order directing an election, to submit to the Regional Director a list of the names and addresses of the eligible voters. Such list is then forwarded to the union. Red Carpet Building Maintenance Corp., 263 NLRB 1285 fn. 3 (1982). In this case, Goodyear furnished the list, due no later than Thursday, September 8, a little over 4 days late—on the morning of the fifth day after the due date. This gave the URW 16 days' use of the list before election day. Correspondence between Goodyear and Region 16 reflects that Respondent deliberately delivered the list to the Union without regard to the 7-day requirement on the asserted basis that the only material time requirement is that the Union have the list for 10 days prior to the election (R. Exh. 5; C.P. Exh. 3).

The Board has found that a 1-day delay in delivery of the list to a Regional Director constituted substantial compliance with Excelsior where it appeared that the delay wa s caused by the Postal Service, the Board's Regional Office, or factors other than a design by the employer. See, for example, Chance Collar Co., 265 NLRB 1213 (1982). Here, however, Respondent intentionally delayed delivery of the Excelsior list.[19] I find Respondent did not substantially comply with the Excelsior rule, and that, by its deliberate delay, Respondent committed objectionable conduct. I therefore shall recommend that Objection 12 be sustained.

E. Summary of Findings

Based on the findings sustaining Objections 1, 2, and 12, I shall recommend that the election held September 30, 1983, be set aside, that the Regional Director conduct a second election to determine the question of representation, and that the Regional Director include in the notice of election the Lufkin Rule[20] paragraph set forth below:

Notice To All Voters

> The election conducted on September 30, 1983, was set aside because the National Labor Relations Board found that certain conduct of the Employer interfered with employees' exercise of a free and reasoned choice. Therefore, a new election will be held in accordance with the terms of this notice of election. All eligible voters should understand that the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, gives them the right to cast their ballots as they see fit, and protects them in the exercise of this right, free from interference by any of the parties.

I further recommend that Objections 5, 9, and 10 be overruled.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Goodyear is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The URW is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By threatening its employees with loss of benefits, subcontracting of all work, plant closure, or reducing wage rates to the Federal minimum in the event the employees voted in the URW, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[18] Olsen testified that there were only a few changes from the 1982 list with about 2 names being added and 10 names deleted which were not on the 1982 list (Tr. 85–86). Such testimony is irrelevant to the issue of compliance with the obligation to furnish a list of names and addresses of the voters.

[19] Region 16 also apparently received a copy of the list about September 13, 1983 (C.P. Exh. 1).

4. Goodyear's unlawful conduct affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

5. By engaging in the objectionable conduct described in part IV of this Decision, Respondent has interfered with its employees' freedom of choice in the election conducted September 30, 1983.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and the entire record, I issue the following recommended[21]

ORDER

The Respondent, The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, San Angelo, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening its employees with loss of benefits, subcontracting of all work, plant closure, or reducing wage rates to the Federal minimum in the event the employees vote in the URW or any other labor organization.[22]

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at San Angelo, Texas Proving Ground copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[23] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 16, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election held September 13, 1983, in Case 16–RC–8611 is set aside and the case is remanded to the Regional Director for the purpose of conducting a new election, and that the Lufkin Rule paragraph, quoted in part IV, E, of this decision, be included in the Notice of Second Election to be issued by the Regional Director, and that Objections 5, 9, and 10 are overruled.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had the opportunity to present their evidence and cross-examine witnesses, the National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act, and the Board has ordered us to post this notice and to comply with its provisions.

The National Labor Relations Act gives you, as employees, these rights.

To engage in self-organization
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of you own choice
To engage in activities together for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection
To refrain from the exercise of any or all such activities.

Accordingly, we give you these assurances.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with loss of benefits, subcontracting of all work, plant closure, or reduction of wage rates to the Federal minimum in the event you vote in the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you with respect to your rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

THE GOODYEAR TIRE AND RUBBER COMPANY

[21] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[22] The phrase "or any other labor organization" is appropriately included. Riley-Beaird, Inc., 259 NLRB 1339, 1372 fn. 144 (1982); Elk Brand Mfg. Co., 253 NLRB 1038 (1981).

[23] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Yellow Freight Systems, Inc. and Frederick Foster.

30 November 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 3 May 1984 Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached decision. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a letter in support of these exceptions. The General Counsel and the Respondent filed briefs in answer to the Charging Party's exceptions and in support of the judge's decision.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, and for the reasons set forth in my dissenting opinion in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), I would not defer to the award of the arbitration panel.

The panel's award, issued shortly after the close of the 2-hour arbitration hearing, consists in its entirety of the following two sentences:

> Based on the facts presented and the testimony submitted, case of the Union is denied. The discharge of Mr. Fred Foster was for just cause.

There is no showing that the unfair labor practice issue, i.e., whether the Charging Party was discharged because he asserted certain rights under the collective-bargaining agreement,[1] was presented to or considered by, much less resolved by, the arbitration panel. In the absence of such a showing, I would not defer to the arbitration award.

[1] The Respondent also filed a statement opposing the Charging Party's 11 July 1984 request that a transcript of proceedings before the Occupational Safety and Health Administration be received in evidence.

[2] The Charging Party has requested oral argument and that the transcript of a hearing held on 10 and 11 May 1984 before the Occupational Safety and Health Administration be received as evidence. These requests are hereby denied, as the record, the exceptions, and the briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[1] See NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 104 S.Ct. 1505 (1984).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES F. MORTON, Administrative Law Judge. After the hearing had closed in this case, counsel for the General Counsel filed a motion to withdraw the complaint, discussed in detail below. The Charging Party opposed the motion. I shall grant the motion for the following reasons.

The complaint which issued on June 30, 1983 (all dates are in 1983 unless stated otherwise), alleged that the Charging Party, Frederick Foster, had been discharged on April 6 by Yellow Freight Systems, Inc. (Respondent) because he asserted certain rights under the collective-bargaining agreement Respondent had with Teamsters and Chauffeurs Local 443 a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Union). Respondent filed its answer which averred, inter alia, that the Board should defer to an arbitration award which upheld Respondent's discharge of the Charging Party. At the hearing, the General Counsel, relying on the Board's holding in American Freight Systems, 264 NLRB 126 (1982), contended that deferral was inappropriate as the arbitration panel had not considered the unfair labor practice issue raised by the allegation of the complaint that Respondent's discharge of Foster violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). After the hearing closed, the Board issued its decision in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), which overruled the holdings in American Freight, supra and in earlier cases. The Board, in Olin, held that an arbitrator will have adequately considered the unfair labor practice issue if the contract issue is factually parallel to the unfair labor practice issue and if the arbitrator was generally presented with those facts. The General Counsel, after weighing the impact of Olin on the facts in the instant case, concluded that there was merit to Respondent's deferral defense and, on the basis, moved to withdraw the complaint. The Charging Party's views thereon were solicited. He opposed deferral but did not contest the rationale underlying the General Counsel's motion to withdraw. Thus, the Charging Party's opposition was based on his assertion that, in the proceeding before me, perjured testimony was given respecting the merits of the case itself.

In order to rule on the General Counsel's motion, it is necessary to make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The pleadings establish that Respondent is a corporation of the State of Indiana, that it is engaged in the business of providing transportation services, and that its operations annually meet the applicable Board standard for the assertion of its jurisdiction.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The pleadings further establish that the Union is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE PROCEDURE ISSUE

The essential facts are not in material dispute.

Respondent has a truck terminal in Milford, Connecticut, and has a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union covering the drivers employed there.

The Charging Party, Foster, has worked at the terminal as a driver beginning August 1981. In 1982 he and other full-time drivers protested Respondent's assigning to them a certain truck they considered unsafe, tractor B7696. The terminal manager orally agreed then not to assign tractor B7696 to the regular drivers. It appears that in 1983 a new terminal manager was hired and that, in early 1983, Foster, more than once and without further incident, rejected assignments to operate tractor B7696.

On April 6, Foster was operating a truck which became disabled because of defective brakes. A relief driver who had been operating tractor B7696 was instructed to bring it to Foster so that he could use it to complete his route. Foster called the dispatcher and objected to driving tractor B7696; he reminded the dispatcher of the oral understanding that had been reached in 1982 with the previous terminal manager. The dispatcher informed him that the new terminal manager had decided, a month or two previously, that any driver who refused to operate a truck that management deemed safe would be considered to be "an automatic quit." Foster was also told, in effect, that Respondent was satisfied that tractor B7696 was safe to operate. Foster then began to drive it. About 10 minutes later and 6 miles distant, however, he stopped and telephoned the dispatcher. He stated that he had problems with the brakes and with other operating aspects of that vehicle. The dispatcher told him the complaints he had were not valid and that, if he refused to drive that truck, he would be considered a voluntary quit. Foster declined to operate it and was discharged.

Foster filed a grievance with the Union to protest his discharge, relying on contractual language that permitted a driver to refuse to operate unsafe equipment. The matter went to arbitration. The arbitration hearing was held on April 20 and lasted about 2 hours. Foster testified before me that he related to the arbitration panel, in substance, the same testimony he gave before me, as summarized above. Respondent called a union official as its witness and he related that he also had testified before the arbitration panel as to how Foster told him he drove tractor B7696 on April 6. After the hearing on Foster's case was completed before the arbitration panel on April 20, it issued later that same day an award which, in its entirety, read:

> Based on the facts presented and the testimony submitted, case of the Union is denied. The discharge of Mr. Fred Foster was for just cause.

It is evident, under the Olin rationale, that the arbitration panel has considered the statutory issue as it was presented with generally the same facts on which the alleged unfair labor practice was predicated. It is clear, too, that the other deferral criteria set out in Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), have been met. The opposition by Foster to the General Counsel's motion is not addressed to any of those concerns but instead would have me render a separate judgment on the merits based on my view of the evidence. I am not permitted to do so, as there is no basis on which it can be found that the arbitration award was "palpably wrong."

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. It will effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act to defer to the April 20 arbitration award and to grant the posthearing motion by counsel for the General Counsel to withdraw the complaint in its entirety.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[1]

ORDER

The General Counsel's motion to withdraw the complaint in its entirety is granted.

---

[1] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

30 November 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 3 September 1982 Administrative Law Judge Arline Pacht issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

We agree with the judge's findings that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by revising employee Rosen's work schedule effective 8 September 1980 or by issuing a written warning to her on 13 October 1980. We also agree with the judge's findings that the adverse personnel actions taken against Rosen after she filed a grievance over the warning were not motivated by Rosen's union activities and therefore were not violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1). Contrary to the judge, however, we further find that Rosen's conduct in filing and pursuing the grievance did not constitute protected concerted activity and therefore the adverse personnel actions taken by the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1).

The relevant facts, as more fully set forth in the judge's decision, are as follows. Rosen was employed for about 6 years as a part-time clerk-typist in the Department of Respiratory Therapy, which was headed by Mazzacane starting in July 1980. On 13 October 1980 Rosen received a written warning from Mazzacane for "leaving work without authorization." Rosen immediately complained about the warning to Mazzacane, advising him that she was doing so pursuant to the Respondent's internal grievance procedure[2] and claiming that the warning was harassment for her union activities.[3] In the course of processing her grievance, Rosen also protested to several of the Respondent's officials that Mazzacane had committed certain technical violations of the grievance procedure itself.[4] Ultimately, on 13 January 1981, Executive Vice President Beeman advised Rosen in writing that the warning would be removed from her personnel file. He also stated that the grievance procedure had been reviewed and would be "further clarified" in the near future. On 17 February 1981 Rosen received from Mazzacane her first negative performance appraisal. Other adverse personnel actions followed, including a second negative performance appraisal on 30 July 1981,[5] before Rosen submitted her resignation from work effective 9 October 1981.

The judge found that Rosen's conduct in pursuing her grievance was protected concerted activity. Finding NLRB v. Interboro Contractors[6] applicable even though no collective-bargaining agreement was involved, and citing Alleluia Cushion Co.,[7] she found that Rosen's protest "was designed, at least in part, to vindicate rights guaranteed to all employees, by Section 7 of the Act" and that Rosen "set in motion a process which could only inure to the benefit of her co-workers." The judge went on to find that many of the subsequent adverse personnel actions taken against Rosen were part of a continuing pattern of retaliation for the manner in which she pursued her grievance.

Contrary to the judge, we find that Rosen's pursuit of her grievance did not constitute concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act. Following the judge's decision herein, the Board issued Meyers Industries,[8] in which it overruled Alleluia Cushion and its progeny and held:[9]

> In general, to find an employee's activity to be "concerted," we shall require that it be engaged in with or on the authority of other em-

[1] The Respondent and the General Counsel have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The grievance procedure, as set forth in the employee handbook, consists of three steps: at step 1 the employee must present the complaint to his or her supervisor; at step 2 the employee may present the complaint in writing to the department head; and at step 3 the employee may take the matter to the administrator, whose decision is final and binding.

[3] It is undisputed that Rosen was a known, active supporter of the Union both before and after the representation election on 8 September 1980, which the Union lost.

[4] Because Mazzacane at that time was Rosen's supervisor as well as the department head, there apparently was some confusion as to meeting the requirements of steps 1 and 2.

[5] The judge inadvertently erred in referring to February and July 1980 rather than 1981.

> ployees, and not solely by and on behalf of the employee himself.

Thus, the Board will no longer presume that an individual employee's activity is concerted simply because the matter complained about is of interest to other employees. Moreover, although the Board has held that an individual employee's filing of a grievance based on a collective-bargaining agreement constitutes protected concerted activity—see, e.g., Interboro Contractors, above—the Board has not extended its holding to an individual employee's filing of a grievance pursuant to an employer's noncontractual grievance procedure. Thus, in Alcan Cable,[10] the Board specifically held:[11]

> An employee's action in filing an internal complaint cannot constitute concerted activity if, as Lawson's action undisputedly was, it is done solely by and on behalf of the employee himself and is not done in reliance on any collective-bargaining agreement. See Snap-On Tools Corp., 207 NLRB 238 (1973).

In the instant case, the record establishes that Rosen's grievance was, at bottom, an individual and purely personal complaint, and that Rosen's pursuit of the grievance did not constitute concerted activity.[12] Rosen challenged a written warning directed at herself alone. As found by the judge, the written warning arose out of a misunderstanding between Rosen and her supervisor and was not motivated by her union activities. Further, although Rosen also, in the course of processing her grievance, protested certain technical aspects of the Respondent's internal grievance procedure, no other employee joined her protests. Thus, in accordance with Meyers Industries and Alcan Cable, we find that Rosen's complaints were not "concerted" because they were made solely by and on behalf of herself and not in reliance on any collective-bargaining agreement. Therefore, we further find that any adverse personnel actions taken against Rosen in retaliation for her grievance activities were not violative of Section 8(a)(1).[13] Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[12] We note that the U.S. Supreme Court in NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 104 S.Ct. 1505 at fn. 6 (1984), in sustaining the Board's "Interboro doctrine," also recognized the Board's distinction in Meyers Industries, above, between cases based on the existence of a collective-bargaining agreement—e.g., Interboro—and those that are not—e.g., the instant case.

[13] Although the finding that the Respondent's actions were retaliatory makes Rosen's situation a sympathetic one, we note that the Board in Meyers Industries stated the following in response to a similar concern (268 NLRB 493, 499):

> We do not believe, however, that Section 7, framed as it was to legitimize and protect group action engaged in by employees for their mutual aid or protection, was intended to encompass the case of individual activity presented here . . . . [W]e are not empowered to correct all immorality or even illegality arising under the total fabric of Federal and state laws.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ARLINE PACHT, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard in Hartford, Connecticut, on February 1, 2, and 3, and in New Haven, Connecticut, on March 15 and 16, 1982. Pursuant to charges filed on February 17 and September 21, 1981, as amended on October 27, 1981, a consolidated complaint issued on November 4, 1981, alleging that the Hospital of St. Raphael (the Hospital or Respondent) unlawfully discriminated against its employee, Sandra Rosen, for engaging in union and other concerted protected activity in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondent's timely answers deny the allegations of the complaint as amended.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. On the record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and after due consideration of the briefs filed by counsel for the General Counsel and for Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION: THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER AND THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent, a Connecticut corporation with an office and place of business in New Haven, Connecticut, has been at all material times engaged as a health care institution operating a hospital which provides in-patient and out-patient medical and professional health care services. During the calendar year ending December 31, 1980, in the course and conduct of its business operations, Respondent purchased and received at its New Haven facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State and derived gross revenues in excess of $250,000. Accordingly, I find that Respondent is now and has been at all times material an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

New England Health Care Employees Union, District 1199 (the Union) is now, and has been at all times material a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ISSUES

The issues presented in this case are whether: (1) Respondent engaged in the following conduct in order to discriminate against Sandra Rosen because of her union or otherwise concerted protected activity: (a) revised her work schedule on September 8, 1980; (b) issued her a written warning on October 13, 1980; (c) issued adverse performance appraisals to her on February 5 and July 30, 1980; (d) denied her an annual merit increase in February 1981; and (e) denied her request for a revised summer work schedule, and (2) these measures, together with other actions involving criticism of her performance as an employee, compelled Rosen to resign and thereby constituted a constructive discharge in violation of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Sandra Rosen was first employed by the Hospital in February 1974. For approximately 6 years prior to her termination on October 9, 1981, she served as a part-time clerk in the Hospital's respiratory therapy department. During her first 5 years in this position, under then Department Chief Peter Pagliari, Rosen maintained an unblemished work record and regularly received annual merit increases. Pagliari evidently valued her efforts, for in January 1980 he gave her a glowing evaluation commenting that "she has the ability to handle almost anything that is assigned." In October of the same year, she received a 17-percent pay raise as part of a hospitalwide program designed to revise job descriptions and upgrade wages.

B. Rosen's Union Activity

The record shows that Rosen became involved in union activity as early as December 1979 when Local 1199 began an organizational drive among the service employees at the Hospital. From March, when the Union's campaign surfaced and quickened, through September when the election was held, Rosen was among the staunchest of union advocates. She distributed leaflets at hospital entrances and in the cafeteria between shifts, served as spokesperson for the group of employees who requested recognition for the Local, posted union notices on the departmental bulletin board, was one of several speakers at the Union's rally on August 15 shortly before the election, attended the meeting at which the list of eligible employees was devised, and served as an observer for the Union at the September election. Her efforts on behalf of the Union did not go unnoticed, as several of Respondent's witnesses conceded.

The Hospital responded to the Union's drive with a countercampaign of its own. At considerable expense, a management consulting firm was hired which had among its responsibilities the preparation of numerous antiunion letters which were issued to employees. Although the letters were not alleged by the Union to be unlawful, they nevertheless unmistakably revealed Respondent's antipathy to unionism and to the value of collective bargaining by outside interventionists as a means of redressing employee problems. Telling evidence of antiunion bias may also be found in an admission reluctantly offered by John Bimonte, Respondent's vice president of human resources,[1] that he instructed his staff to be wary of hiring "union plants," and from a comment to Rosen by the current chief of the respiratory therapy department, John Mazzacane, that "people must be desperate to go to a union."[2]

The Union lost the election held on September 8, 1980, and thereafter filed no objections as to Respondent's conduct during the organizational drive. Even after the Union's defeat, however, and throughout the duration of her employment, Rosen continued to wear the Union's button as a sign of her commitment.

1. Alleged harassment

In June 1980, John Mazzacane, formerly head of the school of respiratory therapy, became acting chief of the respiratory therapy department, replacing Pagliari who left for a new post. In August, he became chief. Under Mazzacane's administration, Rosen suffered a series of adverse employment actions which ultimately led her to quit her job. These are the source of the unfair labor practice allegations in this case.

a. Schedule change

The first conflict between Mazzacane and Rosen arose over her work schedule. Under Pagliari, Rosen worked four 5-hour days per week: Monday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday. Her day usually commenced at 10 a.m., although her starting time was variable.

Rosen testified that on August 24, without prior notice, Mazzacane informed her that her schedule would be altered effective September 8 to a 5-day workweek. On August 25, Rosen sent Mazzacane a memo in which she stated she would accept the work schedule revision, but only under protest.

Respondent's account of this matter varies widely from that offered by the General Counsel. Mazzacane related that prior to becoming chief, he and others in the department were troubled by Rosen's erratic hours and were never sure of precisely when she would be available. Therefore, he determined to regularize her work schedule. He chose the hours of 1 to 5 p.m. out of a desire to have the clerk-typist available at times which suited his own work schedule, to insure coverage of the telephone during a shift change between 3 and 3:30 p.m., and to make way for a second part-time clerk typist. Mazzacane stated that he told Rosen early in July that it would be necessary to stabilize her work schedule. In the latter part of July, he was more definite, telling Rosen that he wished her to work a 5-day workweek from 1 to 5 p.m. On August 1, shortly before Rosen left for a 2-week vacation, Mazzacane further maintained that he told her the new schedule would take effect on September 8. In an effort to accommodate Rosen's interests somewhat, Mazzacane agreed to a 12-to-4 shift for her. He subsequently confirmed the schedule change by memo dated August 8. Since Rosen was on leave at that time, she could not have received the memo until she returned to work about August 20.

[1] Bimonte served as director of personnel in 1980 and 1981 when the events giving rise to the instant complaint occurred.

[2] Rosen impressed me as a sincere witness, who testified in a forthright manner, whereas Mazzacane frequently offered shifting and inconsistent explanations for his actions and of events. Therefore, I am inclined to credit Rosen's assertion that Mazzacane made such a remark.

Minutes taken at a supervisory staff meeting held on August 6 indicate that Mazzacane announced inter alia that "the new schedule was discussed with clerk-typist and will begin soon. It will provide employees with coverage 5 days/week. The same hours each day. In addition we will try to expand that position to 40 hours." On August 22, the entire department was notified by memo that Rosen would commence a 5-day schedule from 12 to 4 p.m. on September 8.

Documentary proof entered into the record of this case provides a convenient means of resolving the dispute as to when Rosen was advised of a schedule change. Turning first to the August 6 memo, I note that it refers only to the prospect of 5-day workweek for the clerk-typist; it makes no mention of specific hours or of the effective date for the new schedule. Although the memo of August 8 is more specific as to the details of the schedule change, this memo could not have been transmitted to Rosen until she returned from vacation. From this I infer that, although Mazzacane probably mentioned the possibility of a 5-day workweek to Rosen, she was not given notice of the express hours she would work or the date that the new schedule would be implemented until about August 20 when she returned from her vacation.

b. Warning

The next clash between Mazzacane and Rosen occurred when she left work an hour early on October 10. Here, too, the parties' accounts of this contretemps differ sharply. Rosen testified that on October 3 she asked Mazzacane how she should deal with medical appointments previously scheduled for her children on October 13 and 17 which conflicted with her new working hours. Mazzacane allegedly assured her that she could leave work an hour early on these occasions. Accordingly, on October 10, she punched out at 3 p.m.

Mazzacane acknowledged that, approximately a week before October 10, Rosen asked him in a general way, what procedure she should follow if prescheduled medical appointments conflicted with her new work schedule. He denied that she referred to any specific dates. Mazzacane stated that, during the same conversation, Rosen urged him to permit her to resume her former working hours. The following Friday afternoon, when Mazzacane was unable to locate Rosen, he feared that she was reverting to her former irregular work pattern without authorization, and issued a written warning to her on October 13. This was the first disciplinary measure she had received throughout the course of her employment with Respondent.

Rosen's reaction to the warning was immediate: she accused Mazzacane of harassing her for union activity and filed a written grievance the same day.[3] Rosen pursued her grievance zealously through each step of the grievance procedure. In an effort to clarify the process, particularly with regard to the distinction between step 1 and 2,[4] Rosen telephoned, met with, and wrote memos to various members of the administrative hierarchy including Personnel Director Bimonte, Departmental Co-Director Dr. Sekand, the Hospital's Associate Administrator Skopac, and finally Respondent's Executive Vice President Beeman. Her memos forcefully set forth her position, adamantly denied Mazzacane's version of the incident, and accused him of issuing the warning as union harassment, repeatedly criticized the handling of her grievance as violative of hospital policy and requested that the warning be rescinded. Ultimately, on January 13, 1981, Beeman issued a written decision in which he ruled that the warning would be rescinded. His decision was based on "a review of the events . . . leading up to the invalid warning together with a review of your work at the Hospital." Further, Beeman wrote that "the Grievance Procedure process which was followed in this case was also reviewed, and will be further clarified by Mr. Skopac in the near future."

c. Performance appraisals

In accordance with the Hospital's evaluation system, Rosen received written employee performance appraisals on February 17 and again on July 30, 1980. In contrast to Pagliari's very favorable assessment of October 1980, Mazzacane's February evaluation found Rosen severely deficient in each of the areas identified on the form. Specifically, Mazzacane noted that her typewritten work was unacceptable in that it contained frequent errors, that her productive output was poor, that she was unwilling to handle difficult and undesirable assignments, had occasional conflicts with her supervisor and "is extremely defensive making implausible excuses for errors." As a result of this negative appraisal, Rosen failed to receive a merit pay increase.

Mazzacane testified at length about shortcomings in Rosen's performance which he believed warranted his harsh appraisal. Numerous letters, memos, and other materials which Rosen typed were introduced in evidence to demonstrate alleged errors or omissions. For example, Mazzacane testified with respect to a memo to another department chief he had prepared as one of his first administrative acts. Although the final copy of the memo did not contain errors, he nevertheless was concerned that erasures might be evident on the original copy. Mazzacane therefore opted not to send the original and, instead, sent his colleague a clean xeroxed copy which did not reveal the corrections. Mazzacane further testified that because Rosen failed to type one page of a three-page memo, he had to type it himself. Rosen denied any connection with this memo, recalling specifically that, when it was posted, she remarked to a coworker that the word "opinion" on the second page had been typed as "opion," a mistake she would have corrected. Mazzacane offered another memo, typed in January 1981, to show that even on a corrected version, Rosen had omitted certain phrases. On returning the corrected copy of this memo to Rosen, Mazzacane circled in red the portions of the letter which were omitted. According to Mazzacane, Rosen remonstrated that he should not encircle matters in red since it made it impossible for her to correct them. Mazzacane responded that he did not wish such a large omission to be inserted, but rather wanted the entire page to be redone. Kalkreuth, having cosigned the February evaluation, concurred with Mazzacane's assessment of Rosen's typing skills. He estimated that during the August to February evaluation period, during a bad week, out of approximately 20 documents, 5 to 6 might have to be returned to Rosen for correction; while during a good week, only 2 or 3 might need revision.

[3] The Hospital's employee handbook describes a three-step grievance procedure: step 1 calls for presentation of a written grievance to the employee's supervisor who is to provide a decision within 2 working days; step 2 provides that thereafter the complaint shall be forwarded to the department head who shall issue a decision within 1 week; at step 3 the matter goes forward to the hospital administrator who is required to issue a final decision in writing "as soon as possible."

[4] Some of the confusion in processing Rosen's grievance arose from the fact that Mazzacane was both her supervisor and the departmental head, thereby obscuring the distinction between step 1 and step 2.

Mazzacane also testified as to Rosen's purported inability to complete her work accurately. For instance, he asserted that she failed to identify and record in her notes the salient topics at departmental meetings. As a consequence, he was compelled to completely revise minutes of a September 30 meeting. On October 23, Mazzacane sent Rosen a memo pointing out that certain monthly reports titled "Efficiency Work Sheets" contained errors. The memo stated that henceforth the reports first were to be submitted to Kalkreuth. Rosen did not deny making these errors. Mazzacane also testified that because Rosen failed to fill in three pieces of information on forms designated "Retrospective Analysis," a report which identifies the various kinds of treatments administered to patients in the department, he had to enter the data himself. He acknowledged that, after bringing this matter to Rosen's attention in November 1980, he had no further problems with the manner in which she completed these forms. Nevertheless, on January 16, 3 days after Rosen's grievance was resolved in her favor, Mazzacane complained in a written memo to Kalkreuth that the analyses were not being submitted in a timely manner. This was the first occasion that Rosen was advised that the reports were considered late.

A significant portion of Rosen's work involved filing various computer printouts which were received on a weekly or monthly basis. Mazzacane testified that he found the sheets filed so that the printed material was folded inside out or upside down, making them difficult to read. Contrary to Mazzacane's assertion that he brought this problem to Rosen's attention on at least six occasions between August and January 1981, she recalled that the first such criticism occurred about January 20.

Mazzacane also asked Rosen to prepare a catalog of reference books and alleged that he gave her a sample to follow which showed book titles listed in numerical order. Rosen denied having been given any sample and simply prepared a catalog in which the books were not listed sequentially. She added that, when she turned in her work product, Mazzacane merely thanked her and never registered any dissatisfaction. Moreover, she pointed out that, several weeks prior to her termination, he asked her to add other books to those previously listed.

Mazzacane further charged Rosen with responsibility for incorrectly assembling forms used by the billing department. Normally, such forms were preprinted and automatically assembled. However, when the supply of such forms was exhausted, Mazzacane requested a number of staff members to help assemble them manually. Five identical pages in each form had to be carefully stapled together so that billing entries appeared in the same grid on each of the five pages. Mazzacane testified that after the billing department rejected many of the forms because charges appeared in inappropriate grids, he asked each staff member with the exception of Rosen to initial the forms they were assembling. Thereafter, when forms were returned which were not initialed, Mazzacane concluded that Rosen was responsible for the assembling errors. Mazzacane observed that Rosen resented having to undertake this task, and faulted him for failing to order a sufficient supply before they ran out. Kalkreuth, whose desk was adjacent to Rosen's, observed that she had difficulty in properly aligning the forms.

Also in the month of January 1981, Mazzacane asked Rosen to chart the attendance records for department members for the previous year. On reviewing her work, Mazzacane found approximately 70 errors and spent some 3 hours preparing a corrected version. Rosen acknowledged her errors on this project and on one or two other pieces of work she did in one week in January but attributed her poor performance to the stress she felt at awaiting a final decision on her grievance and also because of concern with certain personal problems.

Mazzacane described other problems he perceived in Rosen's peformance. For example, he faulted her ability to distinguish between important and less important assignments. To resolve this problem, he established a priority system designating each piece of work as having either first, second, or third priority. He instructed her to sandwich telephone calls in between her work if they did not interrupt and interfere with her productivity. Further, he testified that he tried on two occasions to have her maintain his appointment book but withdrew this task when she did not perform the job to his satisfaction. He alleged that Rosen misfiled catalogs from various supply houses and failed to file certain forms titled "Unreported Therapy Reports" in chronological order. Additionally, Mazzacane testified that others in the department expressed to him their discontent with Rosen's performance. Thus, Mazzacane alleged that a former day-shift supervisor, Dorrance Johnson, complained to him about Rosen's irregular hours; that she failed to page personnel properly or to repage them; and that she neglected to complete priority work promptly. However, when Johnson was called by the Respondent to testify he flatly contradicted Mazzacane. His dissatisfaction lay not at all with Rosen's performance. Rather, Johnson's concern was with the fact that no telephone dispatcher was available throughout the day. He pointed out that a high percentage of telephone calls to the department were of an urgent nature and commended Rosen's responsible manner in handling the dispatching functions. He made no mention of Rosen's alleged failure to complete priority work.

Mazzacane also testified that Dorothy Freel, formerly a clinical coordinator and then head of the school of respiratory therapy, on one occasion returned some material to him for correction which Rosen had typed. When Respondent called Freel as a witness, however, she expressed satisfaction with Rosen's work. In fact, Rosen typed not only departmental materials for her but prepared private term papers as well. In addition, Freel found nothing wanting in Rosen's services as registrar to the school. Freel expressed approval of Rosen's revised work schedule since its regularity helped her to plan her own work accordingly.

d. The July evaluation

Although Rosen should have been reevaluted within 3 months of the February appraisal in accordance with hospital procedure, Kalkreuth, then her immediate supervisor, did not prepare another evaluation until July 30. At this time, he was as critical of her work as Mazzacane had been. Thus, he noted that, although her typing improved during this period, it continued to be of an unacceptable quality. He further commented that she completed priority work in a timely manner but that her productivity suffered. At the hearing, Kalkreuth did not provide any documentary support for this evaluation other than to point to one memo which Rosen typed on a full rather than half sheet of paper as he had instructed. The only samples of Rosen's alleged poor typing during this second evaluation period were introduced into evidence by Mazzacane. In two instances, letters to sales representatives contained misspellings, but were mailed out over Mazzacane's signature anyway. As a result of the July evaluation, Rosen again was denied a pay increase.

e. Denial of revised summer schedule

Each summer prior to 1981, Rosen was permitted to work an earlier schedule than she did during the balance of the year. In June 1981, Rosen requested Kalkreuth's permission to revise her summer hours so that she could commence working at 11 a.m. rather than at noon. Kalkreuth and Mazzacane both refused to consent. Initially, Kalkreuth's response was that she would have to choose between her family and her job. However, at the hearing, Kalkreuth and Mazzacane both maintained that her request was denied because the department had benefited significantly from the regularity of her schedule.

2. Rosen's termination

In May, Rosen began to suffer premature or skipped heart beats. Her family physician prescribed Inderol,[5] performed a number of tests and suggested she take some time off from work. Consequently, between June and July she took the maximum allowable sick leave. While on vacation in August, these symptoms disappeared, but recurred when she returned to work toward the end of the month. In the latter part of August, two incidents occurred which Rosen alleged exacerbated the stress she was feeling on the job. One such episode concerned a project which Mazzacane gave to her several hours before she was to leave on vacation, stating that it had the highest priority. She began the assignment, but left the balance of it on her desk to be completed after her vacation. When she returned to her job, she found that many of the materials she was using for the project were missing and then learned from Mazzacane that the project no longer had a high priority. Mazzacane explained that it was his superior who in fact determined that the project no longer had the significance originally attached to it. The second incident occurred when Rosen found certain computer printouts on her desk with instructions to file them. Having never seen these printouts before, she entered Mazzacane's office to ask him where they should be filed. According to Rosen, Mazzacane became furious with her, and began pacing around his office saying that she should know where the documents were to be filed. Dorothy Freel, who was present in Mazzacane's office during this encounter, recalled that Rosen appeared quite distraught, but had no recollection of Mazzacane raising his voice to her at any time.

Toward the end of August, Rosen returned to her physician for new tests. In mid-September, the test results revealed that her symptoms were not related to a physical impairment.[6] Concluding that her problems were generated by work-related stress, Rosen tendered written resignations on September 18, effective October 9.

C. Discussion

1. The schedule change and warning were not unlawfully motivated

The General Counsel contends that the Respondent revised Rosen's work schedule, issued a written warning and two unjust performance appraisals, withheld a pay increase, and denied special summer hours to penalize her for her involvement in union and other protected concerted activities. In addition, these acts together with other forms of alleged harassment were designed to make Rosen's working environment so intolerable as to compel her resignation. The Respondent contends, to the contrary, that its conduct toward Rosen was justified by her poor performance and by legitimate business considerations. Thus, a resolution of the issues in this case poses the recurring problem of discerning the true reasons underlying Respondent's treatment of Rosen. In cases such as this, where alleged violations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act turn on an employer's mixed motives, the Board has devised a two-part analytic approach. First, the General Counsel has the initial burden of proving that protected activity was a substantial factor in the discipline imposed by the employer. Once the General Counsel has made this prima facie case, the burden shifts to the employer to prove as an affirmative defense that the decision would have been the same in the absence of the protected activity. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980).[7]

[6] At the hearing, I rejected for hearsay reasons G.C. Exh. 26, a medical report from Rosen's physician. I have decided to reverse that ruling sua sponte, for after reconsidering this matter, I conclude that the document was not being offered for the truth of the matters asserted therein, but rather to provide the basis for Rosen's belief that her symptoms were not physiologic, and also to explain why her resignation was not tendered until mid-September. Accordingly, G.C. Exh. 26 is admitted into evidence.

Here, several essential ingredients requisite to establishing a prima facie case are easily satisfied. The record clearly shows that the Hospital was opposed to the organization of its employees and was well aware of Rosen's tireless efforts on behalf of the Union. Against this backdrop, the General Counsel relies heavily on the element of timing to establish the impropriety of Respondent's decision to change Rosen's work schedule. Thus, he argues that Rosen was not advised of the schedule change until shortly after her prominent participation in the Union's August 15 rally. However, as I found above, Mazzacane did mention the schedule revision to Rosen toward the latter part of July or early August, albeit in unspecific terms. Further, he advised the supervisory staff in early August, prior to the union rally, that the change would occur. This announcement tends to negate a causal link between Rosen's appearance at the rally and the subsequent alteration of her working hours.[8]

The General Counsel further submits that Respondent's proffered business justification for the schedule change is wholly lacking in merit. I agree that Mazzacane's explanation that Rosen was needed to dispatch telephone calls during the 3 to 3:30 p.m. shift change made little sense. Telephone dispatching was undeniably an important function, but not only in the afternoon hours. Assuring Rosen's presence during a particular half-hour period would in no way address the dispatching problem during the balance of the day when she was not on duty. Further, Kalkreuth did not corroborate Mazzacane's contention that Rosen was needed to answer the telephone during the shift change. Rather, he explained that her presence during this time would permit maximum exposure to the greatest number of people in the department. In this event, however, a substantial number of the staff would be present to answer the telephone.

If Respondent's only justification for revising Rosen's schedule rested on the need to have her available for telephone dispatching, I would have grave reservations as to the legitimacy of its motivation. However, Mazzacane offered other reasons for the schedule change which are more convincing. Thus, he explained that he wished to stabilize her schedule so as to provide certainty to other department members who utilized her services; make way for another part-time clerk, and better accommodate his own work habits. Nothing in the record suggests that these were not valid considerations. Mazzacane's August 6 memo documents his intent to add a part-time clerk. Freel, a neutral and objective witness, testified that she valued the certainty of Rosen's new schedule. In addition, I note that Mazzacane testified without controversion that he acquiesced to Rosen's request for a starting time of 12 noon rather than 1 p.m. His willingness to defer to Rosen's wishes, at least in part, suggests that he was not acting wholly out of arbitrary and unreasonable motivations. On balance, then, I conclude that Respondent would have altered Rosen's work schedule even if she had not participated in union activity.

Similarly, although the October 13 warning to Rosen poses a close question as to the legitimacy of Respondent's motives, I conclude, based on the record as a whole, that the General Counsel failed to prove by the preponderance of the evidence that it was issued for unlawful reasons.

I credit Rosen's assertion that she specifically referred to the dates of October 10 and 17 in discussing with Mazzacane the medical appointments for her children, for it defies logic to believe that she would raise the matter in a general way when the appointments were already made. By the same token, it is illogical that Mazzacane would admit to having had such a conversation with Rosen on October 3 only to deny that she mentioned any dates to him. If Mazzacane were dissembling, he conveniently could have forgotten that any conversation about medical appointments occurred at all. As a matter of common sense, I surmise that Mazzacane simply forgot that Rosen mentioned express dates to him. Even granting Mazzacane's forgetfulness, a question remains as to his reason for issuing a written rather than a simple oral warning to an employee who had a 6-year untarnished work record. In reaching the conclusion that Mazzacane's overreaction was not in reprisal for her union activism, I bear in mind that the Union filed no objections alleging preelection campaign misconduct by any hospital representative. Further, the General Counsel was not successful in showing that any of Respondent's employees were treated disparately either because they supported or opposed the Union. Moreover, if Respondent wished to retaliate against Rosen for her union activity, it would not have granted her a 17-percent pay raise on October 17 as part of a job upgrading program. In light of these considerations, I conclude that, while Mazzacane's warning was intemperate, it was not issued for reasons which are violative of the Act.

2. The evaluations and denial of pay raises were unlawful

As soon as Mazzacane's warning was overturned, Rosen was subjected to a series of adverse employment actions which culminated in a devastating performance critique issued in early February 1981. The nexus between the successful conclusion of Rosen's grievance and the subsequent actions taken against her strongly suggest that in successfully prosecuting her complaint, Rosen won a victory only to lose the war.[9] Thus, on the same day that Rosen received the final decision revoking the warning, Mazzacane advised Kalkreuth in a written memo that the retrospective analyses were not being submitted in a timely manner. Yet, by his own account, Mezzacane admitted that Rosen had prepared these analyses properly since November and there is no evidence in the record that he requested her to submit them at another time. Therefore, it is more than curious that he failed to mention that he had a problem with their timeliness until the very date that the grievance process was concluded. Approximately 1 week later Mazzacane objected to the manner in which Rosen filed computer printouts, work she had performed throughout her career with Respondent without comment. I am skeptical of Mazzacane's assertion that he spoke to Rosen about her improper filing techniques on numerous past occasions. Rosen was an articulate and obviously intelligent, college-educated woman. Throughout her testimony, she seldom forgot important matters, whereas Mazzacane frequently forgot the dates when certain events took place or who had been involved in them. I deduce from this that if Mazzacane had admonished her in the past she would not have made the same mistake twice. Therefore, Mazzacane's attempt to portray Rosen as a careless and inept employee who consistently failed to perform simple filing tasks seems manufactured or, at best, very much exaggerated.

[7] In a recent decision, Zurn Industries v. NLRB, 680 F.2d 683 (9th Cir. 1982), the court specifically affirmed the Board's two-step approach in Wright Line, after carefully reviewing the relevant legislative history, but noted that there was not universal agreement among the circuits (id., fn. 9).

[8] As found above, Rosen was not notified of the precise details of the schedule change until on or about August 20. Thus, her charge that the change was unlawful, filed on February 17, 1981, was within the 6-month proscription of Sec. 10(b) of the Act.

Soon after these ill-founded criticisms were lodged, Rosen received the employee performance appraisal which found her deficient in virtually every regard. In finding that this appraisal stemmed from vindictive motives, I rely on more than the coincidence in timing between its issuance and the successful prosecution of Rosen's grievance. Among the other factors which must be taken into account is Rosen's previous work history. Throughout her career with Respondent, she regularly received merit increases. Pagliari, who without contradiction was depicted as a demanding taskmaster, described Rosen in exemplary terms in his last appraisal of her. Pagliari's comments were not those of a casual observer; rather, they reflected the considered judgments of a supervisor who had closely scrutinized Rosen's work on a daily basis for 5 years. Respondent fails in its attempt to call into question Pagliari's standards or judgment by introducing into evidence various imperfect typewritten memos. The claim or rather suggestion that these memos were all Rosen's work was unsupported by the evidence. There was no showing that all or most of these memos were her work or under what circumstances or conditions the errors and handwritten insertions were made, or that they were not corrected prior to circulation.

Further, the February evaluation was cosigned by Kalkreuth who had served as the associate chief throughout much of Rosen's employment in that department and who shared the same office with her. Yet, there is no documentation in the record that at any time prior to February 1981 he complained about her performance.

Based on this adverse appraisal, Rosen was denied a merit increase. Although several other staff members received unfavorable evaluations, Rosen was the only employee among the staff of approximately 33 in the respiratory therapy department to receive both a poor performance evaluation and a wage freeze during the first 2 years of Mazzacane's administration.[10]

These circumstances give rise to a compelling inference that Mazzacane's evaluation of Rosen was profoundly colored by the fact that she filed a grievance which exposed his decision-making to the scrutiny of his superiors and embroiled him and other administrators in an attenuated process which ultimately led to an acknowledgement that the Hospital's grievance procedures were flawed. Throughout, Rosen not only protested the impropriety of the warning, she also challenged the procedures employed. In so doing, she was engaged in concerted protected activity. It is well settled that individual efforts to compel compliance with a collective-bargaining agreement will be considered as serving a concerted purpose within the meaning of the Act. See NLRB v. Interboro Contractors, 338 F.2d 495, 500 (2d Cir. 1966). The principle of Interboro is applicable even in the absence of a labor contract where, as here, Rosen invoked the grievance procedure not only to rectify a personal injustice, but also to challenge a wrong which she believed stemmed from antiunion motives. Thus, her protest was designed, at least in part, to vindicate rights guaranteed to all employees, by Section 7 of the Act. In pursuing her grievances, Rosen induced Respondent to reexamine and clarify its grievance machinery. She thereby set in motion a process which could only inure to the benefit of her coworkers. See Air Surrey Corp., 229 NLRB 1064 (1977). Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999 (1975).

Respondent avers that Rosen's negative evaluation was warranted because her performance was marginal. To support its position, Respondent introduced numerous documents which were intended to expose Rosen's incompetence. A close examination of these materials, together with Mazzacane's explanation of their imperfections, does not withstand scrutiny. For example, Mazzacane was particularly critical of Rosen's typewritten work. It became evident, however, that Mazzacane was not complaining about Rosen's finished work product

[9] At the hearing, I granted the General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint to allege expressly that Respondent's unlawful conduct also constituted a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) in that it was designed to retaliate against Rosen because she resorted to the grievance procedure. Respondent argued strenuously then and in its brief that the amendment is time-barred under Sec. 10(b) of the Act. Respondent's argument is without merit. Settled authority establishes that once a charge is filed the Board may deal with any related matter which arises out of the original event. See NLRB v. Dinion Coil Co., 201 F.2d 484, 491 (2d Cir. 1952); Gould, Inc., 260 NLRB 54 (1982). Here, Rosen's charge referred to unlawful reprimands, including the one which gave rise to her grievance. Thus, it cannot seriously be disputed that allegations of wrongful motivation based on Rosen's pressing that grievance are not closely related to the original charge.

but about her first drafts. In other words, he was insisting on error-free work. It does not require expertise in modern office practice to recognize that Mazzacane's standard is virtually unattainable. Since Rosen was altogether willing to correct any errors, since many of the memos she prepared were for intradepartmental consumption only, and since previously, xeroxed copies of her typewritten work had been acceptable, Mazzacane's insistence on perfection seems particularly unreasonable. Several others, Freel and Rebecca Hoyt, another instructor in the school of respiratory therapy, were pleased with Rosen's typing; so much so that they relied on her to type papers for personal projects. Kalkreuth, too, was sufficiently satisfied with her skills to request that she type several letters for him in connection with a private business in which he was engaged. I attach particular significance to Kalkreuth's observation that Rosen may have typed approximately 20 documents a week out of which some 6 to 8 were returned for correction in a bad week, and only 2 to 3 in a good one. This means, of course, that at worst, 12 documents were completed without mistake. Such performance may fall short of perfection and leave room for improvement, but it hardly warrants total condemnation.

A number of documents which Respondent moved into evidence do not reveal Rosen's deficiency as much as they do the Hospital's efforts to grossly disparage her performance. Unquestionably, Rosen committed errors. Thus, she admitted making certain mistakes on the unreported therapy forms. She further acknowledged doing a poor job on certain work completed in the month of January, attributing her substandard performance at that time to both the stress of awaiting the disposition of her grievance and to personal problems. However, Rosen's willingness to admit error only serves to enhance the trustworthiness of her disclaimers of responsibility for certain projects which Respondent attributed to her. Although Rosen's work was not free of fault, a number of illustrations in addition to those previously discussed will suffice to show that Respondent overstated her shortcomings to create a false impression that she was incompetent.

Mazzacane's testimony with respect to the problem encountered when certain billing forms had to be hand assembled is indicative of his attempt to "build a case" against Rosen. The thrust of his testimony was that on learning that some of these forms were not properly aligned and stapled, he devised a method to determine which of the employees were responsible for the defectively assembled forms. He stated that he instructed each of the employees assisting him in this work to initial the forms they assembled. However, he did not so instruct Rosen, apparently believing that he could better identify improperly assembled forms as her work if they bore no identifying initials.[11] Mazzacane testified that an unspecified number of forms which had no initials on them were found to be defective. However, he produced no examples either of an allegedly defective uninitialed form which was returned to him or of a perfect form with another employee's initials on it. By failing to furnish any real evidence supporting these claims, when documentation should have been within Respondent's possession and control, an inference arises that had such records been produced, they would not have substantiated Mazzacane's contentions.[12] Thus, Mazzacane's own account of his efficiency control effort is more indicative of his hostility to Rosen than it is proof of her inefficiency.

Mazzacane's criticism of the minutes of a supervisory meeting which Rosen prepared was equally unwarranted. A comparison of the final version of Rosen's minutes with those Mazzacane completed reveals, at most, minor stylistic differences but no substantive distinctions.

Mazzacane's testimony with respect to Rosen's preparation of a library catalog also is incredible. He allegedly instructed Rosen to list a group of books sequentially according to numbers assigned to them and provided her with a sample catalog to follow. However, the model that Mazzacane introduced into evidence differs in every respect from the list which Rosen typed. I find it impossible to believe that a conscientious, responsible employee like Rosen would wholly ignore a format provided by her department chief. Therefore, I credit her account that he provided no such sample. Moreover, Mazzacane could not have been as displeased with her work as he claimed for he never suggested that she revise the catalog after it was submitted to him in January. In fact, shortly before Rosen resigned, he asked her to add additional titles to the list.

Mazzacane's disparaging description of the way in which Rosen handled the acute care shift logs also strikes me as misleading. He suggested that because Rosen mistakenly identified certain therapists as not having submitted daily logs as they were required to do, he, Mazzacane, wrongly rebuked those who were blameless. It is peculiar, however, that Mazzacane did not name nor did Respondent produce as a witness a single wrongly rebuked therapist. Moreover, since Mazzacane had the logs in his custody, he easily could have confirmed that a particular therapist had failed to submit a daily log before chastising him. Finally, since Mazzacane was not aware that Rosen had erred in compiling these lists until she mentioned it shortly before her termination, her mistake could not have been taken into account in preparing her evaluation.

In sum, Respondent failed to provide convincing evidence that Rosen's performance as a clerk-typist was so deficient as to justify the scathing appraisal issued to her in February 1981, just weeks after the grievance procedure had run its course. These circumstances persuade me that Mazzacane's judgment was distorted by a desire to retaliate against Rosen because of the manner in which she pursued her grievance against him. Respondent's allowing Rosen to prevail on her grievance does not alter the fact that Mazzacane and others in the administration were irritated by her charges of union harassment and her persistence in seeking clarification of and adherence to the grievance procedure. Skopac's comment that management felt harassed by Rosen's efforts to resolve her grievance suggests a willingness on the part of the administration to accept and act upon a negative appraisal of a troublesome employee. Accordingly, I find the issuance of the February evaluation and the attendant denial of a merit increase were violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[11] It is not at all clear why the absence of initials could better identify Rosen's work than if her initials appeared on a returned form.

[12] See Pacific Coast International Meat Co., 248 NLRB 1376, 1381–82 (1980); R & L Plumbing, 243 NLRB 1016, 1022 (1979). Respondent's inability to present such documentation is particularly puzzling in light of Mazzacane's admission that counsel instructed him to preserve evidence of Rosen's faulty work after she filed her unfair labor practice charge.

The General Counsel submits that the unlawful considerations which distorted the February evaluation infected Rosen's July appraisal as well. I agree for the record furnishes even less justification for the second adverse evaluation than it did for the first. Kalkreuth, who prepared this appraisal after having served as Rosen's supervisor for 6 months, could offer only one picayune example of her allegedly deficient performance—her failure to use a half sheet of paper rather than a full one for a typing assignment as instructed. Other than this, Mazzacane, not Kalkreuth, offered very few examples of Rosen's purportedly poor typing during this period. Again, it was apparent that he was referring to inaccurate first efforts, not to finished products.

Indeed, Kalkreuth saw an improvement in Rosen's performance up to May. Yet, he chose not to prepare an interim evaluation based on her improved performance within a 3-month period in conformance with hospital procedure.

Given Kalkreuth's inability to substantiate his dissatisfactions with Rosen's performance, and Mazzacane's continued reliance on uncorrected work, the conclusion is inescapable that Respondent's second appraisal of Rosen was unjustified and designed to buttress the propriety of the earlier one. As such, it was a perpetuation of Respondent's unlawful conduct.

I also agree with the General Counsel's contentions that Respondent denied Rosen's request for an earlier summer schedule for retaliatory reasons. Respondent offered no sound business justification for its refusal to accede to Rosen's modest request. Kalkreuth and Mazzacane merely asserted that her current hours were "good for the Department" without offering any explanation of why this was so. Arriving and departing from work 1 hour earlier for a period of 8 weeks could in no way offer less certainty or stability to those in the department who might need her services. There was no special need for her to be available at the 3 p.m. shift change as was found in the discussion above. Mazzacane even suggested that she dispense answering the phone if it interfered with her other more important duties. Further, Kalkreuth's flexibility in permitting others with equivalent or less seniority then Rosen to rearrange their schedules and designate their shift preferences contrasts markedly with his intransigence toward her. In the absence of any legitimate explanation for its position, I infer that Respondent's denial of Rosen's request for revised summer hours was part of a continuing pattern of retaliation.

3. Rosen was constructively discharged

The General Counsel posits that the totality of Respondent's conduct had the foreseeable effect of compelling Rosen to resign. He contends, therefore, that Respondent is liable for Rosen's constructive discharge.

In determining whether a constructive discharge has occurred, the Board holds that two elements must be established: first, an employer must deliberately make an employee's working conditions intolerable so as to force him to quit his job; second, it must be shown that these burdens were imposed because of the employee's union activities. See Crystal Princeton Refining Co., 222 NLRB 1068, 1069 (1967).[13]

In the present case, I found, on the one hand, that not all of the adverse actions taken against Rosen were unlawfully motivated. There was, for example, insufficient proof that Respondent's decision to alter Rosen's work schedule or to give her a written warning was discriminatory. Neither can I find that Respondent deliberately withheld Rosen's job description. Rather, the evidence suggests that her description, along with those for others in the department, was revised and, inadvertently, not returned in timely fashion for inclusion in a reference manual. Similarly, I am not persuaded that Mazzacane purposely gave Rosen conflicting instructions about compiling a report of overtime worked by staff members. The evidence also does not support the allegation in the amended complaint that Mazzacane screamed at Rosen about her failure to file new computer printouts. It follows that such conduct may not be relied on to establish a constructive discharge, however distressing such incidents may have been to Rosen. On the other hand, Respondent did make a number of far-reaching decisions affecting Rosen's status as an employee which were motivated by an intent to retaliate against her for having engaged in protected concerted activity. Accordingly, the second test enunciated in Crystal Princeton has been met. The critical question which remains is whether this unlawful conduct created a sufficiently oppressive atmosphere which Respondent reasonably could expect would force Rosen's resignation. A review of the entire record compels the conclusion that this question must be answered affirmatively.

As found above, Rosen was given two evaluations which unjustly exaggerated certain weaknesses in her performance and which provided justification for withholding a pay increase for more than 8 months. She was the only person in the department subjected to such treatment. Further, Rosen was criticized for performing her job in a way which for 5 years had been wholly acceptable to the former department chief. The alteration in the way in which Rosen's work was regarded cannot be attributed solely to the advent of a new department chief, particularly since Mazzacane was considered a less demanding taskmaster than Pagliari. Mazzacane's insistence on perfection from Rosen, contrasted with his tolerance for other employees' errors, is more than suspect.

In acknowledging receipt of the employee performance appraisal, Rosen stated her belief that the evaluation stemmed from unlawful motives and did not reflect her real performance. Nevertheless, in order to placate Mazzacane, she began checking and rechecking her typing. The upshot of this was that her productivity decreased, leading to new criticisms. Thus, in an effort to satisfy Mazzacane and ward off his unreasonable faultfinding, Rosen was thrust into a no-win position. Denying Rosen an earlier summer work schedule served to exacerbate an already tense situation. Depriving her of this modest benefit without sound reason suggests that it was part of a continuing effort to make her working conditions as uncomfortable and inflexible as possible. Then, even after conceding that her efforts had improved, Kalkreuth unleashed another devastating evaluation. With both her supervisors denigrating her efforts, Rosen could have litle expectation for ordinary consideration on the job, much less hope for advancement.

Respondent cites Van Pelt Fire Trucks, 238 NLRB 794 (1978), for the proposition that an employee such as Rosen has an alternative other than quitting; that is, to seek redress through the Board's processes. However, given the amount of time which inevitably elapses before an unfair labor practice charge is resolved, Rosen could not look forward to a swift palliative for her physical and emotional reactions. Rosen had no real options here. As long as she remained in an atmosphere where no amount of effort on her part would satisfy those who controlled her working conditions, she continued to experience symptoms which she reasonably attributed to work-related stress. While the Board imposes a "reasonable person" standard in determining whether conditions are objectively onerous or merely unpleasant,[14] it does not insist that the reasonable employee be a stoic. See, e.g., Pinter Bros., 227 NLRB 921, 938–939 (1977); Zinke Foods, 185 NLRB 901, 906 (1970). If Dorothy Freel, who did not work with Rosen on a daily basis, could during one brief episode in Mazzacane's office observe her discomposure, then Mazzacane and Kalkreuth had to be aware that their actions were causing her considerable distress. Consequently, Respondent must be held accountable for creating conditions which clearly signaled to Rosen that she was no longer wanted. No reasonable employee is expected to continue working under the conditions such as those created by Respondent. See General Meats, 247 NLRB 1036, 1038–40 (1980); W. T. Grant Co., 195 NLRB 1000, 1008–09 (1972); Zinke Foods, supra. Accordingly, because I find that Rosen tendered her resignation under compulsion, it follows that her termination must be regarded as a constructive discharge violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[15]

[14] Hit 'N Run Food Stores, 231 NLRB 660, 666 (1977).

[15] The complaint alleges that Respondent's conduct toward Rosen was motivated by her union activities in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. There is without doubt some evidence of union animus here, and one can safely assume that Respondent would be happy to rid itself of a principal union proponent. Therefore, it is difficult for the trier of fact, as it must have been for the Respondent, to regard Rosen's participation in the grievance process as severable from her role as a key union activist. However, since the Board has rejected an "in part" test of motivation in Wright Line, supra, and the record does not establish by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent would not have retaliated against Rosen in the absence of her union activities, a violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) does not properly lie here.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Hospital of St. Raphael is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

2. New England Health Care Employees Union, District 1199, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by issuing to Sandra Rosen two adverse employee performance appraisals, denying her an annual merit wage increase and earlier summer working hours in retaliation for her engaging in protected concerted activities.

4. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Sandra Rosen on October 9, 1981, and by failing and refusing to reinstate her at all times thereafter.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. Respondent did not violate the Act by revising Rosen's work schedule nor by issuing a written warning to her.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent's conduct violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in that it was designed to retaliate against Sandra Rosen for engaging in protected concerted activities, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to cease and desist therefrom and from engaging in any like or related conduct hereinafter. In addition, in order to effectuate the policies of the Act I shall recommend affirmatively that Respondent be required to offer Sandra Rosen immediate reinstatement to her former job or if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed and to make her whole for any loss of pay she may have suffered by reason of her discharge by paying to her a sum of money equal to that which she would have earned but for her discharge from October 9, 1981, to the date of an offer of reinstatement, less any net earnings during this period, to be computed in the manner described in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Respondent will preserve and make available to the Board on request all records necessary and useful to determining the amount of backpay due under the terms of this decision. In addition, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to rescind and expunge Rosen's adverse performance appraisals from her personnel file and, also, to post appropriate notices.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 25 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge James J. O'Meara Jr., issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent Union and the Respondent Employer filed answering briefs. The Respondent Union also filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The motions of the Respondent Union and the Respondent Employer to strike the General Counsel's Notice of Authority are denied as lacking merit.

[2] The General Counsel and the Respondent Union have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES J. O'MEARA JR., Administrative Law Judge. These cases were consolidated and tried at Miami, Florida, on May 3 and 4, 1983. The charges were filed by Gary Lee Jones and Arthur Lee Brown against the Union Respondent on January 20, 1983. Subsequently, Jones and Brown filed additional charges against the Company Respondent on February 1 and 24, 1983, respectively. On March 9, 1983, a consolidated complaint was issued based on the four charges. That complaint alleges that Jones and Brown were discharged by the Respondent Eller & Company, Inc. in response to the request of the Union. The complaint also alleges that the Union, through several officials, threatened several employees with loss of employment because of their intraunion political views and activities. The complaint charges that such activities constituted violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) and Section 8(b)(2) of the Act.

The Respondents, Eller & Company, Inc. and the Union, deny that they have violated the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and in consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, the Company Respondent, and the Union Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent Eller & Company, Inc. (Eller) is a Florida corporation with several offices and places of business in the State of Florida, including its facility located at Port Everglades, Florida. It has been engaged in the business of providing maritime services, including stevedoring services and warehousing at various locations in several States including its facility at Port Everglades, Florida, which is the site of the incident giving rise to this case.

During the past 12 months, Respondent Eller, in the course and conduct of its business operations, performed services valued in excess of $50,000 in States other than the State of Florida, and is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Respondent International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 675 (the Union) is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

I find that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction in this case.

II. STATEMENT OF FACTS

A. The Business of Respondent Eller

Eller is engaged in the maritime industry as a shipping agent and provides stevedoring and other maritime services at various seaports throughout Florida, Virginia, and Texas. At its Port Everglades, Florida operation the Company employs operating engineers represented by the Union as well as other employees. Approximately 3 percent of the vessels unloaded by Eller at Port Everglades require the use of Eller-operated cranes and union crews to operate them.

B. Eller's Employment of Operating Engineers

The number of operating engineers engaged to operate Eller's cranes constantly changes due to fluctuations in the number and type of vessels for which Eller provides stevedoring facilities. These operating engineers are obtained through the Union's hiring hall and at the request of Eller. As a result of these circumstances, layoffs of operating engineers occur frequently. In 1982 Eller laid off a total of 18 crane operators; some of the operators have been hired and laid off several times during the year.

It was the practice of the Company at all times material to the issues in this complaint to maintain four "permanent" operators or "continuous" employees. These permanent operators performed their duties in teams of two and operated and maintained two cranes. The four continuous employees were treated differently from other operators by the Company in that they were paid 50 cents per hour over and above that wage required by a collective-bargaining contract with the Union to which Eller was a signatory. They also were allowed to remain "on the clock" whenever there was "downtime." Other employees known as "needed employees" were clocked out during "downtime." The continuous employees were also able to qualify for 1-week vacations every 6 months and, different from the "as needed employees," wore uniforms identifying them as Eller employees. The Company determined which of its operators would be deemed continuous employees and such continuous employees were changed from time to time. The practice of treating four of the union operators as continuous employees was at the Company's option and was not required by the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. That collective-bargaining agreement with the Union did not provide for any seniority for operating engineers in regard to their employment either as continuous employees or as needed employees. At the time of the layoff of Gary Lee Jones and Arthur Lee Brown, each was what has been described as continuous employees, Brown, having been engaged in that capacity, continuously during the year that the two operator teams were in use. Jones entered the status of continuous employee on May 22, 1982,[1] as a replacement for another continuous employee who had been fired.

C. The Union

The Union and Eller are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement applicable to the operating engineers employed by Eller. The contract, in effect at the time material to the issues in this case, was one of a succession of contracts. The local union is administered by the business manager, who, since 1976, has been Dennis Walton. The business manager is elected by the members of the local union. On August 14, an election for local union officers took place. The prime candidates were incumbent Dennis Walton and a challenger, Gus Chandler. The campaign pursued by Walton and Chandler was intensive and resulted in a close election in which Walton was elected. There are 2200 union members of whom 1160 voted in this election. Walton, the winner, received a plurality of about 26 votes.[2]

The duties of the business manager of the local union include the responsibility for negotiating contracts, hiring and firing union staff, the responsibility for the operation of the local union, appointment of all shop stewards, and the day-to-day operation and oversight of the local union.

[1] All dates are in 1982 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] The record is unclear as to these totals but is is well established that the number of ballots was substantial and the margin of the winner was small.

D. Discharge of Jones and Brown

On or about October 21, 1982, Eller experienced adverse economic conditions and a reduction in its employee complement was necessary.[3] Six members of the Union, including Jones and Brown, were selected by Eller for layoff. Four members of the Union continued employment in the status of permanent employees. The selection of those employees to be laid off was not made on the basis of seniority in length of employment with Eller. An evaluation was made by supervisory personnel of Eller. The inclusion among the employees to be laid off of Jones and Brown was due to their "attitude" reflected on the job and arising out of the perceived adverse results of the union election of August 14. During the period from the date of the election to the October 21 discharge, both Brown and Jones had demonstrated their disappointment with the results of the union election. They did not converse with fellow employees at the Eller facility. They did not participate in the shared functions of their jobs, such as the cleaning of equipment and the maintenance and repair of equipment, and they engaged in unauthorized absences from the area in which they were expected to perform their job. These two operators were each one of a crew comprising two operators and were deemed continuous employees and worked as the partner or second member of a crew. Their refusal to participate in their assigned work caused the other crew members to undertake an undue share of the allocated work. The situation was so apparent and destructive of amicable working conditions that an Eller supervisor, after unsuccessfully attempting to resolve the matters within the Eller Company, called on Union Business Manager Walton to visit the worksite and exhort the operators to cooperate in the performance of their work. Walton appeared at the premises of Eller and advised the employees, who were also members of the Union, that the election was over and that they should return to the amicable work relationship which existed prior to the election. The condition which prompted Eller supervisors to request the intervention of Walton was sufficiently apparent that Charging Party Jones, in an effort to smooth relations, sponsored a picnic in early September to which both employee and management personnel of Eller were invited. Respondent's manager, Coenen, in consultation with other supervisory personnel, selected Jones and Brown for layoff because of the "attitude" of these employees as described above even though both Jones and Brown had in the past been members of the continuous employee cadre which was maintained at the option of the Company. Other operators who had supported Walton's adversary were retained by the Company and supporters of Walton were among those laid off.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

Brown and Jones contend that they were included among the personnel to be laid off on October 24 because of their activities during the intraunion election where the principal candidates were Walton and Chandler. They allege that the Union, through Business Manager Walton, influenced Eller to lay them off because they were active and vocal in support of the unsuccessful campaign of challenger Chandler. In support of this allegation, they cite several instances occurring before and after the election of August 14 as evidence of their allegations. The campaign was hard fought and each of the candidates, Walton and Chandler, vied for the support of the various operators who were members of the local union. Included among these are Jones and Brown. The record suggests that they were of such stature among the union operators at Eller that their support for a particular candidate would generate like support from other members of the Union. As a result, Walton visited among the employees including Brown and Jones prior to the election. About 1 week before the election Walton is alleged by Jones to have said, "Whoever does not support me will be down the road." Although Walton denies this statement, no further elaboration on its meaning, or definition of any innuendo conveyed by such statement, appears in this record. On August 12, 2 days before the election, Walton, in discussions with Brown in the presence of other union employees at Eller, is alleged to have stated that he wanted good men to support his candidacy. Brown asked him if that were so, why he had relieved Randy Costin and George Elvis? Walton allegedly replied that people who do not support him do not work for him. Again on August 13, the day before the election, Brown, who, up to that date had been the union steward at Eller, was replaced by Douglas Bates.

[3] There is no contention on the part of the parties to this action that the reduction of Eller's employee complement was contrived or unnecessary.

About 2 weeks after the election the new business steward, Douglas Bates, encountered Jones and Brown on the job and told them to "watch out you will be replaced at Eller." The record does not disclose any elaboration by Bates as to his meaning or intent on this occasion nor did Jones or Brown question him about it.

Also, approximately 2 weeks after the election, Bob Krickovitch, the equipment superintendent, had occasion to call the union hall to advise them that they were laying off a union operator because of incompetence. The call, allegedly made in the presence of Brown, was to a union official by the name of Joe Gagne. Krickovitch is alleged to have stated to Brown that, during the conversation, Gagne had said to Krickovich that if they laid off anyone they should lay off Brown. Krickovitch denies such a telephone conversation. Again, after the election and approximately 1 week before the October 21 layoff, Bates, in a conversation with Brown and Jones, allegedly told them that they were to be laid off. He returned several hours later and told them they would not be laid off. Bates denied knowing whether they were to be laid off or having told either Brown or Jones that they would or would not be laid off.

On the morning of October 21, Pete Pescatore, who was acting as the equipment foreman in the absence of Krickovitch, informed Jones and Brown that they had been laid off. Later, on October 21, Jones and Brown spoke to Coenan, Eller's manager, regarding the reason for their being included among those employees to be laid off. Allegedly, Coenan stated that they had been laid off because of their "political views and that the layoff was a direct order from the Union hall." Coenan denies that their discharge had been a result of an order from the union hall and he also denies that he had told Jones and Brown that. Coenan's reason for including Jones and Brown among those employees to be laid off was their "attitude" comprising their failure to communicate with other employees, their failure to remain on the job, their failure to obey orders from the craft supervisors, and their failure to maintain their cranes.

IV. DISCUSSION AND CONCLUSIONS

The General Counsel specifies three distinct charges against the Respondents. First, he contends that Respondent Eller violated Section 8(a)(3) by terminating the employment of Gary Lee Jones and Arthur Lee Brown because of their union political beliefs and activities. Second, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(2) of the Act by causing the discharge of Gary Lee Jones and Arthur Lee Brown from Eller's employment. Third, the General Counsel contends that the Union violated Section 8(b)(1) of the Act by threatening and coercing employees with loss of employment because of the employee's union political beliefs.

The first two issues delineated above are reflected in the allegations in the complaint whereby the General Counsel charges that the Union requested Eller to terminate the employment of Jones and Brown because they had failed to support the successful candidate for business manager in the union election.

The evidence reflects, as stated above, that on October 21 Eller found it necessary, because of economic conditions, to lay off six of their crane operators because of a reduced demand for such cranes. There is no contention on the part of the General Counsel that the need to lay off these six employees was not economically prompted. The single issue in this regard is the inclusion of Gary Lee Jones and Arthur Lee Brown among the six employees laid off. Lee and Brown contend that the Union directed that they be included among the six employees to be laid off because of their opposition to the successful candidate for business manager, Dennis Walton, in the prior election. The only direct evidence of this consists of the statement by Jones and Brown that Coenan, Eller's manager, told them that they were discharged for political reasons and on direct orders from the Union and that a list of employees to be laid off was given to Coenan. Coenan denied the statement attibuted to him and also denied that the Union had any influence whatsoever in the selection of employees to be among those laid off. No list of such employees was produced nor was there any evidence of such a list.

Coenan contends that it was he who made the selection of Jones and Brown to be among those laid off. He stated that the reasons for the inclusion of Jones and Brown to be laid off was their "attitude." After the election of Walton, Jones and Brown became sullen, refusing to communicate with the other members of their crane crews, and were away from the jobsite when needed and would not participate in their share of the work in both the operation and maintenance of the particular equipment with which they were charged. Fellow employees have testified in this record that both Jones and Brown refused to take a proportionate share of the work in the operation and maintenance of the crane which they operated. On one occasion, deemed characteristic, a crane was in need of maintenance or repair work and the crew was asked to attend to the work in order that the crane would be operable by 1 p.m. Brown and Jones left the location of their work with the crane and went to lunch, which conduct, but for other employees, would have precluded the operational status of the crane by 1 p.m. The evidence also reflects that Jones and Brown would not participate in the maintenance of their cranes as was required by their jobs and were tasks which they had performed prior to the election. Coenan characterizes this action as a poor "attitude." He is also charged to have said that the reason for Jones and Brown's inclusion among those to be laid off was their "political views." Although Coenan denies the use of the term "political views," it is probable that, since Jones' and Brown's reaction was to the results of the union election, such a posture could be deemed political views with the understanding that politics were those of and within the Union.

The situation after the election became intolerable to the supervisory personnel at Eller and they requested Business Manager Walton to visit the port, talk to the men, and attempt to reconcile the differences in order that the work at the port could continue without the disruption and delay caused by union politics. Walton came to the port, talked to the union members employed by Eller, and urged them to forget the election and the previous campaign and work harmoniously in order that the job which they were called on to perform could be accomplished to the satisfaction of management. Jones also recognized the aura of discontent prevailing at Respondent Eller's facility since he, in September, had sponsored a picnic to which both union employees and management personnel of Eller & Company had been invited. Jones acknowledged the purpose of the picnic was to alleviate the tension and reduce the discontent among the employees at Eller. It seems, therefore, that the postelection atmosphere at Eller & Company was tense and disruptive. Coenan perceived Jones and Brown to be all, or some, of the cause of such conditions and he selected them to be laid off in order to retain employees whom he perceived to be qualified and compatible with a more amiable atmosphere.

I find that the reasons attributed by Coenan for the layoff of Jones and Brown are persuasive in view of the conditions existing after the election at Eller. Further, it is improbable that in the event the Union had influenced the inclusion of Jones and Brown among those to be laid off, that Coenan would have expressed this to the employees so affected. There is no supporting evidence of Coenan having made the statement nor is there any evidence of the existence of a list of such employees. It is further significant that among the six employees laid off on this occasion, several were Walton supporters during the recent election.

The Charging Parties, Jones and Brown, infer great significance to the fact that they were members of the continuous employees, "permanent employees," or "cadre" of operators whom, according to Eller's practice, were retained even in times of slow work. They contend by innuendo that this position gives them some tenure not available to other employees. It must be noted that in March, Jones became a member of such cadre only after another former cadre employee was discharged. By this very fact Eller's position is confirmed that the membership among the permanent employees did not depend on seniority nor other factors except those that tended to create a better working crew of employees. The benefits to their permanent employees were voluntarily granted by the Employer. Such things as a 50-cent increase in wages over scale and being permitted to stay "on the clock" during downtime were among some of these benefits. The contract did not require such benefits and the Union was aware that Eller granted them. Notwithstanding the detailed description of this cadre, the membership within it was not entitled to any tenure or special preference. Therefore, notwithstanding Jones' and Brown's good performance prior to the election, when their persistence in permitting their political views of union matters to interfere with the discharge of their employment and that of other employees the Employer had the right, in selecting those employees to be laid off, to number them among such employees. Thus, the contention of Coenan that Jones and Brown were laid off because of their "attitude" and/or their "political views" is persuasive when weighed against the self-serving, unsupported testimony of Jones and Brown that Coenan made a statement suggesting a contrary reason for their discharge, I, therefore, credit the testimony of Coenan and find that the reasons for including Jones and Brown among those to be laid off were legitimate, lawful reasons and not the result of influence or urging by the Union. Another factor in suport of such a conclusion is that there appears to be no reason in this record that the Employer should subserviate its judgment as to who should be employed to the Union. There was an abundance of operators and nothing in this record to indicate that the Union was in a position to enforce their suggestion; on the contrary, layoffs were frequent and operators were numerous.

Several collateral episodes are contained in this record apparently in an attempt by the General Counsel to create an aura, by innuendo, of interference by the Union. During the campaign, prior to the election, Walton was alleged to have stated that, "No one works for me unless they support me." The record shows that the office of business manager of the Union carries with it a number of appointment rights including that of assistant business manager, "No one works for me unless they support me." Specifically, Randy Costin, an assistant business agent, was removed as an assistant business agent by Walton. On the day before the election, Walton removed Brown from his job as steward and appointed Doug Bates to such position. These appointments are the prerogative of the business manager of the Union and does not support the contention that Walton, the business manager of the Union, intended his remarks to refer to the employment of the union members with the employer. I find this evidence to be nonprobative of the issues.

Approximately 2 weeks after the election, Brown had the occasion to be in Krickovitch's office. Krickovitch had placed a call to the union hall asking for Walton, the business manager, or Joe Gagne, the assistant business manager. The purpose of the call was to discuss with the Union the replacement of an employee the Company intended to discharge because they were dissatisfied with him. After concluding the conversation with Gagne, Krickovitch, according to Brown, turned to him and told Brown that Gagne had informed him that if Eller wanted to lay off anybody at the jobsite that it should be Brown. Krickovitch denies that Gagne had told him that if anyone was to be laid it should be Brown and he also denied that he told Brown that Gagne had so stated. The employee with whom Eller had been dissatisfied was discharged. Here again we have the testimony of Brown as to the conversation with Krickovitch and Krickovitch's denial of the conversation. No further action on the part of the Union or Eller is related to this conversation.[4] It would probably be necessary to determine Krickovitch's status as a supervisor if the evidence arising from his testimony was significant. Since no probative value is attached to the testimony of Krickovitch in regard to his conversation with Gagne, it becomes unnecessary to determine Krickovitch's status.

Other statements attributed by Jones and Brown to the new union steward, Bates, create what could be described as an innuendo. Statements such as Bates allegedly having stated that Jones and Brown were to be laid off and then an hour or two later that they were not to be laid off are nonprobative of the issues of the case.

Jones and Brown contend that when they confronted Coenan he allegedly told them that they were discharged because of direct orders from the Union. They asked him if he would testify to that before the Board. Coenan was alleged to have said that he would tell the truth. Subsequent efforts to get a statement from Coenan to the effect that the Union had directed their layoff were unavailing. The request to Coenan for such a statement was made after the Charging Parties had filed their complaint against the Union and before they had filed a similar complaint against the Company. In this interim, and on the refusal of Coenan to give them a statement in the manner which they requested, Jones and Brown went to Steven Erb, vice president of Eller's Florida operations. They advised Erb that they had been unsuccessful in getting a letter from Coenan stating that the reason for their inclusion among those employees laid off was because of pressure from the union hall, and that unless they got such a letter they would bring action against Eller before the Board. Erb told Jones and Brown that he would advise Coenan that they had come to see him which he did and no further action on the subject was carried on by Erb. On Februrary 7 and 24, 1983, respectively, Jones and Brown caused the filing of a companion complaint against the Company.

There is evidence in this record comprising a letter sent by Brown to the general president of the Union. That letter stated that Walton had influenced their layoff because of their opposition to him in the election. Walton, in response to a query in that regard from the general president, requested a statement from the company as to the reason for the inclusion of Jones and Brown and directed such letter to the president of the Union. The letter from the employer indicated that the reduction was due to a reduced demand for cranes created by economic conditions.

In summary, it is my conclusion that Jones and Brown were included among those to be laid off on October 21, because of their selection by the management based on the perception that working conditions at the Employer's facility would be improved and best served by the layoff of Jones and Brown. I find that the General Counsel has not discharged the burden of proof by the evidence in this record that the inclusion of Jones and Brown among those to be laid off was instigated by the Union nor was the result of pressure by the Union on the Employer. I further find that the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the evidence that the Union took steps to influence the inclusion of Jones and Brown among those to be laid off on October 21.

Jones and Brown have testified to certain statements made by Walton, Coenan, Bates, and Krickovitch. Each of these statements can be characterized as self-serving to Jones and Brown as none of the statements are corroborated by other testimony and all have been denied by the alleged declarant. Nothing in the observed demeanor of the alleged declarants and nothing in the content of their denials gives me cause to discredit their testimony. Except for the alleged statement of Coenan that Jones and Brown were laid off because of direct orders from the Union, all of the content of the statements fall short of establishing that the Union was instrumental in Jones' and Brown's discharge or that the Company succumbed to alleged influence by the Union in the selection of Jones' and Brown's layoff.

All evidence considered, it is my finding that the General Counsel has failed to establish, by a preponderance of the evidence, the allegations made in the complaint.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Eller & Company, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent, International Union of Operating Engineers Local 675, AFL–CIO, is now, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The General Counsel has not established, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Respondent Eller &

[4] Krickovitch's status is not clear in this record in that he is mentioned by several different titles. One of the titles was craft foreman. The position of craft foreman is defined in the collective-bargaining agreement between Eller and the Union. This agreement expressly provides for a craft foreman who shall not be deemed a supervisor. Sec. V, art. 3 provides, in part, that: The craft foreman will be the leadman of the employees in the bargaining unit. Such individual, however, shall neither have the authority to, nor shall exercise any of the functions customarily "exercised by supervisors within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and in no way shall such individual be deemed to be an agent of the Union."

Company, Inc. nor Respondent Union violated the Act as alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Foothills Food, Inc. d/b/a Erickson's Sentry of Bend and United Food and Commercial Workers Local Union No. 303. Case 36–CA–4532

30 November 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 20 March 1984 Administrative Law Judge Richard D. Taplitz issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions[1] and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The relevant facts can be briefly summarized. Foothills Food, Inc. d/b/a Erickson's Sentry of Bend, herein Erickson's, has three stores in Bend, Redmond, and Madras, Oregon. The three constitute a single bargaining unit in which the employees are represented by United Food and Commercial Workers Local Union No. 303, herein called the Union. Erickson's and the Union engaged in collective-bargaining negotiations in June and July 1983. On 2 July Erickson's made its final offer to the Union, and on 21 July members of the unit voted to authorize a strike.

On the morning of 22 July, employee Harold C. Richards approached Bend store manager and part owner Douglas Schmidt and asked what language he could use on a petition to resign from the Union. Schmidt obtained the language[2] from his attorney and gave it to Richards. While in Schmidt's office, Richards wrote the language on a piece of paper and signed it. Schmidt and Richards then discussed who else would be interested in working during a strike, and Schmidt called employee Randy Albright to his office over the store's P.A. system.[3] During the afternoon Schmidt had Assistant Manager Mike Sears, an admitted supervisor, call employees Mike Jackson and Brian Palfrey individually from their work stations to Schmidt's office.[4]

The credited evidence shows that each of the three employees was told by Schmidt in his office that a strike was imminent; that if the employee honored the picket line he would be permanently replaced; that, if he came to work through the picket line the Union would fine him; that if he signed the petition to resign from the Union, the Union could not fine him for crossing the picket line to work; and that, if he did resign from the Union and cross the picket line to work, his wages and benefits would be the same.

After Schmidt gave Albright the above information, Albright signed the petition in Schmidt's office in the presence of Richards and Schmidt. Richards then took the petition with him to the produce area.

Later in the day, Jackson was given the same information by Schmidt in Schmidt's office in the presence of Sears. Jackson told Schmidt that he would like the night to think about it. Schmidt responded that the Union could strike as soon as the next day and that he wanted to keep Jackson on. He reiterated that if Jackson honored the picket line he would be permanently replaced and if he did not he would be fined. Jackson replied that he wanted the day to think about it. Schmidt told Jackson that if he had any questions he should talk to him, Sears, or Richards. Jackson asked Schmidt if he could see the petition and Schmidt replied that Richards had it and Jackson should talk to Richards or Sears. Later that afternoon Jackson asked Sears if the petition were still in the store and if he could sign it. Sears told him that the petition had already been sent in the mail to the Union, but that there would be another petition to sign since not everyone in the store had signed the first petition.[5]

Shortly after Schmidt's conversation with Jackson, he spoke with Palfrey in his office, again in the presence of Sears. Schmidt gave Palfrey the same information that he had given Albright and Jackson. He then told him that he could sign the petition in the produce area and keep his job, and that they would be sending the petition away later

[1] The General Counsel's exceptions were limited to the judge's findings concerning the Respondent's conduct in soliciting employees to sign a petition withdrawing their union membership on 22 July 1983.

[2] The petition read:

> As of 7–22–83 the following resign from the Retail Clerks Union Local #303 and will not honor any strikes or picket lines.

[3] These facts, which Schmidt testified to at the hearing, were not included in the judge's decision. Although Albright testified that Assistant Manager Mike Sears had told him to go to Schmidt's office, the judge credited Schmidt over Albright.

[4] The judge did not include in his decision the fact that the two were called in to Schmidt's office by Sears, but each of the employees, who were both credited over Schmidt and Sears, testified that Sears had come to him at his work station and told him to go to Schmidt's office.

[5] Although the judge failed to include all of the above facts regarding Jackson in his decision, Jackson testified to the facts at the hearing and the judge credited Jackson over all other witnesses at the hearing.

on that night. Palfrey later signed the petition in the produce area.[6]

The judge concluded that in these circumstances Schmidt did not violate the Act by any of his statements or actions as alleged in the complaint. We disagree. While we agree with the judge that an employer does not violate Section 8(a)(1) by providing employees with information on how to resign or withdraw from their union "as long as the employer makes no attempt to ascertain whether employees will avail themselves of this right nor offers any assistance, or otherwise creates a situation where employees would tend to feel peril in refraining from such revocation," R. L. White Co., 262 NLRB 575, 576 (1982), we disagree that such is the case here.[7] Thus, Schmidt discussed with Richards which other employees to approach; Schmidt, not Richards, called the three employees to his office—one over the store's P. A. system and two by his assistant manager—away from their work stations and on company time; Schmidt's meeting with two of the employees did not even include Richards; Schmidt told Jackson to ask Richards, Assistant Manager Sears, or Schmidt if he had any questions about the petition; Schmidt told employee Palfrey that "they" would be sending the petition away that night; and Sears told Jackson that the petition had been sent to the Union but that there would be another one since not everyone in the store had signed the first one. In these circumstances, we find that the words and actions of Schmidt and Sears went beyond the mere providing of information found by the judge and constitute unlawful solicitation of union resignations.[8] Not only did Schmidt assist Richards, but he and Sears also gave the appearance that Erickson's favored the petition and encouraged employees to sign it and created a situation where employees would tend to feel peril in refraining from signing the petition. In addition, Sears made it clear by his statement to Jackson that Erickson's was monitoring who had or had not signed the petition.[9] Accordingly, we find that Erickson's unlawfully encouraged and solicited employees to sign a petition to withdraw from the Union, thereby impairing employee freedom of choice in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[10]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Foothill Foods, Inc. d/b/a Erickson's Sentry of Bend, Bend Oregon, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Unlawfully encouraging or soliciting empoyees to sign a petition whereby they withdraw from United Food and Commercial Workers Local Union No. 303 or any labor organization.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its Bend, Oregon store copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges unfair labor practices not found herein.

[6] Palfrey testified to the above facts. Although the judge did not include all these facts regarding Palfrey in his decision, he credited Palfrey over both Schmidt and Sears.

[7] We agree with the judge that telling employees that they will be permanently replaced if they engaged in an economic strike and that they may be fined by their union if they cross the picket line is, absent any threats or promises, lawful.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT unlawfully encourage or solicit you to sign a petition withdrawing from United Food and Commercial Workers Local Union No. 303.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

FOOTHILLS FOOD, INC. D/B/A ERICKSON'S SENTRY OF BEND

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD D. TAPLITZ, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Bend, Oregon, on February 2, 1984. The charge and amended charge were filed respectively on September 1 and November 21, 1983, by United Food and Commercial Workers Local Union No. 303 (the Union). The complaint, which issued on November 22, 1983, alleges that Foothills Food, Inc. d/b/a Erickson's Sentry of Bend (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Issues

The primary issues are whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by initiating a petition seeking employee resignations from the Union; soliciting its employees to sign such a petition; by threatening employees with loss of employment unless they resigned from the Union; by promising employees an increase in benefits and improved terms and conditions of employment if they resigned from the Union; and by interrogating an employee concerning his and other employees' union sympathies.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. All parties waived their right to file briefs and none were filed.

On the entire record of the case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, an Oregon corporation with an office and place of business in Bend, Oregon, is engaged in the retail grocery business. During the year immediately preceding issuance of complaint, Respondent had gross sales of goods and services valued in excess of $500,000 and during the same period of time Respondent caused to be transferred and delivered to its facilities within Oregon goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources outside Oregon or from suppliers within Oregon which in turn obtained such goods and materials directly from outside Oregon. The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Erickson's Sentry has three stores. They are located in Bend, Redmond, and Madras, Oregon. The three stores constitute a single bargaining unit in which the employees are represented by the Union. In June and July 1983 the three stores were engaged in collective-bargaining negotiations with the Union. On July 2, 1983, Respondent made a "full and final" offer to the Union. At a union meeting on July 21, 1983, a strike vote was taken and authorization was given for a strike.

On July 22, 1983, a petition was circulated in which employees withdrew from the Union. On the same day Respondent's store manager Douglas Schmidt[1] spoke to employees Randy Albright, Mike Jackson, and Brian Palfrey. The General Counsel contends that Respondent unlawfully involved itself with the petition and interfered with the Section 7 rights of employees by the remarks he made to those three employees.

The strike never took place. On August 11, 1983, Respondent and the Union executed a collective-bargaining agreement in the three-store bargaining unit, which was effective by its terms from June 1, 1983, through May 31, 1984.

On August 8, 1983, employees of Respondent filed a petition with the National Labor Relations Board in Case 36–UD–237 to rescind the authority of the Union to make an agreement requiring membership in the Union as a condition of employment. On August 29 a copy of the Board notice of election in that case was posted at the Bend store. It stated that an election would be conducted on September 8, 1983. On September 1, 1983, the Union filed the original charge in the instant case. That charge blocked the scheduled election and it has not yet taken place.

[1] The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Schmidt, as well as Assistant Manager Mike Sears, was an agent and supervisor of Respondent within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

B. The Initiation of the Petition to Withdraw from the Union

The strike vote took place on July 21, 1983. At 8 a.m. the following day Respondent's employee Harold C. Richards[2] spoke to Store Manager Schmidt in the produce room of the Bend store. Richards was a union member and he had attended the meeting the previous evening. He told Schmidt that at the meeting the Bend store employees had voted to accept Respondent's firm and final offer but that the employees in the other two stores in the bargaining unit had rejected it. Richards said that he did not know whether the employees were going on strike or not but that for his own personal reasons he would not strike and he would cross a picket line if he had to. Schmidt told Richards that there was a possibility the Union might fine him. Richards replied that he was going to cross the picket line because he needed the work and that he was interested in starting a petition to withdraw from the Union. He asked Schmidt what language would be needed on a petition if he were to start one. Schmidt replied that he would check with his legal representative.

Schmidt then went to his office and called his attorney who gave him legal advice.

About a half hour later Richards went into Schmidt's office and Schmidt told Richards what a petition to withdraw from the Union should state. Richards used Schmidt's language to draft a petition which read:

> As of 7-22-83 the following resign from the Retail Clerks Union Local #303 and will not honor any strikes or picket lines.

Richards then signed the petition.[3]

C. The July 22, 1983 Conversations Between Schmidt and the Three Employees

Schmidt gave the wording of the petition to Richards on July 22, 1983. On the same day he spoke individually to employees Randy Albright, Mike Jackson, and Brian Palfrey.

Albright was called into Schmidt's office about 9 a.m. that day.[4]

Albright testified that Schmidt, in Richards' presence, told him that there was going to be a strike the next day; that no one who honored the strike would be hired back; that he (Schmidt) was starting a petition and that if he (Albright) signed the petition resigning from the Union, he would be able to cross the picket line and work the next day. Albright also averred that he asked Schmidt what the benefits and wages would be and Schmidt replied that the wages would be the same and the benefits might be a little better. Albright further testified that Richards was holding the petition and that Richards gave it to Schmidt who in turn handed it to Albright who then signed it.

Richards' testimony was quite different. He averred that he was the one who did the talking at the meeting. According to Richards, he told Albright that the petition was to withdraw from the Union; that he did not feel that the Union was representing them properly; and that it was up to Albright to make his own decision as to whether he wanted to sign it or not. Richards averred that Schmidt said that whatever Albright did would not affect the way he was treated, and that Schmidt never had the petition in his hands.

Schmidt's testimony was basically consistent with that of Richards. He acknowledged that he spoke to a number of employees, but his testimony indicated that he was not certain what he said to each one. He acknowledged that he told Albright, Jackson, and Palfrey that if they honored the picket line he would permanently replace them. He also acknowledged that he told employees that if they crossed the picket line the Union could fine them; that if they wanted to resign from the Union there was a petition going around; and that they were entitled to resign if they wanted to. In addition, he averred that some employees asked him about wages and benefits and he replied that they would be the same.

The demeanor of Albright, Schmidt, and Richards as well as the substance of their testimony gave reason to believe that they were not careful observers of what happened and that their reports were not always accurate. Albright, in particular, appeared to be an honest witness who was easily confused. I am reluctant to rely too heavily on the testimony of any of those three witnesses. Schmidt also spoke to Jackson and Palfrey on the same day that he spoke to Albright. Before speaking to those three employees Schmidt had received advice from his attorney. All three employees testified that Schmidt covered roughly the same subject matter. Though it is possible that Schmidt told different things to the three employees, it is much more likely that he told the same thing to all three. The testimony of Jackson and Palfrey, both of whom were called as witnesses by the General Counsel, was very similar as well as very credible. Jackson in particular appeared to have a very good recollection of exactly what was said. As I believe that Schmidt did make the same statements to Albright, Jackson, and Palfrey, and that Jackson's and Palfrey's recollections of the conversation were more accurate than Albright's, I must conclude that Albright misconstrued some of Schmidt's remarks and that more weight has to be given to the testimony of Jackson and Palfrey.

Jackson credibly testified to the following. He was called into Schmidt's office about 3 p.m. on July 22. Schmidt spoke to him in the presence of Assistant Manager Michael Sears as well as Richards. Schmidt asked him whether he knew that the Union was threatening to strike and might strike as soon as Monday. He replied that he had heard there had been a strike vote but that he was not aware of any strike. Schmidt said that if he were to honor the picket line there would be a permanent replacement hired for him. Schmidt also said that if he crossed the picket line and came to work, there would be a big fine in it. Schmidt then said that there was a way out because there was a petition in the store that was being circulated and that if he resigned from the Union, he would not be subject to a union fine. He then asked what the wages and benefits would be, if he resigned, and Schmidt replied that they would be the same. He replied that he would like to think about it. He did not sign the petition.[5]

[2] Richards had the title of produce manager. However, counsel for the General Counsel stated on the record that he was making no contention that Richards was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

[3] The above findings are based on the credited testimony of Richards and Schmidt, which was in large measure mutually corroborative.

[4] Albright testified that he was called in at 1 p.m. Schmidt and Richards, who were both present during the conversation, testified that it was 9 a.m. As is set forth more fully below, I do not believe that Albright's recollection was always accurate and I credit Schmidt and Richards as to the time.

Palfrey credibly testified to the following. Between 3 and 4 p.m. on July 22 he was called into Schmidt's office where Schmidt spoke to him in the presence of Sears. Schmidt said that there might be a strike the next day. Schmidt also said that if Palfrey crossed the picket line he could be fined and that if Palfrey honored the picket line he would be permanently replaced. Schmidt then told him about the petition. Schmidt also said that if he resigned from the Union, wages would stay the same.

Part of Palfrey's testimony was somewhat ambiguous. At one point Palfrey testified that Schmidt, after talking about the fine, said that if he (Palfrey) resigned from the Union he could keep his job. On cross-examination he averred that Schmidt told him that if he resigned from the Union, wages would remain the same and he could have his job and work. However, Palfrey summed up his testimony by averring that he interpreted Schmidt's remarks to mean that, if he signed the petition, wages would be the same and he would not be faced with the alternative of being fined or being permanently replaced. Palfrey's interpretation was substantially the same as that of Jackson's in his conversation with Schmidt. I believe that Schmidt did tell him the same thing and that Jackson's recollection of the exact wording was more accurate than Palfrey's.[6]

Palfrey did not sign the petition at that time. Later that day he asked Richards where the petition was and Richards told him it was on the wall behind the clipboard. Palfrey then read the petition and signed it.

D. The Interrogation of Albright by Schmidt

All but one of the violations alleged in the complaint related to the incidents that occurred on July 22, 1983. That one additional violation is geared to an alleged conversation that occurred a day or two before September 8, 1983,[7] which was the date the union shop deauthorization election was scheduled to take place. Albright testified that on that day Schmidt spoke to him in front of the office as he was going to work. According to Albright, Schmidt asked whether he knew about the election and he replied that he did. Albright averred that Schmidt then asked what he thought about it and what employees Debbie Grant and Mary Hickman thought. Albright testified that he answered that he did not know and he had not talked to the others.

Schmidt acknowledged that he did talk to some employees about the election. He testified that he asked Mary Hickman whether she had seen the election notice on the checkstand and she told him how she felt about the situation. He also acknowledged that other employees had spoken to him about the election. Schmidt testified that he did not recall any conversation with Albright about September 6 or 7 regarding the election and that he had no knowledge whatsoever of any conversations with Albright pertaining to the election.

The charge in the instant case, which blocked the election, was filed on September 1, 1983. It is a bit difficult to believe that on September 6 or 7 Schmidt asked Albright about an election when the election was not going to take place. Nor is it very clear why Schmidt would be motivated to ask such a question. The election, if it were to be conducted, would have no impact on the store's basic bargaining obligation. The contract had already been signed. There was no strike in the offing nor was there any test of union and company strength. The election related solely to the Union's right to have a union-security clause. While those considerations raise some questions, the real issue turns on credibility. As noted above, I have very little confidence in Albright's ability to accurately report the details of conversations. His testimony does not fit into any pattern of interrogation and there is no direct or collateral corroboration. Schmidt's testimony that he had "no knowledge" of such a conversation, though inartfully worded, did amount to a denial. I do not credit Albright with regard to that alleged conversation and I therefore recommend that paragraph 6 of the complaint be dismissed.

E. Analysis and Conclusions

1. Summary of the findings

Though I have set forth the testimony in some detail, the findings can be simply restated. On the morning of July 22 employee Richards asked Schmidt what language he could use on a petition to resign from the Union. Schmidt consulted with his attorney and then gave Richards the resignation language. Richards incorporated it in a petition. Later that day Schmidt had separate meetings with Albright, Jackson, and Palfrey. He told each of them that a strike was imminent; that if they honored the picket line they would be permanently replaced; that if they came to work through a picket line the Union would fine them; and if they signed the petition to resign

[5] As mentioned above, Schmidt's testimony was often confused and, where it differs from that of Jackson, I credit Jackson. Much of Sears' testimony was basically consistent with that of Jackson. Sears averred that Schmidt told Jackson that if a strike were to take place and if he were a union member and crossed the picket line that he would be fined, but that if he resigned from the Union prior to the pickets going up that he would not be fined and he could continue to work. With regard to other matters, I believe that Jackson's memory was more accurate than that of Sears'. Sears averred that when Jackson asked whether there were going to be any benefits, Schmidt replied that he had not looked into it.

[6] Both Schmidt and Sears testified that they did not recall any specific conversation with Palfrey.

[7] The complaint alleges the conversation took place on or about September 2, 1983. Albright in his testimony placed the conversation on September 6 or 7.

from the Union, the Union could not fine them for working through the picket line. When the employees asked about wages and benefits if they worked through a strike, Schmidt told them that they would be the same. Albright signed the petition in Schmidt's presence, Jackson did not sign the petition, and Palfrey signed the petition at a later time.

2. The language of the petition

In response to Richards' request, Schmidt gave him the language to be used on the petition to withdraw from the Union. The Board has repeatedly held that such conduct does not violate the Act. Mosher Steel Co., 220 NLRB 336, 337 (1975), enfd. 532 F.2d 1374 (5th Cir. 1976) R. L. White Co., 262 NLRB 575, 576 (1982). In the Mosher Steel case, the Board held:

> Absent some evidence that union resignation was a company-imposed condition for returning to work (or that employees were led to believe that it was such a condition), and absent any evidence that the Company did more than furnish employees with resignation language, we decline to find that Respondent's conduct in this regard was unlawful.

In the R. L. White Co., case, the Board held:

> An employer may lawfully inform employees of their right to revoke their authorization cards, even where employees have not solicited such information, as long as the employer makes no attempt to ascertain whether employees will avail themselves of this right nor offers any assistance, or otherwise creates a situation where employees would tend to feel peril in refraining from such revocation.

In the instant case there is no allegation in the complaint that Respondent used the petition as a device for coercively interrogating employees about their union sympathies. It is true that Albright signed the petition in Schmidt's presence. However, there is no indication that Schmidt requested him to do so. Neither Jackson nor Palfrey signed in Schmidt's presence. Cf. Landmark International Trucks, 257 NLRB 1375 (1981), enf. denied 699 F.2d 815 (6th Cir. 1983).

3. The remark about permanent replacement

An employer does not violate the Act when it permanently replaces economic strikers. NLRB v. McKay, 304 U.S. 333 (1938). Nor does an employer violate the Act when it tells employees that it will permanently replace them if they engage in an economic strike. As the Board held in Eagle Comtronics, 263 NLRB 515 (1982):

> [T]he Board has long held that an employer does not violate the Act by truthfully informing employees that they are subject to permanent replacement in the event of an economic strike. The Board has held that such comments do not constitute impermissible threats under Section 8(a)(1) . . . . Unless the statement may be fairly understood as a threat of reprisal against employees or is explicitly coupled with such threats, it is protected by Section 8(c) of the Act.

4. The remark that the Union would fine employees

Schmidt told Albright, Jackson, and Palfrey that the Union would fine them if they worked during a strike. The Union may lawfully fine members who cross a picket line. NLRB v. Allis Chalmers, 388 U.S. 175 (1967). It is not unlawful for an employer to tell employees what the law is. See Mosher Steel Co., supra. Schmidt did say that the Union would fine the employees rather than that the Union could fine the employees. However, if that was Schmidt's opinion, he had the right under Section 8(c) of the Act to express that opinion. Section 8(c) states:

> The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this Act, if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

Even a misstatement of law by an employer will not violate the Act if it is free from any express or implicit threat that the employer by its own actions will interfere with employee rights. Daniel Construction Co., 257 NLRB 1276 (1981). Here Schmidt's statement that the Union would fine employees did not imply that any action would be taken by Respondent that would interfere with Section 7 rights.

5. The remarks about the petition

Schmidt told Albright, Jackson, and Palfrey that if they signed the petition to resign from the Union, the Union could not fine them for working through the picket line. In a sense Schmidt was soliciting those employees to sign the petition. It is not likely that Schmidt made his remarks for purely academic reasons. In some situations the Board has held the solicitation of union resignations or dues checkoff revocations by an employer to be a violation of the Act. See, for example, Peabody Coal Co., 259 NLRB 1409, 1412 (1982); Cardinal Systems, 259 NLRB 456 (1981). In Texaco, 264 NLRB 1132, 1133 (1982), enfd. 722 F.2d 1226 (5th Cir. 1984), the Board held that an employer violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act where it "actively and effectively participated in the process of furthering employee withdrawal from the union." However, where, as in the instant case, the Employer's participation in the process of furthering employee withdrawal from the Union involves nothing more than telling employees the different alternatives they face and the Federal law that relates to those alternatives, then the free speech aspect of Section 8(c) of the Act must be given controlling weight. Schmidt did no more than express his views of the situation and there was no express or implied threat that he would take any unlawful action against employees. Nor does the credited evidence establish that he made any promise of benefits.

In these circumstances I do not believe that any of Schmidt's actions or statements violated the Act as alleged in the complaint. R. L. White Co., supra; Cyclops Corp., 216 NLRB 857 (1975); Nordstrom, 229 NLRB 601, 605 (1977); Mosher Steel, supra; Perkins Machine Co., 141 NLRB 697, 700 (1963).[8]

CONCLUSION OF LAW

The General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the credible evidence that Respondent violated the Act as alleged in the complaint.

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 7 May 1982 the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision, Order, and Certification of Representative in Cases 9–RC–13315 and 9–CB–4595.[1] The Board adopted, as modified, Administrative Law Judge John H. West's recommended findings that the Respondent Union had not violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) as alleged, that the complaint be dismissed, and that the objections to the election be overruled. In so doing, the Board adopted the judge's credibility finding that employee Robert Foote had not promised to waive initiation fees for employees who signed authorization cards before the representation election.[2] Accordingly, the Board certified the Union as collective-bargaining representative in an appropriate unit of the Employer's employees. Thereafter, the Employer refused to bargain with the Union and, in a subsequent proceeding, the Board granted the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and found that the Respondent Employer's refusal to bargain with the Union was violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1).[3]

Thereafter, the Employer petitioned the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit for review of the Board's orders dismissing the complaint in Case 9–CB–4595 and directing the Employer to bargain with the Union in Case 9–CA–18422. The Board cross-applied for enforcement of its bargaining order. On 27 April 1984 the court issued its decision wherein it reversed the Board, set aside the election, and remanded the controversy to the Board for further proceedings consistent with its decision.[4] In so doing, the court found that, under the facts of this case, the judge unreasonably credited employee Foote's denial of having advised employees that union initiation fees would be waived for those who signed union authorization cards before the election and that "it seems clear that . . . Foote was the source of the discussions about waiving initiation fees."[5] The court noted that statements of this nature have been proscribed in Savair,[6] and the court construed such statements to be an unfair labor practice.[7]

Thereafter, the Board accepted the court's remand and notified the parties that they could file statements of position with respect to the issues raised by the remand. Subsequently, the Employer and the Union filed statements of position.

In its statement of position, the Employer argues that further proceedings in Case 9–CA–18422 are unnecessary because the court overturned the credibility findings of the Board and found that Foote made unlawful initiation fee offers to employees while soliciting union cards. Further, according to the Employer, the court implicitly found Foote to be an agent for the Union and overturned the election which was the basis for the Board's bargaining order. The Employer argues that a remedial order should issue in Case 9–CB–4595 because the court reversed the Board's dismissal of the complaint in that case. Finally, the Employer contends that the Board should not direct a second election absent the Union's establishing a current showing of interest because the original showing of interest was tainted by Foote's unlawful offer to waive initiation fees.

In its statement of position, the Union asserted that it does not wish to participate in a second election, and that it no longer desires the Board to process the representation case.

Having accepted the remand of the instant case, we must observe the court's opinion as the law of the case. For this reason we find that the Respondent Union, through its agent Robert Foote, violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by telling employees that union initiation fees would be waived for those who signed union authorization cards prior to the representation election. In remedying this violation, we shall order the Respondent Union to cease and desist from this conduct and to take the appropriate affirmative action. Upon consideration of the Respondent Union's statement of position, we shall further order that the petition in Case 9–RC–13315 be dismissed.

[2] Because of the finding that Foote had not made these statements as alleged, the Board found it unnecessary to consider the issue of whether Foote was an agent for the Respondent Union. The Board also disavowed an adverse inference drawn by the judge based on the General Counsel's failure to call a former employee as a corroborating witness.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that its Decision and Order in Case 9–CB–4595, 261 NLRB 773 (1982), dismissing the complaint in its entirety, is revoked.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Respondent, Bakery, Confectionery and Tobacco Workers International Union, Local No. 213, AFL–CIO–CLC, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Telling employees that union initiation fees will be waived for those who sign a union authorization card prior to a representation election.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its union office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the notice for posting by Krispy Kreme Division, Beatrice Foods Co., if willing, at all places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Board's Decision and Order in Case 9–CA–18422, 264 NLRB No. 131 (1982), finding that the Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union, be revoked and that the complaint be dismissed.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Certification of Representative be revoked and that the petition in Case 9–RC–13315, 261 NLRB 773 (1982), be dismissed.

Neo-Life Company of America and Warehouse, Mail Order & Retail Employees Union, Local 853, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America. Case 32–CA–4529

30 November 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 3 May 1983 Administrative Law Judge Earldean V. S. Robbins issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a copy of his brief to the administrative law judge.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by several statements made in the course of the June 1983 meeting of the Respondent's executive vice president Albert Miller, Patson Lines owner Milford Patterson, and Patson employee William Regan. Miller asked Patterson and Regan to come to his office one morning when Patterson was visiting the Respondent's plant, and he began the meeting by asking Regan why he was attending union meetings with the Respondent's employees. We agree with the judge that this question was coercive within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1).

While Miller asked only one question of a general nature he did so in a coercive context. He was the Respondent's highest official in the warehouse, and calling Regan and Patterson into his office created a setting of unusual formality. Moreover, Miller told Regan he did not want him attending the meetings and Patterson threatened he could lose his job as discussed below. Finally, Miller concluded the meeting by directing Regan not to talk to other employees. In these circumstances the question was coercive.[1]

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by Miller's statements that a strike was inevitable. We agree that Miller's statements about bargaining and a strike violated Section 8(a)(1) for the following reasons. The issue, as we see it, is whether Miller threatened that if the employees selected the Union, the Respondent would violate Section 8(a)(5) by failing to bargain in good faith, thereby forcing a strike.[2] Such threats are coercive and violate Section 8(a)(1); see Peabody Coal Co. v. NLRB, 725 F.2d 357 (6th Cir. 1984); Lawson Co., 267 NLRB 463 (1983); Teamsters Local 164, 267 NLRB 8, 9 (1983); Woodview Rehabilitation Center, 265 NLRB 838, 841 (1982); Kay Motors, 264 NLRB 1030 (1982).

Miller did not say directly that the Respondent would not bargain but that message was implied by a series of statements taken in the context of the entire Regan conversation. According to Regan's credited testimony, Miller told him that if the Respondent's employees voted for the Union the Respondent "would not want to bargain" with it, that the Respondent would have to bargain but would not have to sign a contract, and that if there were no contract a strike would follow, "scabs" would come in, and there would be "a real mess outside."

Miller did not make these statements separately or in isolation, and we must assess their coercive impact taken as a whole. Peabody Coal Co. v. NLRB, supra; Hicks-Ponder Co., 186 NLRB 712, 725 fn. 7 (1970), cited in Eagle Comtronics, 263 NLRB 515 (1982).[3] We find three other unlawful statements in the same conversation with Regan; thus the Respondent demonstrated not only its union animus but its willingness to violate the Act. In this context it can be inferred that if the Respondent did not "want to" nor "have to" sign a contract, it would not sign one and a strike would follow. Thus the Respondent threatened to bargain in bad faith so as to prevent an agreement and force a strike.

We also adopt the judge's finding of an 8(a)(1) violation in the threat that Regan could lose his job. The judge relied for this finding on Patterson's statement to Regan that the Union would insist that the Respondent cancel its contract with Patson Lines; according to Regan's credited testimony, this was presented as a certain result of unionization that the Respondent presumably would be unable or unwilling to resist. In addition we note Patterson's testimony that he told Regan, "[I]f you have a contract . . . that contract is going to come up . . . and any time there's a problem with one of your employees, with one of your clients, there's always the possibility of losing that business." This statement more directly threatened reprisal by the Respondent for Regan's own activity.[4]

[2] That is what the complaint alleged.

[3] In Eagle Comtronics, we held that an employer's incomplete statement of the law is not coercive unless "it may fairly be understood as a threat . . . or is explicitly coupled with . . . threats." 263 NLRB at 516. In that case the employer's statements and omissions were found in a speech that contained no other unlawful statements, and the Board found that no threat was implied. In this case, the Respondent's statements were coupled with other coercive statements. Moreover, we find the threat to force a strike clearly implied in the succession of statements, and not merely by omission. We therefore do not need to consider those statements as an explanation of law that omitted some details.

While Patterson is not employed by the Respondent and Patson Lines is not a respondent in this proceeding, Patterson referred in Miller's presence to action that Miller might or might not take. We find that Miller adopted the statements by his silence and the Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1).[5]

We do not agree with the judge that any of the Respondent's statements to employee Mary Fernandez were unfair labor practices, and we will dismiss those portions of the complaint. Fernandez, a union supporter, squirted water and used obscene language toward a fellow employee who was not a union supporter; that employee reported the incident to a supervisor and Fernandez was given a written warning. Fernandez complained to Supervisor Jack Winter, alleging that she received the warning because of her union sympathies. Winter replied that "none of this would have happened if it were not for Spencer"; Spencer was a discharged prounion employee who at the time was picketing the warehouse. Later Fernandez told Miller that she felt her fellow employee had complained out of antiunion motivation, and Miller replied that "all that was going on with the warehouse had made enemies out of the best of friends."

The judge found that both these statements violated Section 8(a)(1), but on their face they simply observed the intense feelings that the union campaign had generated among employees. Those feelings were not unfair labor practices by the Respondent and its commentary on them implied no threat of reprisal. The Respondent could lawfully express such opinions.

The judge also construed those statements as admissions that the Respondent issued the warning to Fernandez for antiunion reasons; we find no such admission. Fernandez did not say that the Respondent had such motivation, only that her fellow employees did. Both supervisors conceded that that might be true; it does not follow that the Respondent was obliged to examine its employees' motives in reporting one another's misconduct.[6]

[5] The judge found an additional violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act based on Regan's testimony that Miller said something to the effect that the Respondent would get rid of Patson if Regan intended to stay involved in the union problem. However, as the judge noted, Regan did not recall precisely what Miller said. Contrary to the judge, we conclude that this testimony is insufficient to establish a violation.

[6] Member Zimmerman agrees with the judge for the reasons set forth in his opinion that the statements made by Winter and Miller to Fernandez violated Sec. 8(a)(1).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By coercively interrogating employee William Regan concerning his union activity, threatening him with loss of employment, warning him not to discuss the Union with other employees, and threatening not to bargain in good faith if its employees selected the Union to represent them, thereby forcing a strike, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Neo-Life Company of America, Hayward, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Coercively interrogating employees regarding their union activities.

(b) Threatening employees that it will not bargain in good faith with Teamsters Local 853 if the Respondent's employees select it to represent them, thereby forcing a strike.

(c) Threatening employees with loss of employment for engaging in union activities.

(d) Warning employees not to discuss the Union with other employees.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its place of business in Hayward, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[7] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate employees regarding their union activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with loss of employment for engaging in union activity.

WE WILL NOT threaten that we will not bargain in good faith with Teamsters Local 853 if our employees select it as their collective-bargaining representative, and thereby force a strike.

WE WILL NOT warn employees not to discuss the Union with other employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

NEO-LIFE COMPANY OF AMERICA

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

EARLDEAN V. S. ROBBINS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me in Oakland, California, on January 31, 1983. The charge was filed by Warehouse, Mail Order & Retail Employees Union, Local 853, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the Union), on May 24, 1982, and served on Neo-Life Company of America (Respondent), on May 25, 1982. The complaint, which issued on August 26, 1982, alleges that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The principal issue is whether Respondent violated the Act by certain statements and interrogations.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material Respondent, a California corpor-tion with an office and place of busienss in Hayward, California, has been engaged in the manufacture and nonretail distribution of food and supplements, household cleaners, cosmetics, and related goods. During the 12-month period preceding the issuance of the complaint, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, sold and shipped goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that at all times material Respondent has been and employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that the Union is now, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Regan Incident

Respondent utilizes common carriers to make deliveries to its customers. At the times material, Patson Lines has performed delivery services for Respondent under a verbal agreement, terminable at will. A Patson employee, William Regan, is assigned full time to make deliveries for Respondent. Regan works out of Respondent's Hayward, California warehouse,[1] making deliveries in Northern California from the general area of Watsonville to the Russian River. Although he is the only Patson employee working out of the Neo-Life facility, and there is no Patson supervisor at this facility, his work is not directly supervised by Respondent. Milford Patterson, the owner of Patson Lines, visits the Neo-Life facility periodically. Regan is paid weekly by mail and the truck driven by him is garaged at his residence. During an average week, according to Regan, he is actually at the Neo-Life premises 5 to 10 hours at the most. During that period, he does his paperwork, makes out his route, calls distributors to tell them they are going to be receiving products that day, and loads his truck. His work hours depend on the volume of deliveries, which are made in accordance with bills of lading prepared by Respondent's warehouse employees and left in a slot in the warehouse for Regan. Regan picks up the bills of lading, loads his vehicle, and proceeds to make the required deliveries.

In the spring of 1982, the Union commenced an organizing campaign among Respondent's warehouse employees. Regan became aware of the Union's campaign through Mike Spencer, an employee of Respondent,[2] and thereafter attended two of the Union's organizing meetings. A representation petition was filed with the Board in May 1982.[3] An election was held on July 30. The Union lost the election and a certification of election results issued in December.

[1] The main Patson facility is located in Southern California.

[2] Spencer was subsequently discharged by Respondent and picketed Respondent's facility in protest of his discharge.

Regan testified that sometime in May or June, around the time that Spencer, a union activist, was discharged,[4] Patterson was at the Neo-Life facility. Patterson and Regan went to a restaurant for breakfast. Shortly after they returned to the warehouse, between 10:30 and 11:30 a.m.,[5] they were summoned to the office of Albert Miller, executive vice president of Respondent.[6] According to Regan, when he and Patterson arrived at Miller's office, Miller asked why Regan was attending union meetings. Regan said a notice of the meeting was posted for everyone to see and he did not feel he was violating anything by attending the meeting. Miller said he did not want Regan attending the meeting. Regan said his interest was academic, that he considered himself to be the best educated person in the warehouse and he was looking after the interests of his fellow workers for whom he felt a certain amount of compassion; so he attended the union meetings to ensure that the Union was not offering the employees a "bum deal." Miller said it was not necessary for Regan to attend the meetings, that he would explain the process to Regan.

Miller then stated, according to Regan, that if the employees were to vote for the Union, Respondent would not want to bargain with the Union, a strike would ensue, "scabs" would come in and there would be a "real mess outside." However, Regan admits that Miller also said that if the employees did vote for the Union, Respondent would have to bargain with the Union but would not have to sign a contract. Miller said he did not feel there was a need for a union and explained why. Miller further said that the problem with the country and business these days was unions and he cited two examples—the closure of Shaklee in Hayward and the closure of General Motors. Miller said something to the effect that if Regan intended to stay involved in this union problem, he would get rid of Patson; however, Regan does not recall precisely what he said.

Regan further testified that Patterson said, "We don't want you going to these union meetings. If we get a union into this company, Patson Lines would be out the door." Patterson also said that the Union would not want Patson, a nonunion employer, in there, that the Union would bring its own union drivers and Patson's contract would "be kaput." Both Miller and Patterson told Regan not to talk to Respondent's employees about the union problem. Regan promised that he would not attend union meetings and that he would not talk to the warehouse employees. Miller said that when the new warehouse was finished, they were going to locate Regan's office at the back of the warehouse. Regan said, since he was a problem to them, why did they not lay him off. Both Miller and Patterson said there was no need for that, they did not want to lay him off. Patterson instructed Regan not to get involved in the union problem. The conversation lasted approximately 30 to 45 minutes.

According to Regan, when he left Miller's office, a warehouse employee, Tara, apologized to him for telling Miller that he had gone to the union meeting. Further, Regan testified, as he walked through the warehouse, he told employees that he could not talk to them any longer and that he was going to be moved to the back of the warehouse when it was completed. Employee Fred Lemmo asked Regan what had happened. Regan told Lemmo that he was instructed not to talk to the employees because of the union problem and that he was going to be moved to the back of the warehouse when it was completed. He told other employees that he could not talk to them, that he had been banished.

Miller admits that he did have a meeting with Regan in mid-June. According to him, he had observed Regan talking to other employees in the warehouse on several occasions and was concerned about Regan being disruptive. He therefore telephoned Patterson and requested a meeting with Patterson and Regan on Patterson's next visit to the Neo-Life facility. According to Miller, the meeting occurred between 9 and 10 a.m. Miller began the conversation by asking Regan why he was attending a union meeting with Respondent's employees. Regan said he was just curious, he did not understand what was going on, and he went out of curiosity. He said he had no experience with union activity. Miller explained to him the basic procedures—that employees signed cards for representation, then there would be a petition to the NLRB for an election date and, if the election was in favor of union representation, Respondent would sit down and negotiate a contract; but, in the event they were unable to reach agreement on a contract, the alternative would be a strike by the employees.

At this point, according to Miller, Patterson told Regan he should not be involved in the internal affairs of Respondent. Regan suggested that Patterson did not want to create problems and that perhaps Regan should be laid off. Patterson said, no, that was not the point, that he was concerned about his business should the warehouse become union. He mentioned his experience with Shaklee and said that, if there were a union warehouse, there might be problems with Patson not being able to pick up orders or work out of the warehouse. Patterson said Regan had an assigned area, his responsibility was to transport Respondent's products which he could pick up at the back door where they were staged for him, so it was not necessary that he talk to all the warehouse employees.

Miller denies saying that, if employees voted for the Union, Respondent would not bargain with the Union, or that, if employees voted for the Union a strike would definitely occur. He admits explaining to Regan that, if the agreement was not reached, the alternative was a strike. According to him, his statements to Regan on this subject were no different than those made to Respondent's employees. He denies saying to Regan that if the employees voted for the Union, "scabs" would come in. He further denies stating that if Regan intended to stay involved with the Union, he would get rid of Patson Lines or instructing Regan not to talk to Respondent's employees regarding the Union. On cross-examination, Miller testified that when he explained to Regan that if the Union won the election, Respondent would be obligated to bargain in good faith, Regan asked "what happens if you don't reach agreement"; to which Miller responded that the alternative would be a strike, that the employees would have the right to strike but Respondent would have the option of hiring additional employees in such event. Patterson voiced concern that, if Respondent's operation were to become union, it would be detrimental to Patson and related an experience that he had with Shaklee. He said he had no contract with Respondent, and if the warehouse became union there was a possibility that Patson, a nonunion carrier, would not be allowed to haul out of the warehouse. Patterson further said he did not want Regan interfering in Respondent's operation, that Regan was a Patson employee, not a Neo-Life employee, and Patterson did not want his business jeopardized.

Patterson testified that within a month or two prior to this conversation, Miller casually mentioned to him that Regan was known to talk a lot. There is no evidence that Patterson ever related this to Regan. Patterson did testify that prior thereto he had admonished Regan about excessive conversation with Respondent's employees. A month or two later, according to Patterson, Miller telephoned him requesting a meeting the next time Patterson was at the Neo-Life facility regarding some problems with Regan. Patterson inquired as to the nature of the problems but Miller said they would get into it when Patterson arrived. Patterson was not sure whether Miller told him at that particular time that Regan was observed talking to Mike Spencer on the picket line.

Two or three days later, Regan and Patterson met with Miller in his office.[7] According to Patterson, Miller asked Regan why he was attending the union meetings. Regan said he was there for informational purposes, out of curiosity to see what was going on. Miller then explained the union organizational and election process; however, Patterson cannot recall his exact words. Patterson told Regan that he was concerned regarding Regan talking to employees or creating any problems whatsoever with the employees. He explained to Regan that he could not create any problems with the Company with which he was doing business, that anything regarding union problems could have an effect on Patson Lines. He said he had experience with this before when he was doing business with Shaklee in the early 1970s and they had a union problem. Patterson said Regan's job was to deliver the product and keep as extreme a low profile as possible. He said that any problems could jeopardize Patson's business which constitutes Regan's job also, since the two were hooked together; that Regan works for Patson and if Patson does not have any business, then Regan is in trouble. Regan agreed this was true and said, "If it is going to be a case of you losing your business, I would rather that you lay me off," or either he said, "I'll quit." Patterson said, "I am not here to lay you off or fire you, I am just here to get things straightened out and prevent the problems before anything further develops." Patterson further said, "I'm not interested in creating problems, I just want to prevent problems."

Patterson testified that he said Regan was a Patson employee, he had nothing to do with Respondent's operation, that his job was to pick up the product in the morning and deliver it. Patterson also said that if there is a problem with a client, as a common carrier, somewhere down the line the contract is going to come up and there is always the possibility of losing that business, that all a client has to do is pick up the telephone and say, "We have no pickups today," and you don't pick up until they call you again. According to Patterson, he does not recall Miller saying if employees voted for the Union, there would definitely be a strike. He denies that Miller said if Regan remained involved with the Union he would get rid of Patson or that Miller instructed Regan not to talk to employees about the Union. Nor does he recall any conversation about the possibility of a strike except that when he was explaining to Regan the situation that existed with Shaklee, he could have said that if Respondent's employees went out on strike Patson could possibly be hurt.

I credit Regan as to the conversation with Miller and Patterson. He impressed me as an honest, reliable witness and, in view of the timing and other circumstances, Regan's version seems the more probable one. Thus, Miller testified that the purpose of the meeting was to express his concern that Regan's talking was generally disruptive and both Miller and Patterson deny that Regan was instructed not to talk to employees regarding the Union. Yet, even though Regan had been talking to warehouse employees for several months, it was only after he attended the union meetings that Miller found his activities to be unacceptable. In this regard, Patterson testified that the only previous mention of Regan talking to employees was a casual comment by Miller in April or May that Regan was known to "talk a lot." The casualness of the comment is underscored by the fact that Patterson apparently did not relate to Regan that Miller was concerned regarding him talking to warehouse employees.[8] There is no evidence that talking among the employees in the warehouse or between Regan and Respondent's employees had previously been discouraged by Respondent or that Regan's verbal contacts with Respondent's employees had increased or, beyond Miller's bare assertions, that such contacts were actually disruptive.

It is undisputed that Miller requested the meeting, stating that he wanted to discuss problems with regard to Regan and, according to Patterson, this may have been the time that Miller said he had observed Regan talking to Spencer on the picket line. It is further undisputed that Miller commenced the meeting by asking why Regan had attended union organizational meetings. Thus, at the outset, he clearly identified his principal concern and, even if I credited Patterson's or Miller's version of the conversation, there was no discussion of Regan's conduct being disruptive except insofar as it related to union activities. In these circumstances, I conclude that Regan was called into Miller's office for the purpose of admonishing him with regard to union activities and that the enusing conversation made this purpose clear. I further conclude that the instructions to Regan not to talk to Respondent's employees were intended to restrict Regan's union activities and could reasonably be expected to be so understood by him, even assuming arguendo that this intention was not explicitly stated. Accordingly, I find that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act despite Responden't's contention that Miller's various statements and his interrogation of Regan regarding why he had attended union meetings were not coercive since they were not directed toward a Neo-Life employee. This argument is not persuasive. It is well settled that an employer may violate Section 8(a) of the Act by actions affecting employees with whom it does not have an immediate employer-employee relationship. Lucky Stores, 243 NLRB 642 (1979). Here, Miller initiated the meeting, and made it clear at the outset that he was concerned about Regan's union activities and Miller and Patterson, in Miller's presence, made it clear that Regan's continued employment depended on Respondent. In these circumstances, I also find that Miller's interrogation of Regan was coercive and therefore violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[7] Patterson does not recall whether he had breakfast with Regan that morning.

I further find that Miller's statements regarding a strike and the threat to cease doing business with Patson constituted threats as to the inevitability of a strike and consequent disruption of Regan's employment and a threat of loss of employment if the Union was selected as the collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees. Accordingly, I find that these statements violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

B. The Fernandez Incident

Mary Fernandez, who was employed in Respondent's warehouse from March until the first part of August, testified, without contradiction, that in June she received a written warning for using obscene language and squirting a fellow employee from a squirt bottle on work premises. Thereafter, she told Warehouse Manager Jack Winters, an admitted supervisor, that she felt the reason she was written up for swearing was because she was extremely prounion and was outspoken in this regard. Winter said none of this would have happened "if it was not for Spencer out there."[9] Fernandez further testified, again without contradiction, that several days later she told Miller she did not feel that it was fair that she was written up for swearing because at one time or another swearing had been done by every person in the warehouse, including Winter and Miller. She further said that the person who made the complaint with regard to the squirt bottle knew that it had not been aimed at her and that she felt that the reason for the complaint was because she was prounion and people thought that she was taking Mike Spencer's place as a union activist. Miller said that all that was going on with the warehouse had made enemies out of the best of friends. I find, in the context of Fernandez' statements that she felt that the complaint against her and the resulting warning were motivated by her prounion sympathies and the failure of Winter and Miller to deny any unlawful motivation as to the warnings, that the statements made by Winter and Miller were violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by coercively interrogating an employee regarding his union activities; by threatening an employee with loss of employment and the inevitability of a strike and the consequent disruption of his employment if the Union were selected as the collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees; by telling an employee that the employees' union activities had made enemies out of the best of friends, that other employees would not have made complaints against her and she would not have received a written disciplinary warning if it had not been for the employees' union activities; and by warning an employee not to discuss the Union with other employees.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

30 November 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 27 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Giannasi issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief in support of the decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, The E. B. Malone Corporation, Bassett Bedding Division, Amherst, New Hampshire, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] Chairman Dotson and Member Hunter find it unnecessary to rely on J. P. Hamer Lumber Co., 241 NLRB 613 (1979), in adopting the judge's decision.

[3] We will issue a new notice to conform with the judge's recommended Order.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge, discipline, or otherwise discriminate against our employees in regard to their hire or tenure of employment or any terms or condition of their employment because they engage in protected concerted activity.

WE WILL NOT interrogate our employees concerning their participation in protected concerted activity.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Robert Pickens and Jerry Rush full and immediate reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and WE WILL make them and Edward Leonard whole for any loss of earnings or benefits they may have suffered as a result of their unlawful discharges, plus interest.

WE WILL expunge from our files any reference to the discharges of Robert Pickens, Edward Leonard, and Jerry Rush and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

THE E. B. MALONE CORPORATION, BASSETT BEDDING DIVISION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GIANNASI, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried on November 28, 1983, in Boston, Massachusetts. The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging employees Robert Pickens, Edward Leonard, and Jerry Rush for engaging in protected concerted activities, more precisely, for refusing to work overtime in order to protest Respondent's policy regarding employee telephone use. It also alleges as violative of Section 8(a)(1) the coercive interrogation of employees. The Respondent filed an answer denying the substantive allegations of the complaint. The General Counsel filed a posttrial brief in support of the complaint. The Respondent failed to file a brief.

On the entire record, including the testimony of the witnesses and my observation of their demeanor, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent, a Florida corporation, operates a plant in Amherst, New Hampshire, where it is engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of matresses, box springs, and related products. In the course of its operations, Respondent annually receives goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of New Hampshire and ships products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside of New Hampshire. Accordingly, I find, as Respondent admits, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE ALLEGATIONS

A. The Facts

On February 9, 1983, the date of the incident which precipitated this litigation, Respondent employed 10 people at its Amherst plant. The supervisory staff was composed of Orville Dale Cooney, known as Dale Cooney, and David Cooney. Dale Cooney is the highest official at the Amherst location and he serves as the operations manager; he reports to the regional manager of Respondent. David Cooney is his son, his plant foreman, and served as acting plant superintendent from about January 10, 1983, until the end of March 1983. Dale's wife, Stella, was the office clerk or secretary. The remainder of the work force was composed of six production employees and one truckdriver. None of Respondent's employees are represented by a union.

In January 1983, the employees worked a normal workweek—7 a.m. to 3:30—with a one-half hour lunchbreak and two 15-minute breaks. During the first week in February, the employees were notified that they would be required to work an extra hour per day the following week, beginning on Monday, February 7, 1983, because of an increased workload. Employee Robert Pickens was notified orally by David Cooney of the overtime schedule on Wednesday, February 2. Employee Edward Leonard was also similarly notified orally by David Cooney.[1]

On Monday, February 7, the first day of the scheduled overtime, the employees did not work overtime because they were released early due to a snowstorm. On Tuesday, February 8, Leonard, who performed shipping and receiving work and sometimes drove a truck, was told to stay home because low production on Monday meant no shipping work was available on Tuesday. Pickens did work on Tuesday and he worked the required overtime until 4:30 p.m.

On Friday, February 4, David Cooney approached Robert Pickens and other employees eating lunch in the break area of the plant. He complained that the employees were spending too much time in the restroom and were talking excessively during working hours and that, as a result, production had decreased. None of the employees responded to his criticism.

During the day on Tuesday, February 8, David Cooney again approached Robert Pickens and other employees during lunch. He again complained that the employees were spending too much time in the restroom and talking too much during working hours. One employee tried to joke about Cooney's complaint that lights were left on in the restroom, but Cooney cut him off by stating that he did not "like wisecracks."

The next day, Wednesday, February 9, Cooney again approached Pickens and a group of employees during lunch. Cooney told them that they could no longer use the telephone in the office except for emergencies. Pickens and another person complained that the employees had not abused the privilege of using the telephone which was situated in the plant superintendent's office and was the only telephone in the plant to which the employees had access. Pickens also made a remark to the effect that the Respondent was a "Communist company."[2]

After Cooney left, the employees discussed his remarks concerning the use of the telephone and there were comments that Respondent's policy in this respect was "not fair." During the afternoon break at 2:30 p.m., Pickens and the same employees who had been present during lunch discussed what they perceived as an unfair change in policy concerning the use of the telephone. Pickens said that in view of Respondent's treatment of the employees—complaints during the lunch period and a prohibition against the use of the telephone—the employees should "all leave at the regular quitting time." All of the employees agreed that they should leave at 3:30 that afternoon. One employee, Leonard, told Pickens that he already had permission to leave early for personal reasons. The employees returned to work after the end of the break.

At 3:30 the employees all left their work stations, punched out, and left the building.[3] As they were leaving, Dale Cooney saw them and said, "I thought you guys were working overtime tonight." According to Pickens' testimony, he responded, "Well, we're not because you're not going to let us use the phone." The employees then left the plant.[4]

[1] Dale Cooney testified that employees were ordinarily verbally advised of required overtime or "extended workweek" schedules 1 week in advance and that, subsequently, a confirming written notice would be posted on the employees' bulletin board. He further testified that such a notice was in fact posted during the first week of February. According to Dale Cooney, the notice was written and posted by David Cooney. David Cooney did not testify in this proceeding. No such notice was provided or submitted in evidence since, according to Cooney, it had been thrown away or destroyed. The only two employees who testified in this proceeding, Pickens and Leonard, stated that they did not see any such notice.

[2] Respondent's employee handbook—which apparently governs companywide operations and is not limited to Respondent's Amherst plant—provides that "Employees are not permitted to receive telephone calls or messages during working hours, except in cases of emergency." The handbook is silent with respect to outgoing telephone calls. Despite the handbook rule, however, there is considerable evidence to the effect that the rule was not strictly followed at the Amherst plant prior to February 9, 1984. Employees were regularly allowed to receive and to make nonemergency personal calls and they did so with permission during lunch and breaks. Whatever the exact nature of the rule before February 9, the Respondent clearly meant to enforce the rule more strictly after February 9 and the employees perceived a change in policy in the use of the telephone.

[3] Six employees left the building at the same time: Robert Pickens, Rush, Leonard, Dana Gauthier, Peter Pasquali, and Mark Pickens. All were expected to work until 4:30 p.m., with the exception of Leonard, who was given permission to leave early, and Mark Pickens, a new employee who was not required to work overtime. A seventh employee, the truckdriver, was also not required to work overtime, but nevertheless remained at work to help David Cooney start a truck.

[4] Pickens' testimony in this regard was corroborated by both Leonard and Cooney himself. Leonard testified that, in response to Cooney's in-

Neither Pickens nor any other employee indicated that they would refuse to work overtime on any day other than February 9, 1983.

That same afternoon, David Cooney called several of the employees at home. According to Pickens' uncontradicted testimony, David Cooney talked to Pickens and asked him about not working overtime that evening. Pickens responded that Respondent treated the employees with "disrespect" and that they would treat Respondent "the same way." Cooney simply said, "Thanks a lot, we'll be seeing you."

Dale Cooney testified that he subsequently had a conversation with David Cooney at approximately 4:30 that afternoon. David informed him that he had spoken with some of the employees by telephone and had been told that the employees "had a meeting at the break time and because of the use of the telephone they decided they'd leave at 3:30."

The next day, February 10, several of the employees arrived at the plant at the usual starting time prepared to go to work. When Pickens came into the plant, David Cooney asked him what he was "doing here." Pickens said he "came to work." According to Pickens, the remainder of the conversation went as follows:

> And he said, "You don't work here any more." And I said, "You didn't tell me that last night." And he goes, "Well, you're fired." And I said, "For what reason?" And he says, "No reason." I said, "Pretty good, Dave, there's no reason to fire me." And then his father, Dale Cooney, came around the corner and said, "Get out of here you don't work here any more." And I said, "Well, why was I fired?" And he goes, "For a unionized meeting." And I said, "Okay, I'll be back to pick my check up on Friday." And I left. And I think because I left I might have muttered an obscenity under my breath.[5]

Employees Edward Leonard and Jerry Rush arrived at the plant about 7 a.m. on February 10. When they approached the timecard rack they noticed that their timecards were missing. David Cooney then approached them and asked them to come to his father Dale's office. All three men went to the office where they met with Dale Cooney. Dale Cooney asked Rush if he participated in a "little meeting." Rush said, "I talked to Scott Pickens, if that's what you mean." Dale Cooney then asked Leonard the same question. Leonard replied that he did not, but that Pickens had asked him to leave at 3:30 p.m. with the other employees and that he told Pickens that he already had permission to leave at 3:30 p.m. Dale Cooney then again asked if he had participated in the meeting and Leonard simply said, "No." Dale Cooney then said, "You're both terminated for participating in an illegal meeting."

The above accounts of what transpired on February 10 are based on the credited testimony of Leonard and Pickens who impressed me as candid and reliable witnesses. Dale Cooney's account of the conversations did not include the reference to meetings held by the employees the day before. Cooney also denied that Leonard mentioned that he had permission to leave early the day before. According to Cooney, he simply asked Leonard and Rush if they knew they were supposed to work until 4:30 p.m. and when they said they did, he fired them. He did admit, however, that Rush attempted to interject "something about the telephone and I informed him that I did not want to discuss the telephone." The accounts of Pickens and Leonard are more plausible. First of all, Pickens testified that Dale Cooney had mentioned participation in a "unionized meeting" as the reason for his discharge. That testimony is thus compatible with that of Leonard that Cooney was concerned with the meeting itself. In contrast, Cooney's testimony concerning the subject of meetings was contradictory and thus unreliable. He originally testified that he became aware of the employee meeting concerning telephone privileges on the afternoon of February 9, after being so informed by his son David, who had learned of the meeting during his postwalkout telephone conversations with employees. Subsequently, however, Cooney testified that he could not have possibly mentioned a meeting in his February 10 conversations with Pickens, Leonard, and Rush, because, at that juncture, he was unaware of the employees having had any meeting. Second, Dale Cooney's denial that any mention was made in this meeting by Leonard that he had permission to leave early is implausible. It is uncontested that David Cooney did indeed grant Leonard permission to leave early. According to Dale Cooney, he was first notified of this fact sometime in March when an investigator for the state unemployment compensation commission called him with this information. He then checked with his son, David Cooney, verified that Leonard had permission to leave early and, on March 9, 1983, offered Leonard reinstatement. It is inconceivable to me that the Cooneys would not have known about Leonard having had permission to leave early or that Leonard—with his job on the line—would have failed to mentioned it during the discharge interview. I find it more likely that Leonard did mention the fact, as he testified. For these reasons, I find Leonard's version of the February 10 meeting more credible than Dale Cooney's version and I also find credible Pickens' testimony that Dale Cooney mentioned a "unionized meeting" in their conversation on the same day.

B. Discussion and Analysis

Respondent admits that it discharged employees Pickens, Leonard, and Rush because they walked out at 3:30 p.m. on February 9 and refused to work overtime on that day.[6] The remarks of Dale Cooney to the terminatquiry concerning the employees working overtime, Pickens responded, "No, because you won't let us use the phone." And Cooney admitted that Pickens advised him that the employees were leaving at 3:30 p.m. because "[Y]ou cannot make us work overtime and you will not let us use the telephone."

[5] Dale Cooney denied that he mentioned anything to Pickens about a "unionized meeting." He testified that, on seeing Pickens that morning, he informed Pickens that he was "no longer employed there" and told him to leave. Pickens asked for an explanation but Cooney refused to give him one.

ed employees on February 10 confirms not only the reason for the discharges, but also Respondent's concern over the employees' walking out and the meeting that preceded it. It is clear that the walkout, instigated by Pickens, was based on his and other employees' concern at Respondent's change in policy regarding the use of the telephone. This was a working condition and a legitimate concern of the employees. They discussed the problem, decided in concert to withhold their labor, and walked out together in protest over the matter. The employees' action was thus a traditional concerted protected activity under Section 7 of the Act and their discharge for such activity is violative of the Act. See NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9 (1962); Audio Systems, 239 NLRB 1316 (1979); J. P. Hamer Lumber Co., 241 NLRB 613 (1979).[7]

Although protests involving full-scale strikes—a complete withholding of services—are undeniably protected, it is clear that a single concerted refusal to work overtime, in protest of a condition of employment, is also protected by the Act. See Hamer, 241 NLRB at 619; Gulf-Wandes Corp., 233 NLRB 772, 776 (1977); Polytech Inc., 195 NLRB 695 (1972). As the Board stated in Polytech, 195 NLRB at 695:

> [There is] a presumption that a single concerted refusal to work overtime is a protected strike activity; and that such presumption should be deemed rebutted when and only when the evidence demonstrates that the stoppage is part of a plan or pattern of intermittent action which is inconsistent with a genuine strike or genuine performance by employees of the work normally expected of them by the employer.

The evidence herein shows that the employees' protest was a single concerted refusal to work overtime and it was not a part of a plan of intermittent action. The employees had worked overtime the day before. They expressed no intent to continue to refuse to work overtime after February 9. And they reported for work at the usual time the next day. Respondent failed to establish that the employees had embarked on a plan of intermittent action. Respondent did not even attempt to find out about whether there would be any other disruptions. In Respondent's view, one refusal was enough to cause the discharge. Indeed, Cooney seemed as interested in the fact that the employees had a meeting—the essence of concerted activity—as in the walkout itself. In these circumstances, the evidence clearly supports a finding of a violation.[8]

According to the credited testimony of employee Leonard, Dale Cooney repeatedly interrogated both him and employee Rush about whether they participated "in a little meeting." Cooney elicited from each the fact that they had participated in a meeting with Pickens where the employees talked about walking out in protest of working conditions. Of course, the meeting of employees, on their own time, to discuss working conditions and the possibility of engaging in protected activity is itself protected concerted activity. Such inquiries were made in a coercive setting in the office of a high management official in circumstances where discharge was imminent. There was no lawful purpose for the questioning—which clearly delved into matters protected under the Act—and there were no assurances given against reprisals. Indeed, reprisals were in fact taken because employees engaged in protected activites. In these circumstances, the interrogation was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By discharging employees Robert Pickens, Edward Leonard, and Jerry Rush for engaging in concerted protected activities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[9]

2. By interrogating Edward Leonard and Jerry Rush as to whether they participated in concerted protected activities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. The above violations constitute unfair labor pratices which affect interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

I shall recommend that Respondent cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found herein. Having found that Respondent unlawfully terminated employees Pickens, Leonard, and Rush, I shall recommend that it be ordered to offer employees Pickens and Rush full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if these jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them and employee Leonard whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered because of Respondent's unlawful conduct.[10] The amounts due to the [T]he reason for the discharge of the three employees is that, contrary to company policy and the best interest of their employer and, after previously agreeing to work additional time on February 9, 1983, they left their work stations without cause or provocation.

[7] It is clear, under the above authorities, that the protection of the Act does not turn on the reasonableness of the demand, whether there was advance notice to the employer of the walkout, or whether prior demand had been made for a change in the working condition protested. In this case, however, the Respondent was well aware, prior to the discharges, that the employees objected to the Respondent's telephone policy and that the walkout was a protest of that policy. Pickens mentioned this concern to Dale Cooney as he was walking out. David Cooney learned of this concern when he talked to several employees on the telephone after they walked out and arrived at their homes and he relayed the information to his father. And Dale Cooney admittedly cut off Jerry Rush during the February 10 meeting when Rush tried to object to the telephone policy being "unfair." Dale Cooney testified

[8] Even though employee Leonard may have left early because he had permission to do so, Respondent's discharge of him with the others was also unlawful because it believed he too was engaged in protected concerted activity. See Audio Systems, 239 NLRB at 1319 fn. 9, and cases there cited.

[9] Employees Gauthier and Pasquali were also terminated apparently as a result of the walkout of February 9. The orginal charge filed by Pickens alleged five discriminatory firings. However, the complaint alleged violations only as to the discharge of Pickens, Rush, and Leonard.

[10] I do not order the reinstatement of Leonard since he was offered and declined reinstatement. The General Counsel does not request that he be ordered reinstated employees shall be computed as provided in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[11]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The Respondent, E. B. Malone Corporation, Bassett Bedding Division, Amherst, New Hampshire, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging, disciplining, or otherwise discriminating against employees in regard to their hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition thereof because they engage in protected concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act.

(b) Interrogating employees concerning their participation in concerted protected activity.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to employees Robert Pickens and Jerry Rush immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges of Robert Pickens, Edward Leonard, and Jerry Rusch and notify them in writing that this has been done and that their discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its place of business in Amherst, New Hampshire, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[13] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

of Rush even though he was rehired in June 1983 because the evidence shows that he was rehired at a lower wage than he was receiving at the time of his termination and he was apparently treated as a new employee.

[11] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[12] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[13] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Best Mechanical Contractors, Inc. and G & R Contractors, Inc. and United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local No. 119. Case 15–CA–8824

30 November 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 5 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Irwin H. Socoloff issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, Respondent G & R Contractors, Inc. filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent Best Mechanical Contractors, Inc. filed a brief in opposition to the exceptions of the General Counsel and the Charging Party.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

IRWIN H. SOCOLOFF, Administrative Law Judge. On a charge filed on December 14, 1982, by United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local No. 119, against Best Mechanical Contractors, Inc. and G & R Contractors, Inc. (Respondents), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 15, issued a complaint dated January 31, 1983, alleging violations by Respondents of Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondents, by their answers, denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to notice, a trial was held before me in Mobile, Alabama, on March 21 and 22, 1983, at which all parties were represented by counsel and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce evidence. Thereafter, the parties filed briefs which have been duly considered.

On the entire record in this case, and from my observations of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent Best is an Alabama corporation, engaged at its Mobile, Alabama locale in the business of mechanical contracting. Annually, in the course and conduct of its business operations, it purchases and receives goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Alabama. I find that Respondent Best is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Respondent G & R, alleged in the complaint as the alter ego of Respondent Best, is an Alabama corporation, engaged, at its Mobile, Alabama locale, in the business of mechanical contracting.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local No. 119 (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent Best has, for many years, been affiliated with Mobile Mechanical Contractors Association, Inc., a multiemployer bargaining association of Mobile, Alabama area employers in the mechanical contracting business. The plumber and pipefitter employees of those employers are represented by the Union. The Association, on behalf of its affiliates, and the Union have been parties to a series of multiemployer collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which is effective July 15, 1982, to July 14, 1984. Respondent Best is bound to that agreement.

In the fall of 1982, M. H. Best Sr., the founder, principal owner, and chairman of the board of Respondent Best, decided to close down the business because of the huge losses suffered in the preceding 3 years and the lack of contracts for future work. He so advised his son-in-law, R. J. Wagner, president of Respondent Best, and his son, George Best, a director and supervisor of that Company, both of whom were minority shareholders. Thereafter, Wagner and George Best decided to form their own contracting business, and they created Respondent G & R. That Respondent has refused to honor the Association's contract with the Union.

In the instant case, the General Counsel contends, and Respondents deny, that Respondent G & R is the alter ego of Respondent Best, created in an unlawful effort to avoid the obligations imposed by the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. The General Counsel urges that Respondents, by refusing to recognize the Union as collective-bargaining representative of Respondent G & R's plumber and pipefitter employees, and apply the contract, violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. It is also alleged that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act when Respondent Best discharged, and Respondent G & R did not hire, certain unit employees.

B. Facts[1]

Respondent Best and predecessor companies owned and operated by M. H. Best Sr. have been engaged in the plumbing and pipefitting business in Mobile, Alabama, since 1946. In the fall of 1982, that Respondent had three corporate directors, including M. H. Best Sr., chairman of the board, who owned 175 shares, or 77 percent, of the corporation's stock. The other directors were Best's son-in-law, R. J. Wagner, president, who owned 38 shares of stock, and Best's son, George Best, who owned 10 shares. The only other shareholder was Barbara Wagner, R. J. Wagner's wife, who owned five shares. While M. H. Best Sr. determined company policies, Wagner ran the day-to-day business of Respondent Best and George Best supervised the field employees and construction operations.

During the 3-year period ending October 31, 1982, Respondent Best suffered operating losses in excess of $200,000. The total assets of the Company fell from $1,204,544 to $420,172, while shareholder equity went from $546,100 to $361,549. In light of this financial picture, M. H. Best Sr. became concerned that, at his advanced age, his assets might be wiped out. The corporation's accountant advised him to liquidate the business.

In September 1982, Best told Wagner that Respondent Best would go out of business. Best Sr. cited the financial decline and stated that the Company was not getting new contracts and was losing money at the rate of $20,000 to $30,000 per month. At a board of directors meeting held on September 30, 1982, Best Sr. formally announced his decision to close the business due to financial losses and a lack of work. Noting that he, personally, owned the building leased to Respondent Best, Best Sr. stated that he would seek to lease it to another contractor. He further stated his intention to sell Respondent Best's furniture, fixtures, and equipment. Best Sr. directed that no new work be sought or accepted and he asked for the resignations, as officers and directors, of Wagner and George Best, stating his intention to pay them their salaries through December 31, 1982. Best Sr. also ordered that an independent appraisal he obtained to determine the value of the office furniture, fixtures, and equipment.

On October 12, 1982, at a shareholder's meeting, M. H. Best Sr. was, at his request, elected as the sole member of Respondent Best's board of directors. At that meeting, Wagner inquired whether Best Sr. would lease the building to Wagner and George Best if they decided to organize their own mechanical contracting company. Best Sr. stated that he would be happy to do so, at market value rental. Wagner also asked about purchase of Respondent Best's furniture, fixtures, and equipment at book value. Best Sr. stated that he would not sell those items at book value, but only at appraised value. Following the stockholder's meeting, at a director's meeting, M. H. Best Sr. elected himself both president and secretary of Respondent Best.

During October 1982, Wagner and George Best decided to form their own company and, on October 25, Respondent G & R was incorporated. Its initial capital was $14,000. The sole shareholders were Wagner, the president, who owned 50 shares of stock, and George Best, the secretary-treasurer, who owned 40 shares. M. H. Best Sr. had no interest, financial or otherwise, in Respondent G & R. In view of Respondent G & R's thin capitalization, Wagner and George Best decided to seek the small jobs which had not been performed by Respondent Best, a large contractor that, normally, had sought major work. They also decided that Respondent G & R would commence its operations as a nonunion contractor.

On or about November 15, 1982, Respondent G & R entered into a lease agreement with M. H. Best Sr. thereby renting a portion, but not all, of the building theretofore occupied by Respondent Best.[2] The lease was for a 6-month term, at a rental fee of $1500 per month, commencing on November 15. Respondent G & R has since made all rental payments, starting that November. Also on November 15, Respondent Best entered into an agreement to sell to Respondent G & R certain of its furniture, fixtures, and equipment at appraised value as determined by independent appraisers. Thereafter, on December 17, after appraisal had been obtained, the parties executed a bill of sale. At that time, Respondent G & R signed a promissory note in the amount of $84,200, representing the full appraised value of the purchased material. The note was payable, without interest, on June 15, 1983. The parties also executed a collateral security agreement under which Respondent Best retained a security interest in the property sold to Respondent G & R.

In early November 1982, George Best met with the employees of Respondent Best in two groups, and informed them that Respondent Best was going out of business as M. H. Best Sr. was tired of losing money year after year. The employees were also told that Wagner and George Best were, thus, left without jobs and they had decided to form their own company which would do small scale work and operate as a nonunion shop or open shop.[3] During the ensuing days, Respondent Best laid off its field employees.

Walter Wilson, the Union's business manager, wrote a letter to Wagner on November 11, 1982, stating that, in the event that Wagner and George Best "reopen under G & R or some other name, in the piping business, I insist that you recognize Local 119's contract and rehire the men that you have laid off." On November 15, Wagner placed a telephone call to Wilson and invited him to a meeting for that day with George Best, Best Sr., and Wagner. At the meeting, M. H. Best Sr. stated that Respondent Best was going out of business because of the extreme financial losses it had suffered. Wilson said that Respondent G & R was one and the same as Respondent Best and, therefore, was bound by Respondent Best's contract with the Union. Wagner and George Best insisted that Respondent G & R was not connected to Respondent Best and, as a new company, thinly capitalized, it could not be competitive if it abided by Respondent Best's contract with the Union. Respondent G & R, George Best told Wilson, needed to obtain small jobs in order to start a cash flow and be able to stay in business. Therefore, Best and Wagner told Wilson, G & R would "go open shop." The meeting then turned to a discussion of those portions of the contract that Wagner and Best felt were too costly, namely, wages, fringe benefits, travel time, and paid holidays.

[1] The factfindings contained herein are based on a composite of documentary and testimonial evidence introduced at trial. The record is generally free of significant evidentiary conflict.

[2] Respondent Best continued to occupy a portion of the premises as it finished the jobs that it had under contract and performed certain repair work for former customers. For those purposes, Best continued to employ one unit employee whose terms and conditions of employment remained governed by the contract with the Union.

[3] The foregoing account of those meetings is based on the testimony of George Best and that of employees James Anthony, Malcolm Nicholas, and William C. Dixon. To the extent that Best's testimony differs from that of the three employees, it is not credited.

On December 23, 1982, Wilson placed a telephone call to George Best and asked if Best had reconsidered his decision to operate Respondent G & R as an "open shop." George Best said, "No, I don't even want to discuss it." Thereafter, on January 26, 1983, Wilson sent a letter to George Best, demanding recognition and insisting that the Union's contract with Respondent Best was binding upon Respondent G & R. Wagner, on behalf of G & R, sent the following letter to Wilson on March 4, 1983:

> Enclosed herewith is a proposed collective-bargaining agreement between G & R Contractors, Inc., and U.A. Local 119. We would appreciate the opportunity of discussing our proposal and any counter proposal of Local 119 with you at your earliest convenience.
> By making the proposal, G & R Contractors, Inc. does not waive or modify its position that Local 119 does not now and has never represented an uncoerced majority of the employees of G & R Contractors, Inc. in an appropriate collective-bargaining unit.

Wagner and George Best met with Wilson on March 17, 4 days before trial in the instant matter. At that time, Wilson stated his objections to certain of the terms contained in the contract proposal of Respondent G & R. He presented to Wagner and Best a proposed contract and asked them to review it as a basis for further negotiations.

Including working foremen, who enjoyed supervisory status, Respondent Best laid off some 10 or 11 workers who did plumbing-pipefitting work, principally in the early November 1982 period. Only one of those individuals, Bruce Carter, who had worked as a plumber-pipefitter with Respondent Best sought employment with Respondent G & R. Carter was hired by that Respondent as a working foreman, a statutory supervisor, on December 7, 1982. On that date he resigned his membership in the Union. Respondent G & R had, as of the time of trial, employed only two other individuals to do work covered by the contract at issue. On January 18, 1983, it hired S. W. Arrighi as a pipefitter. Three weeks later, Arrighi was laid off. Previously, on December 9, 1982, it had hired W. J. Moiren as a pipefitter helper. Neither Arrighi nor Moiren had been employed by Respondent Best.

With respect to other personnel, Respondent G & R hired M. D. Crabtree as a laborer on December 8, 1982. Crabtree, who had not worked for Respondent Best, was laid off on December 23, 1982. On December 21, 1982, G & R hired Willie Crum as a laborer. Crum, who had previously worked for Respondent Best as a laborer, was laid off on February 3, 1983. Also in December 1982 Respondent hired J. Crabtree as an operator, and M. J. Jones as a truckdriver. Crabtree had previously worked as an operator for Respondent Best and Jones had worked for Best as a truckdriver. The former secretary for Respondent Best, Ruth Colvin, was hired to perform the same job for Respondent G & R.[4] Respondent G & R also hired the former purchasing agent for Respondent Best, Harper Field, to perform the same duties for Respondent G & R.

At the time of trial, Respondent G & R had performed only five jobs, at least one of which was for a customer which, previously, had been a customer of Respondent Best. However, Respondent Best's relationship with that customer had terminated 1 year before Respondent G & R was engaged to perform an entirely different type of job.

C. Conclusions[5]

I conclude that Respondent G & R is not a disguised continuance, or the alter ego, of Respondent Best, and that neither Respondent engaged in violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (3) of the Act. In my view, the record evidence demonstrates that Respondents are separate, unrelated entities and that Respondent G & R was not created in an unlawful effort to circumvent the collective-bargaining agreement obligations undertaken by Respondent Best.

As shown, the corporate stock of Respondent G & R is owned entirely by R. J. Wagner and George Best minority shareholders in Respondent Best. On the other hand, M. H. Best Sr., who has no interest in Respondent G & R, owned 77 percent of the stock of Respondent Best, and controlled that corporation. While R. J. Wagner and, to some extent, George Best ran the day-to-day affairs of Respondent Best, its company policies were set by M. H. Best Sr. It was M. H. Best Sr. alone who decided to cease the operations of Respondent Best. The corporate policies of Respondent G & R are set by Wagner and George Best, and they also run the daily affairs of that Respondent. There is no integration or interrelation of the operations of the two Respondents.

As of October 31, 1982, Respondent Best had between $300,000 and $400,000 in working capital. It performed large contracting jobs, utilizing more than 10 plumber and pipefitter employees. Respondent G & R commenced operations with just $14,000 in working capital and sought the small work not performed by Respondent Best. Respondent G & R employs only two or three individuals to perform plumbing and pipefitting work.

[4] Colvin still does work for Respondent Best. Her time so spent is billed by Respondent G & R to Respondent Best.

[5] In view of my deposition of this case, infra, I need not pass on Respondent G & R's contention that the contract unit is inappropriate because it includes working foreman, statutory supervisors, and, also, that the subject contract is an illegal "members only" agreement.

In addition to the separate ownership and control of the two Respondents, and the very great difference in the scope of their operations, the record is devoid of evidence indicating that the purpose of the cessation of operations by Respondent Best, and the creation of Respondent G & R, was to avoid the obligations of Respondent Best under its contract with the Union. The record does not contain evidence of union animus, albeit Wagner and George Best did decide that Respondent G & R would commence operations as a nonunion contractor. Nor has there been irregular dealings. The one transaction between the Respondents, the sale of certain furniture, fixtures, and equipment, was demonstrably at arm's length, and the purchase price was determined by independent appraisal.[6] Likewise, it is not contended that Respondent G & R's lease of the building owned, personally, by M. H. Best Sr. was at other than fair market value.

Against this background, that Respondent G & R was housed in the same building occupied by Respondent Best, employed a small number of individuals who formerly worked for Respondent Best, and performed work for at least one former customer of Respondent Best are insufficient to show alter ego status. For those factors are outweighed by the separate ownership and control of the two Respondents, the entirely different scope of their operations, the absence of irregular business dealings between them, and the lack of evidence showing that the cessation of operations by the one and the creation of the other were motivated by antiunion considerations. Accordingly, the allegations of 8(a)(5) violations must be dismissed.

There is no evidence in this record to show that the layoffs of the plumber and pipefitter employees by Respondent Best, in November 1982, were other than in implementation of the lawful business decision reached by that Respondent to cease its operations. As there is also no evidence that Respondent G & R refused to hire applicants for employment who were former employees of Respondent Best, or advised the former Best employees that it would not hire them, the allegations in the complaint alleging violations of Section 8(a)(3) must also be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Best Mechanical Contractors, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce, and in operations affecting commerce, within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local No. 119 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondents have not violated the Act, as alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

Upon a charge filed by the Union in Case 10-CA-18929, 26 January 1983,[1] the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint[2] 1 February 1983 against the Company, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The complaint alleges that on 4 January 1983, following a Board election in Case 10-RC-12623, the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Company's employees in the unit found appropriate. (Official notice is taken of the "record" in the representation proceeding as defined in the Board's Rules and Regulations, Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g), amended Sept. 9, 1981, 46 Fed.Reg. 45922 (1981); Frontier Hotel, 265 NLRB 343 (1982).) The complaint further alleges that since 7 January the Company has refused to bargain with the Union. On 7 February the Company filed its answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint.

On 18 March the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 24 March the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Company filed a response.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Company's answer admits its refusal to bargain, but attacks the certification's validity on the basis that the unit in which the election was directed is inappropriate for collective-bargaining purposes. The General Counsel argues that all material issues have been previously decided.

In Case 10-CA-18929, the record, including the record in Case 10-RC-12623, reveals that on 9 August 1982, after a hearing, the Regional Director issued a Decision and Direction of Election in which, inter alia, he found appropriate a unit consisting essentially of all full-time and regular part-time housekeeping, laundry, public facility, and exhibit employees employed at the Respondent's Atlanta, Georgia facility.[3] On 23 August 1982 the Respondent filed with the Board a request for review, contending that the unit was inappropriate. On 10 September 1982 the Board granted the request for review. The election was held the same day, but the ballots were impounded pending resolution of the request for review. On 15 December 1982 the Board affirmed the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election, and directed that the impounded ballots be opened and counted. On 20 December 1982 the impounded ballots were counted. The tally showed that of approximately 219 eligible voters, 98 cast valid ballots for the Union, 8 for the Intervenor, and 63 against both labor organizations; there were 4 nondeterminative challenged ballots. On 4 January 1983 the Regional Director certified the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit found appropriate.

On 3 March the Regional Director for Region 10 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in Case 10-RC-12727 in which he found appropriate the petitioned-for unit consisting essentially of all full-time and regular part-time food and beverage employees at the Respondent's Atlanta facility.[4] Thereafter, the Employer filed a timely request for review, challenging the Acting Regional Director's unit determination and contending, inter alia, that the only appropriate unit consists of all employees employed at the facility, but excluding property operations department[5] employees, confidential employees, security officers, guards/watchmen and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Board, by telegraphic order dated 26 August 1983 (Member Zimmerman, dissenting), granted the request for review.

In light of the overlapping issues presented in Cases 10–RC–12727 and 10–CA–18929, the Board has decided on its own motion to consolidate the cases for decision.

On the entire record,[6] the Board makes the following findings.

The Atlanta Hilton and Towers is a 30-story hotel in Atlanta, Georgia. The hotel derives approximately 83 percent of its gross revenues from its convention business. The hotel has 1250 rooms and employs about 832 regular full-time nonsupervisory employees. The hotel has 4 restaurants, 3 cocktail lounges, a nightclub, recreational facilities, 52 meeting rooms, and an exhibition hall.

Because it is mainly a convention hotel, the Respondent's facilities and organizational structure have been designed specifically for the purpose of servicing convention business. The Respondent's operations are closely coordinated and functionally integrated. The conventions require each department to cooperate with the others to provide the promised services. In Case 10–RC–12623, the Regional Director found that:

> [T]he hotel and tower are operated in a highly integrated and centralized manner, especially so because of the high volume of its convention business and the special needs of its convention guests. Thus, the front office, sales, catering, reservations, food and beverage, and communications personnel are involved in selling conventions to prospective customers and in an effort to ascertain customers' needs during their stay at the Employer's facility.

The Respondent has an extensive internal communications and recordkeeping system. This consists of a MICOR computer system,[7] a pneumatic tube system linking the front desk and other parts of the facility, communications (PBX) and food and beverage outlets, a beeper paging system, and a walkie-talkie system.

The booking, planning, and execution of conventions require close coordination among all hotel areas. The hotel's organization is designed to provide numerous services for the convention as arranged through contractual agreement. Preconvention meetings are held to review a convention resume that outlines the convention functions and particular roles of each area. The convention resume is circulated to approximately 40 different departments and contains instructions for each.

The hotel's management is highly centralized. The Employer introduced numerous memoranda from General Manager Utnik to various department heads, assistant department heads, and assistant area managers, which demonstrate Utnik's close involvement in minor details of the hotel's day-to-day operation.[8] Individual department heads oversee routine operations in their areas, but do not establish basic work policies or have final control over department functions.

The hotel's human resources department establishes uniform personnel policies, including wages and benefits,[9] which apply to all hotel employees except property operations employees whose terms and conditions of employment have been specified in a collective-bargaining agreement. Individual department heads do not determine personnel policies. Human resources screens all applicants and refers those selected to the department managers for interviews.[10] The director of human resources must approve all personnel decisions, including any discipline supervisors recommend. Hotel employees have an employee cafeteria, employee locker rooms, and a recreation program. There are employee training programs throughout the hotel in which employees of different departments participate. Some employees receive cross-training in

All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by the Respondent at its Atlanta, Georgia facility, in the Property Operations Department including electricians, T.V. technicians, mechanics, operators, plumbers, helpers, carpenters, carpet-men, upholsterers, printers and locksmith, but excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

In Case 10–RC–12182, the Regional Director dismissed the Union's petition to represent a unit confined to "PBX operators" in the Employer's communications department.

[6] In Case 10–RC–12727, the parties requested the Regional Director to take official notice of the records in the two earlier representation proceedings, Cases 10–RC–12182 and 10–RC–12623.

[7] The MICOR system is used by employees in accounting (cashiers), housekeeping, front desk, and communications. MICOR's information includes guest names, guest room locations, guest conventions, and room status.

[8] Some examples of the day-to-day issues with which Utnik has been involved include the policy regarding furnishing meals to police officers, cleaning of guest elevator doors, availability of rollaway beds, the purchase of a knife for the dessert wagon, use of employee name tags, the maintenance and cost of shower curtains, approval of a front office clerk's vacation period, guest entrapment in elevators, and the cleaning of the lower ground floor area.

[9] A hotelwide wage and salary program sets pay rates for each job classification, including the hiring rates and frequency and amounts of pay increases. Individual supervisors and department heads do not determine when their employees receive a pay increase. Among other hotelwide personnel policies the human resources department formulates, with Utnik's approval, are work hours, disciplinary procedures, dress standards, holidays, night differential pay rates, benefit improvements, funeral leave, vacation policy, jury duty, overtime pay, and probation periods. All hotel employees except property operations employees receive the same fringe benefits.

other departments. For example, some communications employees received training to make them more aware of what goes on in the front office. There is also a "priority one" training program which covers any employee who has face-to-face contact with guests.

The hotel has a uniform transfer policy. The human resources department posts openings and employees from any area may apply. The employee's current supervisor must sign a form and human resources must approve the transfer. There have been approximately 27 transfers in 2 years from housekeeping to other departments. There have also been transfers from the food and beverage and stewards area to housekeeping, and transfers from communications to housekeeping, secretary, front office, and accounting. Other transfers have occurred from food and beverage to sales, front office, and accounting; from office to food and beverage; from housekeeping to the front desk; from greeter to catering; from bellstand to food and beverage; from communications to accounting; from room service to secretary; from personnel to catering; from public facilities to security; and from stewards to bellstand.

Employees from different areas have frequent contact with employees from other areas.[11] Examples of contact between accounting personnel and other employees include the following. Front office cashiers issue keys to food and beverage employees, restaurant cashiers, housekeeping, engineering, and laundry employees. Shipping and receiving employees deal with engineering, food and beverage, laundry, and housekeeping employees in handling goods to be picked up by other departments or delivered. Night auditors have contact with restaurant employees when they pick up reports and read registers in the restaurant outlets. Accounts payable clerks are involved with every department in obtaining approvals for payments of invoices.[12] Restaurant cashiers occasionally assist the hostesses or greeters in the dining rooms.

Laundry employees have contact with buspersons from all food and beverage outlets, banquet employees, kitchen employees, the storeroom clerk, shipping and receiving, communications, catering, room service, and the bellstand. Employees from other departments come into contact with laundry employees when they bring laundry to be cleaned, and pick up clean laundry and uniforms.

Housekeeping employees maintain contact with the front desk cashiers through the MICOR system regarding all room status changes. The front desk provides house counts to housekeeping for budgeting and scheduling purposes. Housekeeping employees have contacts with food and beverage employees when they clean restaurant outlets. Housekeeping employees work with public facilities employees in cleaning areas around the meeting rooms.

Food and beverage employees have contact with housekeeping and laundry employees as already described. They also keep contact with the front office on house count and the pay-in-advance guest list. Food and beverage employees have contact with restaurant cashiers and night auditors. They work closely with the inventory control office. Convention services advises food and beverage as to the food and beverage services each convention requires. Food and beverage employees work with housekeeping employees in setting up VIP rooms.

Communications employees assist cashiers regarding guest telephone charges (the pneumatic tube system is used for this purpose). Operators take restaurant reservations when food and beverage receptionists are not available. Restaurant cashiers call operators to verify guest room numbers, and operators call outlets to locate guests. Operators give out information regarding the hours of the various food and beverage outlets. Housekeeping employees call operators if a message light is left on in a vacant room or if a telephone is missing or damaged. Public facilities employees notify operators when a telephone needs to be removed from a meeting room. All departments notify communications when repairs are necessary.

There is some interchange of personnel between departments, mainly under emergency situations. Accounting personnel have worked as bartenders, and credit personnel as hostesses. During an ice storm, accounting personnel assisted housekeeping. Catering, sales, and accounting personnel have been used as bar cashiers. Housekeeping employees sometimes fill in at the laundry and uniform room. A housekeeping employee fills in for the restroom attendant in Nikolai's Roof Restaurant every week. Housekeeping employees have filled in as waitresses or buspersons, and help in shipping and receiving when a large order arrives. Housekeeping employees also occasionally substitute for lobby porters (bellstand).

In Arlington Hotel Co., 126 NLRB 400, 404 (1960), the Board announced a general rule of hotel unit determination, finding only a hotelwide unit to be appropriate, holding, "in the hotel industry, all operating personnel have such a high degree of functional integration and mutuality of interests that they should be grouped together for collective-bargaining purposes."

[11] In finding a unit of only PBX operators inappropriate in Case 10-RC-12182, the Regional Director stated, "The record is replete with evidence of frequent daily contacts among employees in almost every area of the hotel as they attend to the needs of convention guests."

[12] Generally, rank-and-file employees in other departments are not involved with this function unless there is a question about receipt of merchandise.

The Board later retreated from the Arlington rule in 77 Operating Co., 160 NLRB 927, 929–930 (1966), enfd. 387 F.2d 646 (4th Cir. 1967), and approved a unit limited to restaurant employees. The Board stated:

> Since Arlington, the Board has gained much experience and better insight into the nature of the hotel-motel industry. Although, as was held in Arlington, employees in the various facilities of hotels and motels have a basic mutuality of interest, neither their functions nor their mutual interests are in all cases integrated to such a high degree that an overall unit should be found the only appropriate unit. . . .
> Arlington took a valid principle (if functions and mutual interests are highly integrated, an overall unit alone is appropriate) and fashioned from it an inflexible rule to be applied to all hotels and motels. But, because our experience has indicated that such a degree of integrated functions and employee interests does not exist in every hotel or motel, we shall hereafter consider each case on the facts peculiar to it in order to decide wherein lies the true community of interest among particular employees.

In making unit determinations in the hotel industry, the Board applies the same general criteria used in other industries, including "distinctions in skills and functions of particular employee groups, their separate supervision, the employer's organizational structure and differences in wages and hours,"[13] as well as integration of operations, and employee transfer, interchange, and contacts.

In applying these criteria in Cases 10–RC–12727 and 10–RC–12623, the Regional Director found that "there is not such a high degree of functions and mutuality of interest" between the employees in the requested units and other hotel and tower employees as to require a single combined unit. We disagree. After carefully examining the facts of the instant case, we find that the units the Regional Director found appropriate in Cases 10–RC–12727 and 10–RC–12623 do not represent "the true community of interest" of the hotel's employees, and are inappropriate for collective-bargaining purposes.[14]

As described above, the evidence discloses that the Respondent is a highly integrated operation. Each department is closely coordinated with the others in order to serve the needs of conventions.[15] All employees are subject to the same personnel policies, and share the same wage and benefit programs. There is a hotelwide wage and salary program which establishes pay rates and determines increases. All employees receive the same fringe benefits and work under rules and policies the human resources department establishes. Individual supervisors or department heads do not formulate or change personnel policies. Rather, the human resources department with the general manager's approval formulates or changes such policies. Employees in different departments frequently have contact with employees in other departments in performing their duties, as previously detailed. There is substantial evidence of transfers between departments and some evidence of interchange of duties, particularly in emergency situations.

A number of employees who perform similar functions in different departments were placed in separate units or excluded from both units. For example, the stockroom attendant (housekeeping) was included in the unit found appropriate in Case 10–RC–12623, the food storeroom clerk (food and beverage) was included in the unit found appropriate in Case 10–RC–12727, but the general storeroom clerk (accounting) was excluded from both units. Other examples include the locker room attendant (housekeeping) (included in Case 10–RC–12623) and the restroom attendant in Nikolai's (food and beverage) (included in Case 10–RC–12727); the banquet helper (stewards) (included in Case 10–RC–12727) and the banquet houseman (public facilities) (included in Case 10–RC–12623); the night cleaners (housekeeping) (included in Case 10–RC–12623) and the night cleaners (stewards) (included in Case 10–RC–12727); the lobby porter (bellstand) (included in Case 10–RC–12727) and the housekeeping attendant (included in Case 10–RC–12623); and food and beverage cashiers (included in Case 10–RC–12727) and front desk cashiers (excluded from both units).

In Case 10–RC–12727 the Regional Director attempted to justify his unit determination in terms of a "white collar/blue collar" distinction under Re- gency Hyatt House, supra. The Regional Director stated:

[15] See Westward-Ho Hotel, 437 F.2d 1110 (9th Cir. 1971), in which the Ninth Circuit reversed a Board finding that a unit consisting of only kitchen employees was appropriate. In that case, the court noted that "the employer's convention service involves the close coordination of all the hotel's employees." The volume of Westward-Ho's convention business was 60 percent, while 83 percent of Respondent's revenues is attributable to conventions.

> [T]he employees sought for consist of the hotel's unrepresented manual operating personnel, such as doorman, bellmen, waiters, waitresses, bartenders, and cooks. Each employee provides the hotel's customers with physical services, be it preparing food and beverages, changing cash after purchases, carrying luggage or opening doors. The differences between these employees' duties and job functions and other clerical personnel employed throughout the hotel justifies a "blue collar/white-collar" distinction as contemplated in Hotel Equities, d/b/a The Regency Hyatt House, supra. Accordingly, I find that the unrepresented "blue collar" employees share a sufficient community of interest apart from the broader interest they may share with other hotel and tower employees to warrant their separate representation. This finding is consistent with the previous decision in Case 10–RC–12623, which found a blue-collar unit to be appropriate. The record in the entire proceeding does not warrant a conclusion that the unit established in Case 10–RC–12623 should be merged into an overall unit with the unit currently sought herein. [Emphasis added.]

The Regional Director did not, however, explain why the "blue collar" employees in Case 10–RC–12623 should not be in the same unit with the "blue collar" employees in Case 10–RC–12727. The Regional Director's units separate "blue collar" employees into two units[16] and include some "white collar" employees in each unit while excluding others.[17] The Regional Director excluded from both units employees such as front office cashiers and storeroom clerk who perform similar functions to employees included in the units. We are therefore unable to agree with the Regional Director's unit determinations.[18]

We conclude that because of the highly integrated functions and mutual interests of the Respondent's employees, the common pay rates and fringe benefits shared by all employees, the centralized control of the Employer's day-to-day operations, the centralized formulation of personnel policies, the daily work contacts of employees in different departments, and the transfers of employees between departments, an overall unit of the Employer's employees, excluding property operations employees, confidential employees, guards, and supervisors is appropriate in the instant case.

Accordingly, because we have found that the units the Regional Director found appropriate in Cases 10–RC–12727 and 10–RC–12623 are not appropriate units for collective-bargaining purposes, we shall dismiss the petition in Case 10–RC–12727. In addition, we shall deny the Motion for Summary Judgment in Case 10–CA–18929 and dismiss the complaint. We shall also revoke the certification issued in Case 10–RC–12623, and dismiss the petition in that case.

ORDER

The petition in Case 10–RC–12727 is dismissed.

The Motion for Summary Judgment in Case 10–CA–18929 is denied, and the complaint is dismissed.

The certification of representative issued in Case 10–RC–12623 is revoked, and the petition is dismissed.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment in Case 10–CA–18929. Specifically, in accordance with the reasons set forth in my specially concurring opinion in Bravos Oldsmobile, 254 NLRB 1056, 1058 (1981), I believe that the Board should refrain from reconsidering the unit determination made by the Regional Director, and affirmed by the Board on review, in the underlying representation case, Case 10–RC–12623.

In Bravos Oldsmobile, I argued that any benefits to be derived from reconsidering and relitigating representation issues in a particular technical refusal-to-bargain case such as this one were decidedly outweighed by the advantages of stability in law and finality of litigation resulting from the Board's longstanding policy against such relitigation. Very recently, in my dissent in Sub-Zero Freezer Co., 271 NLRB 47 (1984), I reiterated these considerations, and noted that the sole reason that relitigation of the underlying representation issue was permitted by the majority was because there was a change in the composition of the Board from the time the representation case was litigated to the time the Respondent tested the Board's certification. That is precisely the same reason my colleagues are per-

[16] For example, "blue collar" employees such as housekeeping aides and laundry employees were included in Case 10–RC–12623, while other "blue collar" employees such as bell persons, waiters, and cooks were included in Case 10–RC–12727.

[17] Thus, "white collar" employees such as the food and beverage cashiers were included in Case 10–RC–12727 and the housekeeping payroll clerk was included in Case 10–RC–12623, but other "white collar" employees such as front office cashiers and PBX operators were excluded from both units.

[18] Contrary to Member Zimmerman, we are reconsidering the underlying representation proceeding in Case 10–CA–18929 not because of a change in the composition of the Board, but because the Regional Director erroneously applied existing precedent.

Accordingly, for the reasons fully set forth in my separate opinions in Bravos Oldsmobile and Sub-Zero Freezer, I would not relitigate the representation issue underlying the refusal-to-bargain case, and I would grant the General Counsel's motion, finding that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act as alleged.

Also contrary to my colleagues, I would not have granted review of the unit determination made by the Regional Director in the instant case, Case 10–RC–12727, and I would therefore affirm that unit determination. The hotelwide unit which my colleagues find appropriate is squarely at odds with the Regional Director's unit determination in Case 10–RC–12623, underlying the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment. Because I believe that the Board should refrain from now reversing its earlier affirmation of the Regional Director's unit determination in Case 10–CA–12623 (and also for the substantive reasons on which that affirmation was based), I disagree with my colleagues' unit determination in Case 10–RC–12727.

Fleur DuLac, a joint venture composed of Fred Sahadi and Fred Andrews and Carpenters Local Union 2035, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO. Case 20–CA–16918

6 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 21 February 1984 Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Boyce issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[1]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Fleur DuLac, a joint venture composed of Fred Sahadi and Fred Andrews, Campbell, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a).

"(a) Make whole Martin Kostelny, Lyle Teuscher, Raymond Jordan, and Robert Rule for loss of earnings and benefits, plus interest, from the dates of their unlawful discharge in January 1982 until 8 March 1982, the effective date of the offer of reinstatement."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b).

"(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges of Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, and Rule, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful discharges will not be used against them in the future."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against any employee because of that employee's membership in or support of Carpenters Local Union 2035, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO or any other union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole Martin Kostelny, Lyle Teuscher, Raymond Jordan, and Robert Rule for loss of earnings and benefits, plus interest, from the dates of their unlawful discharge until 8 March 1982.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the unlawful discharges, and WE WILL notify Teuscher, Kostelny, Jordan, and Rule that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful discharges will not be used against them in the future.

[1] We find merit in the Respondent's contention that the evidence establishes that the Company made unconditional offers of reinstatement to the discriminatees and that the latter effectively rejected the offers. The credited evidence shows that on 4 March 1982 General Building Superintendent Bergsma invited discriminatees Kostelny, Jordan, and Rule to report to work on 8 March. Bergsma informed the three carpenters they they would receive union wages and benefits. Bergsma's efforts to contact Teuscher with the same message were unsuccessful. On 8 March Kostelny, Jordan, and Teuscher reported to the jobsite and tendered dispatch slips containing recognitional language. Bergsma refused to accept the slips because of the recognitional language. Kostelny, Jordan, and Teuscher stated that they could not return to work if Bergsma refused to accept the dispatch slips. As a result, they were not rehired. Rule, who had recently undergone surgery, contacted Bergsma in early June 1982 and stated that he had recovered and wished to return to work. Bergsma asked Rule how he wanted "to come back." Rule answered "as a Union member and the whole bit." Bergsma replied that he could not hire Rule.

The judge concluded that the Respondent's refusal to rehire the discriminatees was not unlawful. The judge found that the Company's actions were permissible in view of the discriminatees' insistence that the Respondent accept the dispatch slips containing recognitional language. We find, based on the evidence and the judge's findings set forth above, that the Respondent unconditionally offered to reinstate the discriminatees at their previous terms and conditions of employment and that the discriminatees rejected the offer by conditioning their return on the Company's acceptance of the dispatch slips. Accordingly, we shall modify the backpay provision and delete the reinstatement requirement in the recommended Order and notice. We shall further modify the Order and notice to require that the Respondent expunge from its files any references to the unlawful discharges. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

FLEUR DULAC, A JOINT VENTURE COMPOSED OF FRED SAHADI AND FRED ANDREWS

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. BOYCE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried in South Lake Tahoe, California, on March 15 and 16, 1983. The charge was filed February 18, 1982, and amended March 31 and August 16, by Carpenters Local Union 2035, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO (Union). The complaint issued August 20, 1982, was amended during the trial, and alleges that Fleur DuLac, a joint venture composed of Fred Sahadi and Fred Andrews[1] (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act by:[2]

(a) Discharging Martin Kostelny and Lyle Teuscher on January 20, 1982.

(b) Discharging Raymond Jordan and Robert Rule on January 23, 1982.

(c) Refusing to rehire Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, Peter Gillis, and William Kelly on March 29, 1982.

(d) Refusing to rehire Rule on June 1, 1982.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is engaged in the development of a multimillion dollar, 22-unit condominium project (Project) on Lake Tahoe near Homewood, California. To this end, it annually purchases over $50,000 in goods and materials from suppliers outside California, and thus is an employer engaged in and affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED MISCONDUCT

A. Evidence

1. Background

Work began on the Project in the spring of 1981. The project manager, so called, is Fred Sahadi, one of the joint venturers. Although his office is over 200 miles away, in Campbell, California, he visited the site almost daily from the Project's onset through October 1981. Thereafter, as weather worsened with the coming of winter, his visitations were markedly less frequent. The ranking person regularly on the site, directly accountable to Sahadi, is John Bergsma, general building superintendent. He testified that he is "in charge of all construction." Sahadi testified that, whether or not physically present on the site, he was in communication with Bergsma "on a continuous basis" at relevant times.[3]

The carpenter complement peaked at perhaps 40 people in October 1981. As Sahadi put it, Respondent was "pushing the job hard" before winter, "working as many people as [it] could in as many places on the site as [it] could." Reductions in force followed as tasks were completed and winter conditions curtailed the range of activities that might feasibly be undertaken. Five carpenters remained after the discharges in question. That number persisted through the week following, after which it rose to 7 in the week ending February 7, to 8 in the week ending February 14, to 16 by the end of February, and to 25 by mid-March, as weather moderated. The complement designedly was comprised of both union members and nonmembers until the present discharges.[4] It has been entirely nonunion since.

The union carpenters were paid union scale wages, and fringe benefit contributions were made for them as if they were covered by the Union's master labor agreement.[5] The nonunion carpenters receive varying wages purportedly pegged to their skills, which in some and probably most instances are less than union scale, and have no fringe benefits. Compensation for the union carpenters was agreed upon during a meeting on June 5, 1981, between representatives of Respondent and the Union. It was further understood, at least so Respondent thought, that Respondent would not be party to the master labor agreement and that the Union would enjoy no representational status on the Project.

[2] Sec. 8(a)(1) states that "it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer . . . to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7." Sec. 7 states in relevant part: "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection . . . ." Sec. 8(a)(3) makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization."

[3] Sahadi testified that he speaks with Bergsma, by telephone if not in person, "two or three times a day almost every day of [his] life." Bergsma testified that Sahadi sometimes calls "ten times a day" and sometimes does not talk to Bergsma "for a week."

[4] Kostelny testified credibly and without refutation that, when he was invited to work on the Project, Bergsma told him that Respondent needed "some token union men"; and that Sahadi told the newly hired carpenters a week or so later that he was "happy" to have some union members on the payroll inasmuch as he needed "some token union men . . . to keep Bob Young . . . off his back." Young is the Union's business representative.

[5] Union carpenters received an hourly wage of $15.35 at the start of the job. Respondent's hourly fringe benefit contributions for them were $1.605 for health and welfare, $1.95 for pension benefit, $1.60 for vacation fund, 12 cents for apprenticeship training, and 7 cents for industry advancement.

There were three union carpenters on the Project as of the June 5 meeting, each of whom had been hired by Bergsma independently of the Union's hiring hall. On June 8, the Union's business representative, Robert Young, appeared at the site, presenting Bergsma with dispatch slips pertaining to the three. The slips, bearing the imprimatur of the Sierra Nevada Foothill District Council of Carpenters, included this language:

> Note: By accepting this referral, the Employer herein recognizes the Union and each of its affiliated local unions and district councils as the collective bargaining representative of his or its carpentry employees employed in the 46 Northern California counties and agrees to be bound by all the wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of the Carpenter's Master Agreement for Northern California, including the payment of all wage scales, health and welfare, pension, vacation, apprentice, and industry advancement contributions required by said Agreement.

Prompted by Young's action, Respondent's attorney, Roy Potts, sent Bergsma a letter dated June 9 in which he "attempt[ed] to summarize" the June 5 understanding. Copies were sent to Young, to the Union's attorney, Michael Roger, and to R. A. Caples, business manager of the Sacramento-Sierra Building & Construction Trades Council, all of whom had attended the June 5 meeting. The letter stated in part:

> At the meeting on Friday, I reiterated Mr. Sahadi's position that he would pay union scale wages and fringes for all carpenters hired out of the union hall. No agreement was made that Fleur DuLac would hire all its help through the hall . . . .
> Further it was made clear that Mr. Sahadi would not sign any agreement or do anything which would give the Union any direct or indirect jurisdiction whatsoever over the job.
> Mr. Young's appearance on the job on Monday afternoon, and the tender of his dispatch tickets was not as a result of any agreement which I made on Friday or any other time and was solely on his own initiative for his own account and presumably for union internal bookkeeping procedures.

This was followed by a letter dated June 15 from Potts to Young, copy to Roger, in which Potts stated, after setting forth the above-quoted dispatch-slip language, that he had been "careful to point out" in the June 5 meeting "that the employer did not recognize the union as the collective bargaining representative of its employees"; and that, while "we expressed our willingness to pay scale and fringes if and when we used union employees . . . we were at pains to find a way to do this without extending recognition." The letter concluded that Respondent "presume[d]" that the use of the dispatch slips "was not an attempt to gain recognition indirectly."

On June 22, Potts sent a telegram to Caples stating:

> Just after lunch today Robert A. Young appeared on the Fleur DuLac construction site . . . for the second time in a week and announced that his men could not work with others on the job. . . .
> As was pointed out in my letter to Job Superintendent Bergsma dated June 9, 1981, a copy of which was sent to you, and my letter to Young dated June 15, 1981, Fleur DuLac does not recognize the Carpenters as bargaining representative of any of its employees; does not have an agreement with the Carpenters to hire any employees from the Union; and has not worked out with the Union an arrangement whereby carpenters hired through the hall, if any, may be paid fringes.[6] This is the kind of problem that the Employer has feared from the outset.
> We need your help.

What happened next is not revealed by the record. The record does reveal, however, that tension between Respondent and the Union escalated. Kostelny, one of those whose discharge is in issue, testified that Sahadi convened a meeting of Respondent's carpenters in late July or early August, declaring that he was "having union problems with Bob Young," that he did not like the way Young "handled" the Union, and that Respondent's union carpenters "would have to go to work there on a nonunion basis" if there were "any more problems." This testimony was not controverted.

Then, by letter to Sahadi dated October 9, Young wrote:

> We have now had three meetings together and still have not resolved our problems at Fleur DuLac. I have dispatched eleven carpenters to your job. There are five of them left. There are approximately twenty to thirty carpenters on the job that were not dispatched by this Hall. This leaves me to assume that they are nonunion and that their wages and fringes are below the area standard.
> I don't know if you are aware of a fight on your job between a union carpenter and a nonunion carpenter. What the fight was about is immaterial. The union carpenter was laid off the next day. I was never contacted by your superintendent, John. In my opinion, it takes two people to have a fight. So, if there was any doubt about who started what, they both should have been laid off . . . .
> There was also a meeting held October 6, 1981, after work, with John Bergsma and the union carpenters on the job. The union carpenters were told that if the problems with the union were not solved,

[6] In context, it is plain that Potts, by mentioning the absence of an arrangement for making fringe benefit contributions, was not contending that Respondent had not committed itself to make such contributions for union members on its payroll. Rather, he was referring to the as yet unresolved problem of how to comply with the "written agreement" requirement for such contributions, as specified in the proviso to Sec. 302(c)(5) of the Act, in the absence of a collective-bargaining agreement. The problem was handled by Respondent's including with its July 1981 contributions a cover letter setting forth the commitment as understood by Respondent and stating that the cover letter "will constitute the written agreement" as required by the Act.

> they could continue working provided they dropped out of the union. This does not sound like we are working together.
> I would very much like to get together with you in the next few days to see if we can resolve the problems on our job. If we cannot resolve them, we could appear before an impartial arbitrator at a grievance hearing to settle the problems of hiring and the payment of fringes for the people performing carpenter work at the Fleur DuLac jobsite.

Sahadi replied by letter dated October 22, stating that "the substance of our understanding is set out in" Potts' June 9 letter to Bergsma, a copy of which had been sent to Young; that Respondent "has fulfilled all obligations of our understanding"; and that, while Sahadi would be "happy to meet and confer with" Young, Young's letter "does not raise any question requiring a meeting at the present time."

Young countered on about October 28 by filing a grievance against Respondent, alleging it to be in violation of the union-security, hiring hall, and fringe benefit provisions of the Union's master labor agreement. Respondent was bound by that agreement, so the Union contended, because Sahadi had signed an agreement with another Carpenters Union affiliate in 1969. On December 11, the United States District Court for the Eastern District of California granted Respondent's ex parte motion for an order temporarily restraining the Union from going to hearing on the grievance. On February 5, 1982, following a court hearing January 18, the restraining order was superseded by a preliminary injunction; and, by order dated May 18, after another court hearing March 22, the Union was permanently enjoined "from proceeding with any form of hearing or arbitration of the grievance," the Union's underlying premise having been rejected that Respondent was bound by the master labor agreement.

2. The discharges

Kostelny and Teuscher were discharged January 20, 1982, 2 days after the hearing from which the preliminary injunction emanated. Jordan and Rule were discharged January 23. Kostelny had been on the payroll since late May 1981; Teuscher, since late June; Jordan, since early July; and Rule, since September. All were carpenters and union members. Sahadi testified that Kostelny and Teuscher are "top flight" carpenters, that Jordan is "good," and that Rule is "an absolutely top-class layout man," but "the worst" as a mechanic.

The discharges were effected by Brad Scott, a carpentry foreman.[7] He informed Kostelny and Teuscher, who "partnered" on the Project, in a single conversation on January 20, after which he conducted them to the gate. He followed the same procedure with Jordan and Rule, also partners, on January 23. Kostelny testified that Scott, having said that he and Teuscher had "to go down the road," explained that Sahadi had decreed the action because "it was snowing," work "was slow," and they were not "getting much progress done." Kostelny asked, as he recalled, if "the entire job" was being shut down, and Scott said it was. Kostelny assertedly then remarked that he had "heard that the nonunion guys were going to stay and union guys were going," to which Scott replied, "I don't know, you guys just have to go."[8] Kostelny testified that Scott never "point-blank" said he was being let go because he "was union."

Teuscher recalled Scott's words as being more pointed. He testified that Scott stated: "You guys are going down the road. Mr. Sahadi is laying off all the union guys." Scott appended, according to Teuscher, that Jordan and Rule would be kept for the layout of some walls, after which they, too, would be sent "down the road."

Jordan testified that Scott advised him and Rule, on January 23, that they were being laid off because Sahadi was "cutting all ties with the Union"; and that Scott "hated" to see them go, but "could do [nothing] about it." Rule recalled Scott's stating that Sahadi "didn't want union carpenters on the job and wanted nothing to do with the Union"; and that, since Jordan and Rule were union members, he "was sorry" but he "had to lay [them] off."

The record is without Scott's version of the discharge conversations. He did not testify.

Bergsma was vacationing in Hawaii the week of the discharges. On his return the week following, according to Kostelny and Teuscher, they jointly confronted him, asking why they had been laid off when he "had promised [them] three years worth of work." Bergsma had induced him to leave another job, Kostelny testified, by assuring him that "there would be two or three years worth of work" on the Project; and Teuscher testified that, when he inquired about working on the Project and asked how much work there would be, Bergsma replied, "Oh, heck, we have three years of work."[9] Bergsma answered, as recounted by Kostelny, that Sahadi had come "all unglued" while Bergsma was in Hawaii; that Bergsma wanted Kostelny and Teuscher back "right away" and would "have to find out what was going on to straighten up the problem"; and that, if they did return, "it would more than likely have to be on a nonunion basis, because Fred [Sahadi] wanted to break all ties with the Union" and "all the union men were suppose[d] to get off the jobsite." Kostelny testified that he then asked, "[I]f we're going to come back to work on a nonunion basis, [would] 22.50 an hour be an out-of-line figure?" to which Bergsma replied that he "would not have any problems with that."

Teuscher described the encounter in substantially the same terms, although his version of Bergsma's answer to the opening question, why they were laid off, was more explicitly antiunion—that Sahadi "got into a tiff with the [7] The parties stipulated that Scott is a supervisor for purposes of the Act.

[8] Kostelny testified that there had been "little rumbles throughout the project for that whole day that the whole job was going to be shut down on Friday, but the nonunion guys would be back to work on Monday morning."

[9] That he made these representations was not controverted by Bergsma.

business agent from the Union" and the discharges were "just to get rid of the union guys."

Bergsma, while testifying at some length, did not address this exchange.

Jordan testified that, about 2 weeks after he and Rule were discharged, he had a conversation with Bergsma and Scott in which he asked if he could have his job back if he "dropped out of the Union." Bergsma answered, according to Jordan, that he "would love to have [Jordan] back, and that he should report the next Monday." Jordan continued that, when he showed up for work as directed, Bergsma said there would be "a problem hiring [him] back as a nonunion carpenter," and that it would be necessary "to check" with Respondent's lawyers first. Bergsma said nothing about these conversations in his recital.

Concerning the origin of the decision or decisions to effect the discharges, and the underlying reasons, Bergsma testified that he had nothing to do with them, his first knowledge coming on his return from Hawaii. He first averred that he had "no idea" who had ordered them, not having been there, later conceding—"I would think so"—that the decision(s) had to have been Sahadi's or Scott's since "nobody else had anything to do with carpenters." Bergsma testified yet later that, when he asked Scott and the Project's architect, Nick Kromydas, about the discharges, "they told [him] . . . someone . . . told 'em to lay some carpenters off," but "never did give [him] no reason for the layoff." Bergsma ventured that, while not "absolutely positive," he thought this came from Kromydas, and that Kromydas also disclosed that Sahadi had given the order to "lay 'em off." Bergsma added, "Work was catching up, that's what [Kromydas] told me, and he had orders to lay some people off."

Kromydas did not testify.

Bergsma would have it that he never spoke with Sahadi about the discharges—"I don't think I did." He went on that, while he had "had a lot of conversations with Mr. Sahadi on the phone about carpenters," he did not think "it's necessarily union carpenters." Bergsma later relented that he could not remember any particular conversation with Sahadi about union carpenters, but "would say" they "probably" had such a conversation "at one time or another," although not before his departure for Hawaii.

Bergsma testified that he was not "really surprised" to learn about the discharges, "because . . . the weather was bad." Beyond that, he asserted, carpentry work "was nearing completion." "The only reasons" he could think of for the discharges, he testified, were "a lack of work, [and] the weather started catching up with us." He denied—"I don't think so, no"—that Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, and Rule were selected for discharge because Respondent "had to pay them a higher wage than the nonunion carpenters"; and stated that it was "pure coincidence" that they happened to be union members.

Sahadi testified that he customarily decides when layoffs are called for, leaving it to Bergsma to decide on "specific people." The "only specific instruction" he gave Bergsma, he stated, was, "Keep your best people to the end." With regard to the discharges in question, however, Sahadi testified that he was "not sure" whether Bergsma was party to the decisional process, having been "on vacation at this time." Sahadi later opined that "probably the decision was made prior to the time that [Bergsma] left" for Hawaii, and that he "would think" Bergsma "made the decision." As concerns his role in the decision(s), Sahadi testified that he had "no intimation" beforehand that "these particular people" were to be separated, and that he had "no reason to anticipate" it. Sahadi continued:

> [U]ltimately the responsibility was mine. . . . But at no time did I single out, at least that I can recall . . . people like Bob Rule and Marty [Kostelny] and Gar [Teuscher].

Sahadi testified that he and Bergsma never discussed the discharges, only to concede that the subject "could have come up in conversation." He enlarged:

> I don't think so. But it could have. And—and it wouldn't be unusual for me not to remember it. I mean, it—it was not a big thing until these charges were filed.

Regarding the reasons for the discharges, Sahadi testified that "it was a combination of things"—"we had run out of work and weather conditions precluded us from doing work." "And another reason," he asserted, "was that the working conditions were just plain dangerous." Sahadi elaborated that "the weather had turned totally intolerable" in January; that there was "ice all over the place," electrical cords for the power equipment were "literally frozen to the subfloor," the roofs "were unworkable," and "it was so cold . . . you couldn't hold a hammer." Sahadi proceeded:

> So we had reached a point where, as the severity of the winter continued, it became almost intolerable to go forward, and we just basically terminated the—the work because we weren't getting any productivity.

Whether Sahadi was speaking from personal observation when describing the January conditions, and, if so, when during that month, is unclear. As previously mentioned, he visited the site less frequently during the winter; and, while he was "sure" he was there in January, he could not recall when. Bergsma testified that he could not remember seeing Sahadi on the site in January.

Sahadi testified elsewhere, in explanation of the discharges, that in January:

> . . . we were slowly but surely winding down and trying to tighten up certain categories of the job; and as those categories were finished, to the extent we could finish 'em, then those people were laid off and were not rehired again until the weather broke in the spring.

Sahadi denied that the discharges were "to get rid of union employees." As if to underscore his indifference to union status, he testified when asked if the carpenters on the payroll after January 23 were all nonunion, "I'd have to check the records."

As concerns his "instruction" that Bergsma keep his "best people to the end," Sahadi acknowledged that Kostelny, Teuscher, and Rule "fell into that category." Asked, then, if they were superior to those retained, Sahadi testified:

> [T]here's no question about it. The few people that were retained were dumbbell carpenters, do a little bracing here, put a little plywood up to keep the snow out of the buildings.

Sahadi hastened to add that this did not mean his instruction had been violated. He explained:

> What I'm saying is that we had a situation where the job had just come to a stop. When you're spread out over 18 acres with a million of dollars sticking up, you've got to have some people running around doing, you know, for a few hours a day, hopefully at the smallest hourly rate per day, menial things, tacking up plywood.

Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, and Rule were doing interior framing when discharged. Kostelny testified that he and Teuscher had been doing this "for some time," that it was "nowhere nears being completed," and that "skilled" carpenters were needed to do it. Teuscher testified that "there were a lot of very important jobs to do yet," and that they required "a skilled carpenter." Jordan testified that he "had plenty of work to do" when discharged; that "major interior framing" remained to be done; that "it was going to take an immense amount of time" because of the custom nature of the work;[10] and that "all the windows had to be put in" besides. Rule echoed the others that "there was work to do."

In addition to testifying that Bergsma assured them, about the time of their hire, that there would be 2 or 3 years of work, Kostelny and Teuscher related that they spoke with Bergsma shortly before Christmas 1981 about the prospect of their being "able to stay busy throughout the winter." Bergsma told them, according to Kostelny, that they "were some of [the] best boys on the job and . . . would be staying throughout the winter to go work in the boathouse and to go work underneath the roof on the various different projects." Teuscher's version of Bergsma's words was to the same effect: "You guys ain't going no place 'til this job is over. Don't worry about any work." Bergsma did not speak to this exchange in his testimony.

Jordan and Rule testified that, in a conversation with Scott about a week before their discharges, Scott spoke about himself teaming with one of them, and having another foreman, Joe Columbus, team with the other, to do interior framing and set windows until the weather moderated.

Kostelny, Teuscher, and Jordan all testified that the Project posed no unusual hazards when they were discharged. They particularized that the weather-exposed power cords presented no threat, Kostelny and Teuscher explaining that OSHA-required ground-fault interrupters ensured against shock, and Jordan noting that a problem would arise only if the cords were not properly grounded. Bergsma said nothing about hazardous conditions in his testimony.

The day before Kostelny and Teuscher were discharged, January 19, Respondent laid off two carpenters, both nonunion. The day of their discharges, it also released three nonunion carpenters, all of whom were back on the payroll in the week ending February 14. Earlier in January, three others were laid off, two of whom were nonunion. One of those two was recalled the week ending February 21. As earlier indicated, there were no reductions in force after the January 23 discharges of Jordan and Rule.

3. The alleged refusals to rehire

By telephone on March 4, 1982, Bergsma invited Kostelny, Jordan, Rule, Peter Gillis, and William Kelly to report for work the following Monday, March 8, telling them they would receive union wages and benefits. He also attempted, without success, to call Teuscher with the same message. Gillis previously had worked on the Project, as a union carpenter, from October 1981 until laid off December 31. Kelly, also a union carpenter, had worked on the Project from October 1981 until laid off January 16, 1982. Bergsma presumably was acting on Sahadi's say-so when making these overtures. Sahadi testified that he wanted Kostelny, Teuscher, and Rule back "so bad [he] could taste it," and that union wages and benefits therefore "were not even an issue."

On March 8, all but Rule of those called reported to the site at the appointed time, ready for work. Teuscher also reported. Rule, who had undergone surgery after his January discharge, was still disabled. Each of the five tendered to Bergsma a dispatch slip of the sort earlier described.

Bergsma announced that he "would not accept a dispatch slip," and the five said they could not go to work in that circumstance. As a result, none was hired. Bergsma conceded that, but for the slips, they would have been hired. He explained to them that he had been "told by our attorneys not to accept the slip" because of the recognitional language previously set forth.

The next day, March 9, the Union's Young demanded by telegram that Respondent immediately hire the five. The telegram further stated:

> They were refused work because they brought dispatches to the job, which is their union obligation. If they are not reinstated, we will have to take this mattter to the National Labor Relations Board.

Attorney Potts responded by letter dated March 11, stating in part:

> Fleur DuLac did not accept the referral slips containing recognition language in 1981 and it does not do so now. Your attempt to obtain recognition through the use of the referral slips is not well taken.

[10] Jordan testified, "Each piece of wood had to be cut special."

> The employees referred to in your letter were offered employment on March 8, 1982, under the same conditions that they were offered employment in the past year. That offer remains outstanding. Fleur DuLac does not recognize your union and does not intend to accept a self-serving boilerplate statement of recognition as a condition of employment of the employees in question.
> The restriction placed upon these five men by your union is the only bar to their employment.

On March 26, Young sent another telegram to Respondent, again demanding the immediate hire of the five carpenter-members. The telegram also stated:

> The use of the dispatch slips only serves to confirm their employment and the conditions of their employment and nothing else. You have no right to condition employment on these workers because of their union membership or activities.

In late March as well, according to Young, the Union's attorney, Roger, counseled him to "put the men on the job without a dispatch."[11] Young consequently informed each of the five, so he testified, that they were free to return to the Project without dispatch slips. Young initially testified that he so advised Kostelny, by telephone, on March 28, and that Kostelny and Teuscher called him back the same day for verification; that he told Gillis and Kelly, also by telephone, on March 28 or 29; and that he informed Jordan, in person at the union hall, on March 29, having earlier left a telephone message with Jordan's wife. Young later testified that he first advised the men of the new circumstance on "a work day," "more than likely Monday." March 28 was a Sunday. He testified still later that he "sometimes" makes calls "on the weekend" when he "can't get ahold of men" otherwise, and that he "must have called them on the 28th" inasmuch as he "sent them out [to the Project] on the 29th." Young testified, finally, that he could not remember if he made the calls on March 29 or 1 or 2 days before.[12]

Kostelny testified that Young called him on March 28, and that he and Teuscher then called Young back the same day. Teuscher testified that the return call occurred on about March 29. Gillis testified that Young's call came to him on March 29; and Kelly, that he heard from Young on March 28 or 29. Jordan testified that he also received word by telephone, not in person at the hall as Young would have it, Young having called him in late March or early April. Later that same day, according to Jordan, he chanced to see Bergsma in a grocery store, telling him about this latest development.

Kostelny, Teuscher, and Jordan testified that they visited the Project the day after receiving Young's go-ahead, apprising Bergsma of the Union's willingness to let them return without dispatch slips; and Gillis and Kelly testified that they spoke with Bergsma by telephone the day after, likewise telling him that they could return without slips.

Kostelny testified that Bergsma's response to him and Teuscher was that he "would like" to have them "come back to work," but would "have to consult the attorneys first" and would "get back with" them. Kostelny then asked, as he recounted, "What is this stuff that two weeks ago you would have hired us without a dispatch, and now you won't?" to which Bergsma answered: "I just don't know. I have to consult the attorneys." Teuscher recalled Bergsma's saying, "I'd like to have you, but I don't think my attorneys will allow it." Kostelny testified that he never did hear back from Bergsma.

Jordan testified that Bergsma told him, when he appeared at the site, that he "wanted" Jordan, but there was "no way that [Jordan] could come back to work." Bergsma also remarked, according to Jordan, that Young "was not running" the job. Gillis related that Bergsma's response to him was that Respondent could not take him back "on the advice of [its] lawyers"; and Kelly testified that Bergsma told him, simply, that Respondent "no longer needed [his] services."

Young testified that, learning about these latest refusals to hire later the same day, he called Bergsma, asking "how come." Bergsma replied, as Young recalled, that Young "would have to talk to" Potts to get the answer.

Bergsma denied being party to any conversations of the kind just described, averring that no one came to the site about March 29 asking to return to work; that no one told him on or in the week after March 29 that the union carpenters could return "without a referral slip"; and, indeed, that he had no recall that any of the union carpenters asked to return any time after March 8.

Seeking to bulwark Bergsma's testimony that none of the union carpenters visited the site about March 29, Respondent attempted to show, in the words of its counsel, that the Project was in the midst of a "horrible storm" at the time, that "many of the roads were closed off," and that the "area was paralyzed." It is undisputed, however, that Bergsma drove about 22 miles from his home to the Project on March 29; and Earl Hagadorn, the Project's civil engineer, testified that "the highway was open that day and we could reach the front gate." Further, a vehicle log maintained by gate attendants at the site reveals that 12 vehicles entered the premises by 9 a.m. March 29, that another 20 entered during the balance of the day, and that 34 exited that day. The log does not reflect any entry or exit by Kostelny, Teuscher, or Jordan. As its name implies, however, pedestrian ingress and egress ordinarily was not entered; and they testified that they walked in and out on March 29, having parked outside the gate as had been their practice while on the payroll.

By letter to Young dated March 29, ostensibly prompted by Young's March 26 telegram, Potts stated in part:

> In my March 11, 1982, letter you were advised that the five employees in question were offered jobs under the same conditions that were prevailing at the time their earlier employment was terminated.

[11] Roger did not testify.

[12] "The only way" he could give "a definite answer" with regard to when he made the calls, Young testified, would be "to get [his] phone bills from either the union hall or [his] personal phone at home." He added: "They'd be very hard to find. They'd be in boxes of bills. It would take hours." The bills were not provided.

> Those conditions did not include the restrictions contained in the referral slips. The employees in question did not accept Fleur DuLac's offer and subsequently other employees were hired. . . . Fleur DuLac does not intend to hire new employees with such conditions attached. Furthermore, the project has no current need for employees.

The letter said nothing about the union carpenters' having told Bergsma, on March 29, that they would be able to return without dispatch slips.

Roger, the Union's attorney, responded by letter dated April 6, declaring:

> The Union reiterates that the use of the dispatch slip is not intended to establish terms and conditions of employment which were [not] in existence as of the time that the workers were originally hired or when they were initially discharged. The use of the dispatch slip is only a record that in fact these workers are employed on this job, and we disclaim any attempt by you or your client to view it otherwise.

There is no hint in this letter that the Union had abandoned its insistence upon the dispatch slips as a condition of hire.

Potts countered by letter dated April 13. Referring to the objected-to language in the dispatch slips, he stated:

> That language is inconsistent with statement in your letter and adroitly worded disclaimers will not vary the fundamental truth that by the use of referral slips the union is trying to establish representative status.

Rule testified that, about June 1, 1982, he informed Young that he was recovered from his surgery and ready to go to work; and that Young suggested he call Bergsma, adding that a dispatch slip would not be necessary for his return to the Project. Rule continued that he then called Bergsma, saying that his operation had been "a success" and that he wished to return to work. Bergsma asked how he wanted "to come back," according to Rule; he answered, "As a union member and the whole bit";[13] and Bergsma responded that he could not hire Rule, "no way." Rule admittedly did not think he mentioned to Bergsma that he would not need a dispatch slip. Bergsma did not speak to this conversation in his testimony.

Rule's last previous conversation with Bergsma, apparently, was in early March, when Bergsma invited Rule and the other alleged discriminatees to return to work. At that time, according to Rule, he told Bergsma about his disability and that Young had said he would have "to have a dispatch" from the Union to return to work for Respondent, and Bergsma responded that he would not "allow a dispatch."

[13] Asked what he meant by "the whole bit," Rule testified, "Well, with the benefits and everything."

B. Conclusions

1. The discharges

It is concluded that Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, and Rule were chosen for discharge because of their union membership, and that the discharges consequently violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) as alleged.

This conclusion is based on the totality of these factors:

1. Respondent and the Union were engaged in an ongoing dispute over the nature and legal incidents of their relationship, most recently manifested by a court hearing January 18—2 days before the discharges of Kostelny and Teuscher, and 5 before those of Jordan and Rule—in connection with Respondent's ultimately successful effort to enjoin the Union's grievance against it. That Sahadi mightily resented the Union's part in this dispute was revealed the preceding summer when he declared to Respondent's union carpenters that he was "having union problems" with Young, and that all the carpenters "would have to work there on a nonunion basis" if there were "any more problems."[14]

2. Scott, when informing Jordan and Rule of their discharges, cited Sahadi's desire to sever Respondent's ties with the Union.[15]

3. When challenged by Kostelny and Teuscher why they had been discharged, given that he had promised them "three years worth of work," Bergsma again stated that Sahadi wished to end all ties with the Union. Bergsma added that, if Kostelny and Teuscher were to return, it probably would have to be on a nonunion basis.[16]

4. When asked by Jordan, in early February, if he could return if he "dropped out of the Union," Bergsma told him to report the next Monday.[17]

5. The selection for discharge of Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, and Rule, all concededly excellent carpenters, while retaining what Sahadi termed as "dumbbell carpenters," breached Sahadi's own directive to "keep [the] best people to the end."

6. By denying involvement in the discharge decisions, Sahadi and Bergsma undermined their competence to testify knowingly about the discharges; and, by implicating each other in the decisional process in the face of those denials, they severely impaired their own and each other's overall credibility with regard to those actions. That impairment was compounded, moreover, by their often deficient testimonial demeanor, by their ready resort to evasion when examined by other than Respond-

[14] Kostelny, uncontroverted, is credited that Sahadi so spoke.

[15] The unchallenged and substantially consistent testimony of Jordan and Rule is credited that Scott said this.

[16] Kostelny's and Teuscher's renditions of this encounter, coincident in their essentials and unrefuted, are credited. Because of their discrepant versions of Scott's words when he discharged them, however, no weight adverse to Respondent is given either version of that event, even though Respondent did not come forward with Scott's account.

[17] Jordan's uncontroverted description of this incident is credited, as is his further testimony that Bergsma later reneged, citing a need "to check" with Respondent's lawyers.

ent's counsel,[18] and by Respondent's failure to bring forth Scott, who effected the discharges and thus likely had knowledge of the underlying deliberations, or Kromydas, identified by Bergsma as being a percipient witness. Consequently, even if there were not countervailing evidence, the reasons advanced by Sahadi and Bergsma, one or both, for a reduction in force of a magnitude embracing Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, and Rule—bad weather, hazardous conditions, lack of work—were unpersuasive and are rejected; and the reason offered by Sahadi for eliminating those four rather than the surviving "dumbbell carpenters"—that the overriding consideration was not skill but "the smallest hourly rate per day," inasmuch as only "menial things" remained to be done—likewise is not credited.

7. Apart from Sahadi's and Bergsma's poor credibility concerning the discharges, Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, and Rule were impressively believable that there was ample work for them to do, weather notwithstanding, and that conditions were not unusually hazardous. Further in that vein, Bergsma told Kostelny and Teuscher when hired that they could count on as much as 3 years of steady work, and assured them only a month or so before their discharges that they "would be staying throughout the winter";[19] and Scott discussed with Jordan and Rule, only about a week before their discharges, new interior work teaming arrangements until the weather eased.[20]

8. Union member carpenters never again were employed on the Project.

Respondent argues, of course, that unlawful motive in the discharges is belied by its having terminated a number of others, more of whom were nonmembers than members of the Union, starting the preceding fall, including five nonmembers on January 19 and 20, and by its having offered rehire to the four in question in early March. These circumstances, however, do not begin to offset the array of factors just itemized in support of the contrary conclusion. That others were terminated from time to time in apparent disregard of union membership, beyond showing the never contested fact that legitimately based reductions in force occurred during the winter, is of little moment. And that the four later were offered rehire is of slight redemptive value considering that, despite their exceptional abilities, the offers were not forthcoming until some 6 weeks after their discharges, during which time the carpenter complement more than tripled.

2. The alleged refusals to rehire

March 8.[21] It is concluded that Respondent's March 8 refusal to rehire Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, Gillis, and Kelly was not unlawful.

Although the parties have cited no authority on point, and none has been found, it would seem to go without saying—perhaps that explains the apparent paucity of authority—that an employer properly can decline to accept referral of a union member when to do otherwise, because of recognition language in the dispatch slip, would place it at risk of being deemed to have recognized a union not legally entitled to representative status.[22]

March 29. It is concluded, as a matter of fact, that Respondent did not refuse to rehire Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, Gillis, and Kelly about March 29; and that the allegation that it violated the Act by so doing therefore is without merit.

The grounds for this conclusion are these:

1. That Young defended the use of the dispatch slips in his March 26 telegram to Respondent, and that Roger did the same in his April 6 letter to Potts, compellingly indicates the absence of an intervening relinquishment by the Union of its insistence on the dispatch slips, and further indicates that the alleged discriminatees never presented themselves for hire on that basis.[23]

2. Young's testimony was unconvincing that Roger told him to "put the men on the job without a dispatch," as was his additional testimony that he advised the alleged discriminatees accordingly. Beyond the impeachment implicit in his March 26 telegram and Roger's April 6 letter, his demeanor when rendering this testimony was markedly lacking in conviction, his supposed conversation with Roger was devoid of corroboration and without any but the scantest of credence-giving foundational detail, his descriptions of his alleged conversations with the five members were fraught with telltale vagueness and speculation, and his version of how he informed Jordan that slips no longer would be needed was in direct contradiction of Jordan's account.

3. The testimony of the five alleged discriminatees on this issue likewise was unconvincing. Both their demeanor and the content of their recitals gave the impression of collaborative preprogramming; and Jordan's account, as just noted, conflicted diametrically with Young's.

4. Bergsma, while not an exemplar of probity in certain respects previously mentioned, was believable in his denials that anything transpired around March 29 of the sort described by the alleged discriminatees, and in his additional denial that Young called him about January 29 to ask "how come" the five had not been hired.

In concluding that there was no refusal to rehire about January 29, no weight is given the nonmention in the vehicle log of Kostelny, Teuscher, or Jordan, or to the possibility that the area was beset by a storm at the time.

[18] Sahadi, recurrently professing an inability to understand the question, was especially lacking in forthrightness. At one point in his cross-examination, he was moved to volunteer, "I'm not trying to be difficult, Judge." In fairness, however, it should be noted that some of the questions put to him were artlessly crafted.

[19] The substantially conforming and uncontroverted testimony of Kostelny and Teuscher is credited that Bergsma made these statements.

[20] Jordan's and Rule's consistent and unrefuted versions of this incident are credited.

[21] The complaint contains no allegation regarding the March 8 refusals to rehire. Counsel for the General Counsel declared during the trial, however, that their legality "should be considered and addressed," the issue was fully litigated, and Respondent argues the matter in its brief.

[22] That Respondent, from time to time after Young's June 8 presentation of dispatch slips for members previously hired, may have accepted such slips when newly hired union carpenters first reported for work does not detract from this conclusion. Given the pendency, at the time of the March 8 rejection of the slips, of the District Court's final disposition whether Respondent was subject to the Union's master labor agreement, Respondent had valid and pressing reason to be skittish about the recognitional language in the slips.

[23] Furthermore, neither of the amended charges, the first of which was filed March 30, refers to a refusal to rehire on or about March 29.

June 1. It is concluded that the refusal to rehire Rule about June 1 was not improper.

Although supposedly told by Young that he would not need a dispatch slip to return to the Project, Rule concededly doubted that he mentioned this to Bergsma. He recalled instead telling Bergsma, when asked how he wanted to come back, "As a union member and the whole bit." This answer would imply, Rule having told Bergsma in March that he would have "to have a dispatch" to return and there being no credible evidence that Respondent since had learned otherwise, that rehire remained contingent upon Respondent's acceptance of a dispatch slip, recognitional language included.

As earlier concluded in connection with the March 8 refusals to rehire, an employer properly can decline to hire in that circumstance, the union's not being legally entitled to representative status.[24]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By its discharges of Martin Kostelny and Lyle Teuscher on January 20, 1982, and its discharges of Raymond Jordan and Robert Rule on January 23, 1982, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

Respondent did not otherwise violate the Act as alleged or contended.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[25]

ORDER

The Respondent, Fleur DuLac, a joint venture composed of Fred Sahadi and Fred Andrews, Campbell, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against any employee because of that employee's membership in or support of Carpenters Local Union 2035, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, or any other union.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole Martin Kostelny, Lyle Teuscher, Raymond Jordan, and Robert Rule for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of its unlawful discharge of them in January 1982, with interest on lost earnings;[26] and, if it has not already done so, and if such employment is still available on the Fleur DuLac Project, offer them immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed.[27]

(b) If it has not offered reinstatement as prescribed in the preceding paragraph, and no longer can do so because all substantially equivalent carpentry work on the Fleur DuLac Project has been completed, inform Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, and Rule, in writing, that they will be considered eligible for employment in the future at any of its projects, on a nondiscriminatory basis, should they choose to apply for employment at any of them.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amounts of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at any and all of its jobsites within the jurisdiction of the above-named Union copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[28] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 20, after being signed by an authorized representative of the Respondent, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Send copies of the aforementioned notice, duly signed, by first-class United States mail, to Kostelny, Teuscher, Jordan, and Rule, and to all other carpenters employed on the Project at any time from January 20 through January 23, 1982, at their last known addresses.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that, except as otherwise decided, the complaint is dismissed.

[24] Young's March 26 telegram and Roger's April 6 letter, both professing to explain to Respondent the purpose of the dispatch slips, were of such ambiguity that Respondent's continued skepticism over the slips' recognitional language, as exemplified by Potts' April 13 letter to Roger, cannot be said to have been unreasonable.

[25] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[26] Backpay shall be computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950). Interest shall be computed as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[27] Whether the offers to rehire made March 4, 1982, satisfied Respondent's obligation to offer reinstatement to those unlawfully discharged, and effected a tolling of backpay, is left to the compliance phase of this proceeding.

Monroe Auto Equipment Division of Tenneco Automotive and Employee Committee of Monroe Auto Equipment Co., Petitioner. Case 10–RD–859

6 December 1984

DECISION ON REVIEW

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 18 November 1983 the Regional Director for Region 10 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in the above-entitled proceeding[1] finding, inter alia, that 71 employees of the Employer who had been laid off on 7 September 1982 and had not been recalled as of 18 November 1983 had a reasonable expectancy of being recalled at a later time and therefore were eligible to vote in the decertification election petitioned for by the Petitioner. Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, the Employer and the Petitioner both filed timely requests for review of the Regional Director's decision contending, inter alia, that the Regional Director's finding that the 71 laid-off employees had a reasonable expectancy of recall and were eligible to vote in the election was clearly erroneous and departed from established Board precedent. The Intervenor subsequently filed a statement in opposition to the Employer's request for review.

The Board, by telegraphic order dated 25 January 1984, granted the Employer's and the Petitioner's requests for review with respect to the Regional Director's finding that the 71 laid-off employees had a reasonable expectancy of recall and were eligible to vote in the election.[2] Thereafter, the Intervenor filed a brief in support of the Regional Director's decision, and the Petitioner filed a memorandum of law in opposition to the Regional Director's decision. The Petitioner also filed a motion to reopen the record to admit additional evidence, and the Intervenor filed a response in opposition to the Petitioner's motion to reopen the record.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case with respect to the issue under review, along with all of the documents filed by the parties, and makes the following findings.

The Employer, a Delaware corporation with Michigan headquarters, operates a facility in Hartwell, Georgia, which manufactures shock absorbers and struts for automobiles. Prior to 7 September 1982 the Hartwell facility was devoted primarily to the manufacture of shock absorbers and struts for the new-car market and secondarily to the manufacture of shock absorbers and struts for the replacement part market. Since at least early 1978 the Intervenor has been the collective-bargaining representative of a bargaining unit composed of the production and maintenance employees at the Hartwell facility. The most recent collective-bargaining contract between the Employer and the Intervenor, which took effect on 15 December 1980, provided that it would remain in effect until 16 December 1983 and from year to year thereafter unless either one of the parties gave a written notice of termination at least 60 days in advance.

On 7 September 1982 the Employer laid off 124 of the employees in the bargaining unit.[3] According to the uncontradicted testimony of Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Charles Byrd, the Employer instituted the 1982 layoff primarily because the nation's new-car industry had entered a serious sales slump and secondarily because the Employer's Michigan headquarters officials had decided to transfer the manufacture of shock absorbers and struts of the replacement part market out of the Hartwell facility. The layoff of 124 bargaining unit employees was accompanied by the layoff of 26 salaried individuals, including 15 individuals who were supervisors or foremen and directly supervised bargaining unit employees. After the layoff of 124 bargaining unit employees and 26 salaried individuals was carried out, the operation of the Hartwell facility was consolidated from two shifts into one shift and the positions of the salaried individuals who were laid off either were combined with the positions of salaried individuals who were not laid off or were eliminated altogether.

At the time the 1982 layoff was announced, the Employer's Michigan headquarters issued a press release describing the layoff as "a response to the current soft market demand" in the new-car market and quoting Company Director of Human Resources G. D. Gieske as saying, "Although industry analysts are not predicting an increase in demand in the near future, we look forward to the day that our Hartwell plant returns to its former level of production." At the same time, Company Manager of Manpower Development John Wein-

[1] International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW), and its Local Union No. 1427 intervened in this proceeding.

[2] The Board denied the requests for review in all other respects.

[3] The Regional Director's statement that the Employer laid off only 123 of the employees is not borne out by an examination of the Employer's documentary and testimonial evidence.

garten and Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Bryd told Union President Thomas Herring that the Employer was instituting the layoff because new-car sales were down and that they hoped that new-car sales would "pick back up" and the Employer's business would "pick back up." According to the uncontradicted testimony of Byrd, Byrd at no time told any of the laid-off employees or the Intervenor's officials either that the layoff was temporary or that the layoff was permanent. According to the uncontradicted testimony both of Byrd and of Herring, Byrd at no time sent written notices or letters to any of the laid-off employees or the Intervenor's officials stating that the employees did not have a reasonable expectancy of being recalled and at no time told any of the Intervenor's officials that the employees did not have a reasonable expectancy of being recalled. Bryd testified without contradiction that he told those of the laid-off employees who asked him whether they would be called back "any time soon" that the Employer did not have "any reasonable expectation of calling anyone back in the near future because of the economic situation," that the Employer was "tied directly with the new car market," and that "until the new car market . . . itself came out of the slump [the Employer] would not be in a position to call anyone back."

On 1, 6, 9, and 13 June 1983 and 18 August 1983 the Employer invited a total of 32 of the bargaining unit employees included in the 1982 layoff to return to work on a temporary basis. Twenty-nine of the employees accepted the invitation and were reinstated on a temporary basis; three of the employees declined the invitation and retained their rights as laid-off employees in accordance with the provisions of the collective-bargaining contract. On 15 August 1983 and 26 September 1983 the Employer invited a total of 53 of the bargaining unit employees included in the 1982 layoff to return to work on a permanent basis. Forty-six of the employees accepted the invitation and were reinstated on a permanent basis; seven of the employees declined the invitation and were terminated as company employees in accordance with the provisions of the collective-bargaining contract. The 1983 permanent recalls included 29 of the employees included in the 1983 temporary recalls. None of the salaried individuals included in the 1982 layoff was invited to return to work either at the time of the 1983 recalls or at any other time.

According to the uncontradicted testimony of Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Byrd, the Employer instituted the 1983 temporary recalls because the Employer was experiencing an increase in strut production requirements which Michigan headquarters officials predicted would last about 90 days.[4] According to the uncontradicted testimony of Byrd, the Employer instituted the 1983 permanent recalls because headquarters officials decided that the Employer was not going to experience lower strut production requirements again. Byrd testified without direct contradiction that after the 1983 permanent recalls were carried out, company officials concluded that the 53 employees included in the 1983 permanent recalls would be sufficient to meet the Hartwell facility's planned production schedule for the rest of 1983 and that the 71 employees included in the 1982 layoff and not included in the 1983 permanent recalls did not have a reasonable expectancy of being recalled. Byrd also testified without direct contradiction that at the time of hearing on 3 November 1983, he continued to consider that the 71 employees included in the 1982 layoff and not included in the 1983 permanent recalls did not have a reasonable expectancy of being recalled.

The collective-bargaining contracts between the Employer and the Intervenor have always provided that laid-off employees automatically lose all seniority and are terminated if they are not recalled before the expiration of a period of 15 months or a period equal to their plant seniority, whichever period is shorter. From the beginning of 1979 until the time of the 1982 layoff, 360 bargaining unit employees included in layoffs at the Hartwell facility were not recalled before the expiration of the applicable period and were accordingly terminated. Of the 360 employees so terminated, 12 were subsequently rehired.

Undisputed documentary evidence introduced by the Employer indicates that from June 1979 until November 1983, the number of bargaining unit employees at the Hartwell facility were reduced from 630 employees to 301 employees. The same evidence indicates that from June 1979 until November 1983, the monthly productivity of bargaining unit employees at the facility was steadily increased from 50.7 units per employee to 93 units per employee. Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Byrd testified without contradiction that since June 1979, the Employer has had a companywide management-by-objectives program containing guidelines which provide that every facility must try to reduce its labor costs and its material costs by 10 percent a year. According to the uncontradicted testimony of Byrd, the Hartwell facility has met the guidelines every year.

[4] Although Byrd testified that the increase in strut production requirements was expected to last about 90 days, the evidence does not indicate exactly how long the temporary recalls were expected to last. The memoranda from Bryd to Hartwell Plant Senior Accountant Gene Cleveland announcing the temporary recalls stated that the employees involved would be used as "spares" and that the employees' jobs, rates, and departments could vary from day to day. The collective-bargaining contract states that temporary employees are hired "for a designated (but limited) period of time such as, but not limited to, during the summer vacation period or during the Christmas holidays."

Since at least 1981, the Employer has subcontracted out some of the janitorial work at the Hartwell facility to other employers. Since the 1982 layoff, the Employer has had from about 7000 to about 21,000 of the shock absorbers manufactured each week at the facility sorted and packed by handicapped adults at a nearby center for the handicapped. At the time of the hearing, the Employer was using independent contractors to repaint the facility.

Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Byrd testified without contradiction that at the time of the institution of the Employer's management-by-objectives program, Michigan headquarters officials decided that it would be more cost-effective for every facility to meet production requirements by having existing employees work overtime rather than by hiring additional employees. Byrd testified without contradiction that employee fringe benefits at the Hartwell facility are equal to about 35 percent of regular employee wages and that having existing employees work overtime does not require the Employer to pay additional fringe benefits. Undisputed documentary evidence introduced by the Employer indicates that from January 1979 until October 1983, the quarterly number of hours of overtime worked at the Hartwell facility was increased from about 4805 hours to about 94,563 hours and the quarterly percentage of the total number of hours worked at the facility which was composed of overtime was steadily increased from 2.2 percent to 20.8 percent. Seven bargaining unit employees testified without contradiction that during the 2 or 3 months immediately preceding the hearing, they and a number of other bargaining unit employees regularly worked from about 8 hours to about 60 hours of overtime a week. According to the undisputed testimony of several of the bargaining unit employees, company officials at no time told them either that the existing level of overtime would be maintained or that the existing level of overtime would be reduced. According to the undisputed testimony of Bryd, company officials did not have any intention at the time of the hearing that the existing level of overtime would be reduced.

Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Byrd testified without contradiction that the Employer added American Motors as a customer at some time after the 1982 layoff and that he was aware that at some time Chrysler Corporation, another one of the Employer's customers, experienced a dramatic increase in sales. Byrd also testified without contradiction that the Hartwell facility is the only strut manufacturer in Georgia and that that fact has significantly increased the facility's production requirements. According to Union President Herring, company officials announced around July 1983 that they wanted the Hartwell facility's daily strut production to be increased from 6500 units to 10,000 units. Two shipping department employees testified that during the 2 months immediately preceding the hearing, the volume of shock absorbers and struts shipped from the facility increased noticeably; one shipping department employee testified that the volume of shock absorbers and struts did not increase noticeably. Undisputed documentary evidence introduced by the Employer indicates that in April, June, August, and October 1983, respectively, the facility's monthly production of shock absorbers and struts was 24,900 units, 25,500 units, 24,400 units, and 28,100 units.

The Board has traditionally held that laid-off employees are eligible to vote in a Board-conducted representation election only if they have a reasonable expectancy at the time of the election of being recalled in the near and foreseeable future. Lennox Industries, 250 NLRB 58 (1980); Allied Products Corp., 220 NLRB 634 (1975); Marley Co., 131 NLRB 866, 869 (1961). In determining whether laid-off employees have a reasonable expectancy of recall, the Board evaluates "objective factors" which include "the employer's past experience, the employer's future plans, the circumstances of the layoff, and what the employee[s] w[ere] told about the likelihood of recall." Atlas Metal Spinning Co., 266 NLRB 180 (1983). Accord: D. H. Farms Co., 206 NLRB 111, 113 (1973). After evaluating all of the objective factors which are present in this case and which we have described in detail above, we conclude, in disagreement with the Regional Director, that the 71 Hartwell employees included in the 1982 layoff and not included in the 1983 permanent recalls did not have a reasonable expectancy of recall and therefore were not eligible to vote in the decertification election petitioned for by the Petitioner.

In concluding that the 71 laid-off employees do not have a reasonable expectancy of recall in the near and foreseeable future, we place particular emphasis on the extensive and undisputed record evidence indicating that the Employer has long been engaged in and continues to be committed to a conscious effort to reduce the size of the Hartwell facility's work force. As we have described in detail above, undisputed evidence shows that of the 360 bargaining unit employees who were included in layoffs at the facility during the approximately 3-1/2 years preceding the 1982 layoff and were not recalled before the expiration of the period specified in the collective-bargaining contract, only 12 were ever rehired.[5] Undisputed evidence shows that the 1982 layoff itself was instituted both because the new-car industry had entered an extended sales slump and because headquarters officials had decided to transfer the manufacture of shock absorbers and struts for the replacement part market out of the facility altogether. Undisputed evidence shows that of the 15 supervisory salaried individuals and the 11 nonsupervisory salaried individuals who were also included in the 1982 layoff, none was ever recalled. Undisputed evidence shows that during the approximately 3-1/2 years preceding the hearing, the number of the bargaining unit employees at the facility was reduced by about 52 percent and the productivity of the bargaining unit employees was increased by about 83 percent. Undisputed evidence shows that during the approximately 3-1/2 years preceding the hearing, the Employer reduced the facility's labor costs by at least 10 percent every year and that at the time of the hearing, the Employer planned to continue to reduce the facility's labor costs by at least such a percentage every year. Undisputed evidence shows that during the approximately 3-1/2 years preceding the hearing, the quarterly number of hours of overtime worked at the facility was increased about twentyfold and the quarterly percentage of the total number of hours worked which was composed of overtime was increased about ninefold. Finally, undisputed evidence shows that during the approximately 3-1/2 years preceding the hearing, the Employer believed that it would be more cost-effective for the facility to meet production requirements by having existing employees work overtime rather than by hiring additional employees and that at the time of the hearing, the Employer did not intend to reduce the existing level of overtime at the facility. Taken together, the foregoing factors virtually compel us to conclude that the Employer is not reasonably likely to increase the size of the Hartwell facility's work force in the near and foreseeable future. Indeed, if the consistent patterns and the conscious policies of the past 4 years are continued, the Employer may reduce the size of the facility's work force still further. See, e.g., All-American Distributing Co., 221 NLRB 980, 981 (1975) (laid-off employees had no reasonable expectancy of recall because, inter alia, none of employees laid off in the preceding year was ever recalled); Sierra Lingerie Co., 191 NLRB 844, 845 (1971) (laid-off employee had no reasonable expectancy of recall because, inter alia, employer phased out one of its two lines of production and decided it would be more cost-effective for the other line to hire already trained outside employees than to retrain laid-off employees).

In addition, we place particular emphasis on the equivocal and uncontradicted record evidence indicating that the Employer has never said anything either to the 71 laid-off employees or to the Intervenor suggesting that the employees have a reasonable expectancy of recall in the near and foreseeable future. There is no record evidence showing that any of the Employer's officials ever told any of the laid-off employees or the Intervenor's officials that the employees had a reasonable expectancy of being recalled. On the contrary, as we have described in detail above, undisputed evidence shows that Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Byrd never told any of the laid-off employees or the Intervenor's officials that the 1982 layoff was temporary. In addition, undisputed evidence shows that Michigan headquarters officials issued a press release at the time of the layoff stating that the layoff was "a response to the current soft market demand" and that "industry analysts [were] not predicting an increase in demand in the near future . . . ." Finally, undisputed evidence shows that Bryd told those of the laid-off employees who asked him whether they would be called back "any time soon" that the Employer did not have "any reasonable expectation of calling anyone back in the near future . . . ." The fact that all of the Employer's statements which have specifically addressed the question have indicated that the 71 laid-off employees would probably not be recalled in the near and foreseeable future strongly supports our conclusion that the employees do not have a reasonable expectancy of recall. See, e.g., Lennox Industries, 250 NLRB at 58 (laid-off employees had no reasonable expectancy of recall because, inter alia, employees were told that the layoff was "indefinite" and that they should accept other employment if offered); Tomadur, Inc., 196 NLRB 706, 707 (1972) (laid-off employees had no reasonable expectancy of recall because, inter alia, supervisor not only told him to find other work but also gave no estimate as to duration of the layoff and no specific indication as to when, if ever, he would be recalled).

[5] The contractually specified period during which laid-off employees must be recalled to avoid being terminated expired for employees included in the 1982 layoff at the latest on 7 December 1983, 34 days after the close of the hearing and 19 days after the issuance of the Regional Director's decision. None of the parties has ever offered any evidence or made any claim, either at the time of the hearing or at any subsequent time, that any of the employees included in the 1982 layoff and not included in the 1983 recalls either was likely to be recalled or was in fact recalled by 7 December 1983.

Finally, we also emphasize the repeated and unequivocal record evidence indicating that the Employer itself considered that the 71 laid-off employees do not have a reasonable expectancy of recall in the near and foreseeable future. As we have described in detail above, Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Bryd testified without direct contradiction that after the 1983 permanent recalls were carried out, company officials concluded that the 71 laid-off employees did not have a reasonable expectancy of being recalled. Bryd also testified without direct contradiction that at the time of the hearing, he continued to consider that the 71 laid-off employees did not have a reasonable expectancy of recall. Since the foregoing testimony is directly contradicted by no evidence and is circumstantially corroborated by extensive evidence, the testimony also supports our conclusion that the 71 laid-off employees do not have a reasonable expectancy of recall. See, e.g., Lennox Industries, supra, 250 NLRB at 58 (laid-off employees had no reasonable expectancy of recall because, inter alia, employer indicated that it had no plans to recall employees in the near future); Allied Products Corp., supra, 220 NLRB at 634 (laid-off employees had no reasonable expectancy of recall because, inter alia, witness for employer testified that the possibility of recalling employees was quite remote).

In concluding that the 71 employees included in the 1982 layoff and not included in the 1983 permanent recalls had a reasonable expectancy of recall, the Regional Director relied on a number of factors which he interpreted as indicating that the Hartwell facility's production and manpower requirements had increased significantly since the 1982 layoff and would continue to increase for the foreseeable future. The factors in question included a purported "dramatic increase" and "general revitalization" in the nation's new-car market in the months immediately preceding the hearing; a purported increase in the volume of shock absorbers and struts shipped from the Hartwell facility during the 3 months immediately preceding the hearing; the Employer's announcement around July 1983 that the facility's daily strut production was supposed to be increased from 6500 units to 10,000 units; the facility's status as the only strut manufacturer in Georgia; the addition of American Motors as one of the Employer's customers since the 1982 layoff; the marked increase in the facility's use of overtime since the 1982 layoff; and the permanent recall of 53 of the facility's employees since the 1982 layoff. For a number of reasons, we find that the factors relied on by the Regional Director do not warrant the conclusion reached by the Regional Director.

First, we note that the record contains little specific evidence concerning either the size or the significance of the increase in the Hartwell facility's production requirements since the 1982 layoff. Although Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Byrd acknowledged that he was aware that at some time Chrysler Corporation experienced a dramatic increase in sales, the record contains no evidence either supporting the Regional Director's conclusion that the nation's new-car market as a whole experienced a "dramatic increase" and "general revitalization" in the months immediately preceding the hearing or indicating that such a phenomenon, if it occurred, directly affected the facility's production requirements. Compare Lennox Industries, supra, 250 NLRB at 58 (determination of expectancy of recall should be based on record evidence rather than "on mere speculation on the future of the nation's economy"). Although two shipping department employees testified that the volume of shock absorbers and struts shipped from the facility increased noticeably during the 2 months immediately preceding the hearing, the record shows that one of the two employees acknowledged that some of the purported increase may have represented an increase in parts manufactured elsewhere and simply shipped from the facility and that a third shipping department employee testified that the volume of shock absorbers and struts shipped from the facility did not increase noticeably during the 2 months preceding the hearing. The only documentary evidence in the record concerning the increase in the facility's production requirements is a company chart indicating that in April, June, August, and October 1983, respectively, the facility's production of shock absorbers and struts was 24,900 units, 25,500 units, 24,400 units, and 28,100 units, and such evidence does not establish either that production requirements have increased at a steady and predictable rate during the recent past or that production requirements are likely to increase at such a rate for the foreseeable future.

Second, we note that the record does not indicate that a majority of the factors relied on by the Regional Director occurred after the permanent recall of 53 of the Hartwell facility's employees in 1983. The record evidence in no way suggests that either the facility's status as the only strut manufacturer in Georgia or the addition of American Motors as one of the Employer's customers was not a factor until after the 1983 permanent recalls. On the contrary, the record evidence unequivocally shows that the announcement around July 1983 that the facility's daily strut production was supposed to be increased from 6500 units to 10,000 units occurred before the 1983 permanent recalls and that the increase in the facility's use of overtime had been plainly present since January 1979. Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Byrd testified in effect that the Employer believed that the 1983 permanent recalls would be sufficient to meet the increase in the facility's production requirements for the foreseeable future, and the fact that a number of the factors relied on by the Regional Director occurred before the recalls supports such a brief.

Third, we note that the record indicates that the increase in the Hartwell facility's production requirements has been accompanied by striking increases both in the productivity of the facility's employees and in the facility's use of overtime. The record evidence undisputedly shows that from the month before the 1982 layoff to the month before the hearing, the productivity of the facility's employees was increased by 6-1/2 percent. In addition, the record evidence undisputedly shows that from the half year immediately preceding the 1982 layoff to the half year immediately preceding the hearing, the facility's use of overtime was increased by about 140 percent. Finally, Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Byrd testified in effect that the Employer has had a companywide policy of meeting production requirements by using overtime rather than by hiring additional employees for the past 4 years and that the Employer does not have any intention of reducing the Hartwell facility's use of overtime for the foreseeable future. All of the foregoing factors virtually compel us to conclude that the striking increases in the productivity of the facility's employees and in the facility's use of overtime, coupled with the permanent recall of 53 of the facility's employees, are likely to be sufficient to meet the increase in the facility's production requirements for the foreseeable future.

The Regional Director found that the Employer's use of overtime was not likely to meet the increase in the Hartwell facility's production requirements for the foreseeable future in essence because the continued payment to employees of time-and-a-half and double-time pay would eventually prove too expensive and the continued use of employees to work many hours of overtime would eventually prove too exhausting. The Regional Director's reasoning, however, ignores the fact that the record indicates that the Employer does not have to pay existing employees who work overtime the 35-percent fringe benefits it would have to pay additional employees whom it might hire and that a sizeable segment of the facility's existing employees have not been working many hours of overtime and so are in a position to take over the overtime burden from employees who have been working such overtime and might not be able to continue to do so. More fundamentally, the Regional Director's reasoning in effect substitutes the Regional Director's business judgment for the Employer's. The question before us is not what steps we or the Regional Director believe the Employer ought to take to meet the facility's production requirements, but what steps the Employer, in the legitimate exercise of its own business expertise and experience, is in fact likely to take. The undisputed record evidence requires us to conclude that the step the Employer is likely to take is to continue to apply its long maintained and consistently applied companywide policy of meeting production requirements by having existing employees work overtime rather than by hiring additional employees.

In contending that the 71 laid-off employees have a reasonable expectancy of recall, the Intervenor, in addition to relying on the factors relied on by the Regional Director, relies on the fact that the Empoyer has never explicitly told the employees that they do not have a reasonable expectancy of recall. As we have already emphasized, however, the undisputed record evidence shows that the Employer issued a press release at the time of the 1982 layoff stating that the Hartwell facility did not face an increase in production requirements "in the near future" and that Hartwell Plant Personnel Manager Byrd stated to those employees who asked him whether they would be called back "any time soon" that the facility did not have "any reasonable expection of calling anyone back in the near future . . . ." The foregoing statements unmistakably indicated to the employees that they did not have a reasonable expectancy of being recalled in the near and foreseeable future, and the record evidence does not show that the Employer has ever made any statement to any of the employees indicating otherwise.

In addition, the Intervenor relies on the fact that the Hartwell facility has a policy of meeting needs for additional employees by rehiring former employees rather than by hiring new employees. The question, however, is not whether the facility is likely to meet a need for additional employees by rehiring the 71 laid-off employees, but whether the facility is likely to face a need for additional employees at all. As we have already explained, the undisputed record evidence requires us to conclude that the facility is not likely to face a need for additional employees in the near and foreseeable future.

Finally, the Intervenor relies on the fact that the Employer has subcontracted out some of the Hartwell facility's work to other employers since the 1982 layoff. The fact that the Employer has subcontracted out some of the facility's work, however, in no way indicates that the Employer is likely to recall the 71 laid-off employees in the near and foreseeable future. On the contrary, the fact indicates, as do many of the other facts established by the record, that the Employer has followed a conscious policy of reducing the size of the facility's work force in the past and is likely to continue to follow such a policy in the future.

The Intervenor repeatedly insinuates that the Hartwell facility's use of overtime and the facility's subcontracting out of work are steps deliberately designed to prevent the 71 laid-off employees from being eligible to vote in the decertification election. The record, however, contains no evidence suggesting the steps in question were taken for the purpose of achieving any impermissible objective related to the election or indicating that the Intervenor or any other party has ever filed any charges with the Regional Office alleging that the steps were taken for such a purpose. On the contrary, as we have already explained, the record contains extensive evidence indicating that the steps in question were taken as part of a conscious policy to reduce the size of the facility's work force which the Employer clearly adopted years before the filing of the decertification petition and consistently followed thereafer.[6]

We have been administratively advised that, despite the Board's grant of review in this proceeding, a decertification election was conducted by the Regional Director on 31 January 1984.[7] We agree with our colleague that the Regional Director breached Section 102.67(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations by failing to impound the ballots. However, no party has placed the issue of the validity of the election results before us at this time. Accordingly we remand the case to the Regional Director for further processing consistent with this decision.

[6] In its motion to reopen the record, the Petitioner requests us to admit additional evidence consisting of a form letter requesting rehire which the Petitioner's motion asserts was distributed by the Intervenor to all of the 71 laid-off employees and was returned to the Hartwell facility's plant manager by fewer than 10 of the laid-off employees. The assertions in the Petitioner's motion regarding the form letter, however, are not supported by any evidence or offer of evidence other than a single unsigned and undated copy of the letter itself, and therefore constitute nothing more than unsubstantiated and unsworn representations by the Petitioner's attorney. Accordingly, we deny the Petitioner's motion to reopen the record.

[7] Inasmuch as the Board was administratively advised that Regional Director failed to impound the ballots in accordance with Sec. 102.67(b) of the Board's Rules, Member Dennis would direct a new election.

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed 27 June 1983 by the Employer, alleging that the Respondent, Boilermakers Local 29, violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Laborers. The hearing was held 10 August 1983 before Hearing Officer Benjamin Smith.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, a Massachusetts corporation, is engaged in chimney erection and maintenance and annually performs contract work outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts valued in excess of $50,000. It also purchases and receives materials directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts valued in excess of $50,000 per year. The parties stipulate, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Boilermakers Local 29 and the Laborers are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

Ronald G. Plante, at the time of the hearing, was the president, owner, and general manager of Boston Chimney. On 1 June 1978 Boston Chimney and New England Laborers' District Council entered into a collective-bargaining agreement effective from that date through 31 May 1981. Article XVIII of the agreement provides that the contract will continue in effect on a yearly basis absent notification by either party that it desires to change, modify, or terminate the agreement. As of the hearing in this matter, the collective-bargaining agreement was still in existence. On 7 April 1977 the Company entered into a contract with the Iron Workers, which contract was also in existence as of the hearing herein. Boston Chimney has never had a collective-bargaining agreement with the Boilermakers.

On 7 January 1981 the Company entered into a contract with CEA Combustion, Inc. (CEA) for the design, fabrication, and erection of two chimneys[1] at the Brockton Wastewater Treatment Facility in Brockton, Massachusetts. The Employer has traditionally used employees represented by the Laborers to perform this work. On 13 August 1981 Crouse Combustion Systems, Inc. (Crouse) notified Boston Chimney that it had taken over the CEA project and would assume CEA's contractual obligations. At all relevant times, Crouse and Boilermakers Local 29 were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement.

In December 1982 Plante received a telephone call from Boilermakers business agent William Carey inquiring about the Brockton job and who would be performing the work. When Plante advised Carey he planned to use his "regular employees" (i.e., laborers), Carey responded that there would be "possible trouble" if Boston Chimney did not assign the work to members of the Boilermakers. Plante informed Carey that he would call him prior to commencing the job. Later in December Plante contacted Carey, told him the anticipated starting date of the Brockton job, and offered to employ one of his certified welders on the project "in an attempt to maintain harmony." Carey rejected the offer. Shortly thereafter Plante again called Carey and offered to assign two of his members to the project but Carey responded that it was unacceptable and that his members would not be permitted to work side by side with laborers on that job.[2]

Work on the Brockton project commenced on 3 January 1983 with only laborers being assigned work on the chimneys.[3] When the employees arrived at the jobsite, they discovered a Boilermakers picket line at the main entrance. Boston Chimney's attorney contacted the Boilermakers attorney and requested that the picket line be removed. The picketing ceased the following day. Boston Chimney completed the job on 24 February 1983.

[1] One chimney was a prefabricated chimney consisting of a steel jacket with a refractory lining and the other was an emergency bypass chimney consisting of a single wall, stainless steel stack.

[2] Plante admitted that Carey stated he had no problem with Boston Chimney utilizing its employees in a supervisory capacity on the job.

[3] Prior to commencing work, Boston Chimney had requested two welders from the Iron Workers Union, but the welders failed to report to the jobsite. As a result, members of the Laborers Union were used as welders.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the onsite erection of two chimneys at the Brockton Wastewater Treatment Facility in Brockton, Massachusetts.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer and the Laborers contend that the work in dispute should be assigned to employees the Laborers' District Council represents, arguing that the Employer's preference, economy, safety and efficiency, and the Laborers contract with the Employer favor such an award. Further, they contend that the Employer's past practice supports an award assigning the work to members of the Laborers.

Boilermakers Local 29 argues that there is no genuine dispute as the work involved has been completed, that Plante testified generally as to the factors he considers in making work assignments rather than stating precisely what he relied on in making the work assignment to the Brockton project, that Plante did not follow his normal practice in assigning employees to the subject job, and that the Employer and the Laborers have failed to support their claim that economy, safety, skill, or practice favor the award they seek.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

No party contends that there is an agreed-upon method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute to which all parties are bound.

As stated above, Boilermakers Local 29 established and maintained a picket line at Boston Chimney's Brockton jobsite upon learning that the Employer had assigned the disputed work to employees represented by another union. We find that an object of Boilermakers' conduct was to force the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees it represents.

We find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act.[4] Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Collective-bargaining agreement

The Employer, as stated above, is signatory to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Laborers. Article II of the contract recognizes the Laborers as the exclusive bargaining agent for all employees of the Employer performing such work as pointing, rebuilding, waterproofing, coating, sandblasting, painting, welding, rigging, demolition, erection of stacks, and installation of permanent platforms, ladders, safety climbing equipment, and concrete caps. Article I, section 1 of the agreement provides that the contract is in effect within the boundaries of the New England States and covers all field construction, demolition, plant-type construction, and other construction work, coming within the trade jurisdiction of the Union, resulting from decisions of public and private tribunals, or resulting from trade or area practice. Finally, the contract requires that the Employer make all work assignments in accordance with the provisions of the agreement.

The Employer does not have a contract with the Boilermakers.

Accordingly, we find that the collective-bargaining agreement favors assignment of the work in dispute to employees represented by the Laborers.

2. Company preference and past practice

Although Boilermakers Local 29 has claimed the disputed work, Plante testified that the Employer has utilized its employees (laborers) almost exclusively ("ninety-nine and nine-tenths of the time") to perform the work of erecting chimneys since the Employer entered into a collective-bargaining relationship with the Laborers in 1978. Plante estimated that the Employer erected approximately 125 chimneys in the 5-year period preceding the hearing in this matter.[5]

[4] We find no merit in the Respondent's claim that there is no longer a genuine dispute because the work involved is completed. The dispute is not moot absent evidence that the dispute will not arise again if the Employer later performs similar work in the Boilermakers' jurisdiction. Boilermakers Local 744 (Williams Crane Service), 232 NLRB 164 (1977).

We find the history of the Employer's past practice favors an award to employees the Laborers represent.

3. Relative skills

Plante testified that the average number of years Boston Chimney's employees have worked for the Employer is in excess of 10—two particular employees (of a total of about 5 to 10) have been with the Company for more than 25 years. Plante further testified that the firm never had a fatal accident and has an unblemished safety record. Boston Chimney's employees are familiar with the scaffolding used by the Company and the procedures and safety precautions which must be observed to perform the disputed work without accidents. The Boilermakers Union presented no evidence concerning the ability of employees represented by it to perform the disputed work. Accordingly, we find this factor favors assigning the disputed work to employees the Laborers represent.

4. Employer assignment and preference

The Employer assigned the work in dispute to, and prefers that it be performed by, employees represented by the Laborers. This factor favors an award to these employees.

5. Economy and efficiency of operations

Although the Employer and the Laborers argue that it is more economical and efficient to have laborers perform erection work rather than boilermakers, they failed to submit evidence establishing the manner in which utilizing laborers would result in more efficient operations. Therefore, this factor favors neither group of employees.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by the Laborers are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the applicable collective-bargaining agreement, past practice, and the Employer's assignment and preference. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by the Laborers, but not to that Union or its members. The current determination is limited to the particular controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of Boston Chimney & Tower Co., Inc. represented by Massachusetts Laborers' District Council are entitled to perform the chimney erection work at the Brockton Wastewater Treatment Facility in Brockton, Massachusetts.

2. Local 29, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers & Helpers, AFL–CIO is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force Boston Chimney & Tower Co., Inc. to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from the date of this Decision and Determination of Dispute, Local 29, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers & Helpers, AFL–CIO shall notify the Regional Director for Region 1 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

[5] Plante acknowledged that he utilized ironworkers on occasion over the years for performing welding work on steel permanent scaffolding and prefabricated refractory-lined chimneys. As of the hearing, Boston Chimney employed at least one certified welder, a member of the Laborers Union.

Pattern Makers' League of North America, Pattern Makers' Association of Milwaukee and Vicinity and Badger Pattern Works, Inc. Cases 30–CB–2122 and 30–CB–2155

7 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

Upon charges filed by Badger Pattern Works, Inc., the Employer, 8 September and 18 November 1983, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued complaints 19 October and 19 December 1983 against the Respondent alleging that it has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act. The General Counsel issued an order consolidating the cases 19 December 1983. The General Counsel issued amendments to complaints 5 January 1984.

The complaints allege that the Respondent imposed court-collectible fines against named individuals for engaging in certain conduct after submitting written resignations of membership in the Respondent. The Respondent filed answers denying that it committed an unfair labor practice.

On 13 February 1984 the parties jointly moved the Board to transfer the instant proceeding to the Board, without benefit of a hearing before an administrative law judge, and submitted a proposed record consisting of the formal papers and the parties' stipulation of facts with attached exhibits. On 25 April 1984 the Associate Executive Secretary, by direction of the Board, issued an order granting the motion, approving the stipulation, and transferring the proceeding to the Board. Thereafter, the Acting General Counsel and the Respondent filed briefs.

Upon the entire record in the case, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer is engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of patterns from its facility in New Berlin, Wisconsin. During the fiscal year ending 30 September 1983 the Employer sold and shipped from the New Berlin facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Wisconsin. The parties stipulated and we find that the Employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. The parties further stipulated and we find that the Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

The issue presented is whether the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by imposing a fine against 12 named individuals because they worked for the Employer during a strike. Each employee tendered his resignation to the Respondent before or shortly after returning to work.

A. Facts

Since about 28 June 1983 the Respondent has engaged in a strike against the Employer. The Respondent's constitution at all material times included the following provision:

> (Resignation) and/or (Trade Dispute)
> 13. No resignation or withdrawal from an Association, or from the League, shall be accepted during a strike or lockout, or at a time when a strike or lockout appears imminent.[1]

The following eight employees mailed or hand-delivered letters of resignation which the Respondent received before the employees returned to work: Richard Graham Jr., Herbert Heinze, James Anadelle, Bobby Lee Taylor, Robert Slak, Eugene Walker, Herbert Van Auwaeler, and Dale Kreil. The Respondent received the resignation letters of Paul Jaquette and Robert Karpay at approximately 9:30 a.m. of the respective days on which each returned to work at 6 a.m., and Jim Griffin's at approximately 9:30 a.m. on the day he returned to work at 6:30 a.m. The Respondent received William Prah's resignation the day after he returned to work. Each employee continued to work from the date of his return during the strike until at least the date the parties executed the stipulated record. After the employees returned to work and the Respondent received each one's letter of resignation, the Respondent sent each of the above-named employees a form letter ordering the employee to appear before the Respondent's executive committee to respond to charges that the employee violated various named articles of the Respondent's League Law. On 11 October 1983 the Respondent fined each of the 12 employees "the full amount of compensation paid to [him] and on [his] behalf during the strike." The Respondent filed charges against, and fined, the employees solely because they worked for the Employer during the strike. The Respondent has not specified the dates of work for which each employee is fined, nor the dollar amount of the fine. The Respondent has not taken any action to either collect the fines or to expunge or withdraw them.

B. Contentions of the Parties

The Acting General Counsel alleges that the Respondent's rule prohibiting resignation during a strike or when a strike is imminent is unlawful and does not privilege the fines it levied against employees who resigned during a strike at the Employer. The Respondent contends the complaint should be dismissed because its constitutional restriction on resignations rendered the employees' resignations ineffective and, in any event, it has not made any effort to collect the fines levied. Finally, it argues that no violation occurred as to its fining of employees who returned to work prior to the Respondent's receipt of their resignation letters.

C. Discussion and Conclusions

We recently reevaluated the authority of a union to limit its members' right to resign and ruled that a union may not restrict the right of its members to resign from membership. Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984).[2] Accordingly, we find the Respondent's maintenance of its constitutional prohibition on union resignation unlawful. Further, the Respondent's charging and levying of fines against employees for their conduct occurring on days after the Respondent received their resignations also violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[3]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Badger Pattern Works, Inc., New Berlin, Wisconsin, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By maintaining and enforcing its constitutional prohibition on its members' right to resign from the Union, and by charging and fining employees who worked during a strike after they resigned from the Respondent, the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. The foregoing unfair labor practice is an unfair labor practice affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent engaged in an unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act, including refunding to Richard Graham Jr., Herbert Heinze, James Anadelle, Bobby Lee Taylor, Robert Slak, Eugene Walker, Herbert Van Auwaeler, Dale Kreil, Paul Jaquette, Robert Karpay, Jim Griffin, and William Prah any moneys they may have paid as a result of the fines imposed on them because of their postresignation work for Badger Pattern Works, Inc. during the strike that began about 28 June 1983, with interest computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[4] In addition, we shall order the Respondent to cease and desist from maintaining the restriction on resignations found invalid and to expunge the provision from its governing documents. Engineers & Scientists Guild (Lockheed-California Co.), 268 NLRB 311 (1983).[5] In so doing we are not ordering that the parent International, which is not a party to this proceeding, expunge the offending provision from its constitution. Rather, we are only ordering the Respondent to expunge the provision from its governing documents including such documents of the International that the Respondent may have incorporated by reference and adopted as its own.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Pattern Makers' League of North America, Pattern Makers' Association of Milwaukee and Vicinity, West Allis, Wisconsin, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

[2] Neufeld Porsche-Audi, supra, Member Zimmerman dissented from the majority's overruling of Machinists Local 1327 (Dalmo Victor II), 263 NLRB 984 (1982), enf. denied 725 F.2d 1212 (9th Cir. 1984), although he agreed with the majority's determination that the rule against resignations of the union in that case was unreasonable and that fines levied against employees who tendered resignations during the strike violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. By the same reasoning, he concludes that the constitutional provision here is invalid and unenforceable.

[3] The Respondent received the resignations of Paul Jaquette, Robert Karpay, and Jim Griffin several hours after they returned to work. It received William Prah's resignation on the day after he returned to work. The Board orders reimbursement on a pro rata basis for fines levied in part for preresignation conduct and in part for postresignation conduct. In the event the Respondent should take action to collect the fines, they are enforceable against the four employees named above only in proportion to the percentage of the employee's conduct which took place before the employee's resignation was received. See Engineers & Scientists Guild (Lockheed-California Co.), 268 NLRB 311 (1983).

[4] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[5] Member Dennis joins her colleagues in ordering the Respondent to cease and desist from maintaining the restriction on resignations because the complaint alleges unlawful maintenance of the constitutional provision and the record supports that allegation. Compare Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 fn. 22 (1984), in which the complaint contained no such allegation. As in Neufeld Porsche-Audi, however, Member Dennis considers it impracticable to order the Respondent to "expunge" a provision appearing in the constitution of the parent International, which is not a party to this proceeding. Instead, Member Dennis would order the Respondent to notify its members in writing that it will not enforce the restriction on resignations.

(a) Maintaining in its governing documents League Law 13 of the constitution of the Pattern Makers' League of North America to the extent it provides:

> (Resignation) and/or (Trade Dispute)
> 13. No resignation or withdrawal from an Association, or from the League, shall be accepted during a strike or lockout, or at a time when a strike or lockout appears imminent.

(b) Restraining or coercing employees who have resigned from, and are no longer members of, the Respondent in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act by imposing court-collectible fines on such employees because of their postresignation conduct in working at Badger Pattern Works, Inc. during the strike that began about 28 June 1983.

(c) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Expunge from its governing documents League Law 13 of the constitution of the Pattern Makers' League of North America set forth above.

(b) Rescind the fines levied against Richard Graham Jr., Herbert Heinze, James Anadelle, Bobby Lee Taylor, Robert Slak, Eugene Walker, Herbert Van Auwaeler, Dale Kreil, Paul Jaquette, Robert Karpay, Jim Griffin, and William Prah because of their postresignation work for Badger Pattern Works, Inc. during the strike that began about 28 June 1983 and refund to them any moneys they may have paid as a result of such fines, with interest.

(c) Post at its business office and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 30, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the notice for posting by Badger Pattern Works, Inc., if willing, at all places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT maintain in our governing documents League Law 13 of the constitution of the Pattern Makers' League of North America to the extent it provides:

> (Resignation) and/or (Trade Dispute)
> 13. No resignation or withdrawal from an Association, or from the League, shall be accepted during a strike or lockout, or at a time when a strike or lockout appears imminent.

WE WILL NOT restrain or coerce employees who have resigned from, and are no longer members of, the Union in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act by imposing court-collectible fines on such employees because of their postresignation conduct in working at Badger Pattern Works, Inc. during the strike that began about 28 June 1983.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL expunge from our governing documents the portion of League Law 13 of the constitution of the Pattern Makers' League of North America set forth above.

WE WILL rescind the fines levied against Richard Graham Jr., Herbert Heinze, James Anadelle, Bobby Lee Taylor, Robert Slak, Eugene Walker, Herbert Van Auwaeler, Dale Kreil, Paul Jaquette, Robert Karpay, Jim Griffin, and William Prah because of their postresignation work for Badger Pattern Works, Inc. during the strike that began about 28 June 1983, and WE WILL refund to them any moneys they may have paid as a result of such fines, with interest.

Washington Gas Light Company and International Union of Gas Workers. Case 5–CA–12052

7 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 17 December 1980 Administrative Law Judge James L. Rose issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs. The Respondent filed cross-exceptions and the Charging Party filed a brief in response to the Respondent's cross-exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.[1]

This case concerns whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to furnish the Union with employees' disciplinary records which the Union requested in preparation for an arbitration hearing concerning the discharge of employee Howard Smith. The judge found no violation. We disagree.

On 26 September 1979 Smith had two drinks prior to reporting to work. He refused his foreman's order to take a blood test and a urinalysis, pursuant to the Respondent's policy. He was discharged, and he subsequently filed a grievance.

Approximately a week prior to the arbitration hearing, the Union learned that four employees in the past had been disciplined, but not discharged, for being intoxicated. Consequently, it requested that the Respondent furnish it with "All records of disciplinary action relating to the following employees or former employees: Philip Gore, Clarence Fullen, George Tharrington, and Satterwhite." (Fullen and Gore were no longer employees.) The Respondent's attorney replied that employee files were confidential and that its practice was not to release information from the file without employee consent. He suggested that the Union contact the four people and ask them to review their files with the Union. Alternatively, the Union could have the individuals sign a written release or call the personnel department, identify themselves, and give an oral release authorizing the Union to look at the file. The Union's attorney rejected the Respondent's proposed alternatives because it claimed an unqualified right to the information requested. The disciplinary records were never furnished. Ultimately, the arbitrator ordered Smith reinstated.

The judge found that the disciplinary records requested by the Union were relevant to the issue in arbitration of whether Smith had been treated disparately from other employees who had been disciplined for being intoxicated. Relying on rationale of the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Detroit Edison Co., 440 U.S. 301 (1979), however, the judge found reasonable the Respondent's position that the employees' personnel files were confidential in their entirety. In particular, he noted that some of the files contained medical reports concerning intoxication or explaining lengthy absences from work. Having accepted the legitimacy of the Respondent's confidentiality claim, the judge found that the Respondent reasonably refused to release any portion of a personnel file to the Union without the individual's consent. Noting that the Union had not stated why the Respondent's conditional offer could not meet its needs, the judge recommended dismissing the complaint in its entirety.

It has long been held that an employer has an obligation to provide a union with information which is reasonably necessary for the union's performance of its representative duties, including the processing of grievances.[2] The test for the union's need for the information is whether the information sought is probably or potentially relevant to the execution of those statutory duties.[3] We agree with the judge's finding that the information requested by the Union here was relevant to the handling of Smith's grievance.[4]

The Supreme Court held in Detroit Edison, however, that a union's interest in arguably relevant information does not always predominate over all other interests. Rather, the Court indicated that determining the employer's duty to supply such information when it is assertedly confidential requires a balancing of the union's need for the information against the legitimate and substantial confidentiality interests of the employer. The party asserting the claim of confidentiality has the burden of proof.[5]

We find that the Respondent has failed to prove that its general confidentiality claim with respect to all material in employee personnel files outweighs the Union's need for the information requested here. There is no evidence of a clear past practice or policy of confidentiality to support that claim. The Respondent has never informed the employees that their files were confidential; the employees have not requested a confidentiality policy. The Respondent's own officials had free access to the files, and they freely disclosed to the Union certain disciplinary information subsequently recorded in the files. Finally, the Board has recognized that the normal practice in private arbitration is to compare employee work records in deciding whether contested discipline was discriminatory.[6] Consequently, this case is fundamentally different from Detroit Edison, where the employer had promised the employees that the information requested would remain private.[7] Further, even assuming that the Respondent had a confidentiality plan, the Board has repeatedly rejected the blanket confidentiality claims as an inadequate defense for an employer's per se refusal to furnish any information from an employee's file.[8] There must be a more specific demonstration of a confidential interest in the particular information requested.

The Respondent raised a more limited confidentialilty defense for the first time at the Board hearing. It maintained that it could not unconditionally turn over the disciplinary records to the Union because they contained references to medical problems such as alcoholism as well as a recommendation for an employee to seek counseling for alcoholism. In response, the Union has disclaimed any interest in securing medical information. It only desired records relating to "the level of discipline imposed on the four individuals."

The Board has found the identity of individuals who suffer from medical disorders to be confidential.[9] From examining the disciplinary records introduced at the hearing with the individual names deleted, however, it is evident that not all of the requested disciplinary records contained references to medical problems. The possibility that the furnishing of the disciplinary records may include some references to a medical problem does not excuse the Respondent from complying with the request to the extent that it includes information as to which an adequate defense has not been raised.[10] The Respondent breached its collective-bargaining obligation when it refused to provide the Union with the disciplinary records requested, at least to the extent that they did not contain references to medical problems. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[11]

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices, we shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall, inter alia, require the Respondent to furnish the Union, on request, the disciplinary records of employees or former employees, Philip Gore, Clarence Fullen, George Tharrington, and Satterwhite to the extent the records do not include medical information.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Washington Gas Light Company, Washington, D.C., its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with International Union of Gas Workers by refusing to furnish the requested disciplinary records of employees or former employees Philip Gore, Clarence Fullen, George Tharrington, and Satterwhite to the extent that such records do not include individual medical information.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request furnish the Union the requested disciplinary records of employees or former employees Philip Gore, Clarence Fullen, George Tharrington, and Satterwhite to the extent that such records do not include individual medical information.

(b) Post at its office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the notice, on [7] This case is likewise distinguishable from New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. v. NLRB, 720 F.2d 789 (3d Cir. 1983). There, the court found that an employer had lawfully refused, on the basis of an established employee confidentiality plan and the lack of written consent of the employee involved, to hand over highly personal and sensitive absence and tardiness records.

[11] Inasmuch as the Union has never sought the confidential medical information, we shall order the Respondent to furnish the Union the disciplinary records with the medical information deleted.

forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES L. ROSE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried before me on October 21, 1980, at Washington, D.C., upon the General Counsel's complaint which alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to turn over to the Charging Party certain personnel records of employees and former employees. The Respondent denied that it has committed any unfair labor practices.

On the record as a whole, including briefs and arguments of the General Counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, Washington Gas Light Company, is a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, and is engaged in the operation of a public utility, supplying natural gas to customers in the Washington, D.C. area. The Respondent annually receives in excess of $250,000 in gross revenues and annually purchases and receives goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the District of Columbia. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The International Union of Gas Workers (the Union or the Charging Party) for many years has represented the Respondent's production employees and has negotiated successive collective-bargaining agreements. The one in effect when the events here occurred was from June 1, 1979, to May 31, 1980. It is admitted and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background Facts

On September 26, 1979, employee Howard L. Smith was discharged for being under the influence of alcohol. Briefly, Smith had two drinks of vodka prior to reporting to work on the morning of September 26, and appeared to his foreman to be under the influence. Thus, pursuant to the established procedure in such matters, the foreman ordered Smith to a medical laboratory to take a blood test and urinalysis. Smith refused to do so which, according to the Company, was tantamount to an admission of being intoxicated. Following an extended altercation he was dismissed. An arbitrator concluded that the discharge was unreasonable, that company officials had led Smith to believe his refusal to take the lab tests would result only in a 10-day suspension. Further, when Smith was advised that he was being terminated, he agreed to take the tests, but the Company then refused to let him. Accordingly, the arbitrator sustained the grievance, ordering the discharge reduced to a 10-day suspension.

About a week prior to the date set for the arbitration hearing, the Union's attorney requested four items from the Respondent, including "All records of disciplinary action relating to the following employees or former employees: Philip Gore, Clarence Fullen, George Tharrington, and Satterwhite."

The Respondent refused to furnish this material, taking the position that the personnel files of employees are confidential, and their contents will not be released to a third party. However, Paul Ford, an attorney with the Respondent, did advise the Union that the individuals in question were at liberty to review their own files and could bring along anyone they wished. Ford suggested two other alternatives: that the individual sign a written release authorizing whoever to look at his file; or the individual could just call the personnel department, identify himself appropriately, and give an oral release.

Gary Lieber, counsel for the Union, rejected these proposals by Ford, contending that the Union had an absolute right to this information inasmuch as the disciplinary actions against these four were relevant to the Union's defense of the Smith discharge. The Union had been advised that each had been disciplined, but not discharged, for intoxication. Lieber testified:

> That is the way he [Ford] did offer to make them [the disciplinary records] available; through the Union's obtaining a waiver from the employees which I indicated was unacceptable. Particularly, at that late date, but at any event unacceptable.

B. Analysis and Concluding Findings

Citing NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967), the General Counsel contends that the Respondent's refusal to give the Union this material was a breach of its bargaining obligations inasmuch as it was "potentially relevant and useful to the representative in processing grievances under the contractually established grievance procedure."

The Respondent argues that the Union does not have an absolute right to look at the personnel files of employees; that the contents of employees' personnel files are confidential; and that its offer to release the information conditioned on the individual's consent was not unlawful. The Respondent relies on Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301 (1979). I agree with the Respondent.

It should first be noted that the material requested by the Union was clearly relevant to one of the material issues in the Smith grievance—whether he had been treated disparately from others disciplined for intoxication. Indeed, excerpts from the personnel files of the four individuals named (offered in evidence with the names excised) show that one or more of them had in fact been disciplined but not discharged for intoxication, and one had declined to take the lab tests.

In preparing for arbitration, counsel for the Union learned that the four individuals named in his demand had been disciplined for intoxication. Thus it was important to have records which show how the Company perceived these instances (as distinguished from the individual's recollection of what happened) in order to establish that Smith had been treated disparately. While the Union may have had no firm idea concerning the nature of the disciplines for intoxication, there is nothing in the record to indicate that the request of this particular material was not made in good faith. Again, as the material itself shows, such was clearly relevant to issues in the arbitration proceeding. Accordingly, the Union would be entitled to have access to this information in order to perform its duty as the representative of employees, including Smith.

However, the Union and the General Counsel argue, in effect, that having established the relevancy of the material, the Union has an unfettered right to it—that other considerations, such as the confidentiality of one's personnel file, must yield. It is on this point, I conclude, the Supreme Court's decision in Detroit Edison is controlling.

Specifically, Ford stated that the Respondent would release the information with consent of the employee in question.[1] Indeed, mindful that the arbitration hearing was imminent when the demand was made, Ford told Lieber that the consents need not be in writing—that an oral communication to the personnel office with some kind of identification would suffice.

The Company's position that personnel files are confidential is, I believe, reasonable. Personnel files contain information of a sensitive nature. For instance, some of the material demanded by the Union relating to discipline include medical reports establishing why the individual in question had been absent for a prolonged period, as well as medical reports concerning intoxication. In short, that the Respondent treated employees' personnel files, including those portions relating to discipline, as confidential is certainly not unreasonable.

Hence, it was not unreasonable for the Respondent not to release any portion of a personnel file to the Union without the employee's consent. This was "unacceptable" although no reason was given why the Union could not or would not seek the consent of the individuals named in the demand letter. There is no evidence that the Union sought to obtain consents.

In any event, as the Supreme Court said in Detroit Edison, 440 U.S. 301, 317–318 (1979), with regard to test scores which the company there claimed to be confidential:

> Nevertheless we agree with the Company that its willingness to disclose these scores only on receipt of consents from the examinees satisfied its statutory obligations under Section 8(a)(5).
> The Board's position appears to rest on the proposition that union interests in arguably relevant information must always predominate over all other interests, however legitimate. But such an absolute rule has never been established, and we decline to adopt such a rule here. There are situations in which an employer's conditional offer to disclose may be warranted. This we believe is one.

Here no reason was advanced why the Company's conditional offer to furnish the requested material would not have met the needs of the Union. Thus, on the facts here, I conclude that the Respondent did not violate its obligations under Section 8(a)(5).

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

[1] Two of the named individuals were no longer employees at the time the request was made; however, there was no showing that the Union could not find them in order to obtain their consent or that the Union even tried.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 25 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached supplemental decision. Applicant Carthage Heating & Sheet Metal Co. filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

It is ordered that the application of the Applicant Carthage Heating & Sheet Metal Co., Carthage, Missouri, for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act be dismissed and that the Applicant's motion for a protective order prohibiting public disclosure of its financial statement be granted.

[1] Member Dennis does not rely on the judge's citation to the unpublished judge's decision in Capitol Boiler Works, JD-179-83.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION ON APPLICATION FOR AWARD OF ATTORNEYS FEES AND EXPENSES

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Administrative Law Judge. On July 25, 1983,[1] Local Union No. 36, Sheet Metal Workers, International Association, AFL-CIO (the Union) filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that Carthage Heating & Sheet Metal Co. (the Applicant) had violated certain provisions of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). On September 8, the Regional Director for Region 17 issued a complaint, alleging that the Applicant failed and refused to bargain collectively with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act. A hearing was scheduled to take place on October 17. However, on October 13, the Regional Director issued an order dismissing the complaint, withdrawing the notice of hearing, and closing the proceeding.

[1] All dates refer to the year 1983, unless otherwise stated.

On November 14, the Applicant filed an application for award of fees under the Equal Access to Justice Act, Public Law 96-481, 94 Stat. 2325 (the EAJA) and Section 102.143 of the Board's Rules and Regulations and an application for permission to furnish its financial statement in a sealed envelope as confidential financial information. By order of the Board, dated November 18, the application was referred to the Chief Administrative Law Judge for appropriate action; and by order dated May 23, 1984, the application was assigned to me.

On December 1, 1983, General Counsel moved to dismiss the application on three grounds: (1) the Applicant is not a prevailing party within the meaning of 5 U.S.C.A. § 504(a)(1) of the EAJA;[2] (2) special circumstances in this proceeding make an award unjust;[3] and (3) the Applicant failed to provide an itemized statement for services incurred solely in connection with the instant unfair labor practice complaint proceeding.

In Section 202(a) of the EAJA, the Congress found that certain individuals, partnerships, corporations, and labor and other organizations may be deterred from seeking review of, or defending against, unreasonable governmental action because of the expense involved in securing the vindication of their rights in civil actions and in administrative proceedings. Thus, Congress expressed in Section 202(b) that it was the purpose of the EAJA to diminish the deterrent effect of seeking review of or defending against governmental action by providing in specified situations for an award of attorney's fees, expert witness fees, and other costs against the United States.

The Committee on Small Business in its report, H. Rep. 96-1005, part 1, 96th Cong. 2d Session, at page 5, noted that the legislation was intended to respond to a chronic problem small business owners have in contesting or challenging the unreasonable exercise of governmental authority because of the time and expense required to challenge the vast resources of the Federal Government. The report noted: "It is expected that this bill will cause agencies to be more deliberate in their regulatory activity." Furthermore, the committee noted at page 7:

> In cases involving Government action, small business does not have the resources to defend itself against unjustified claims. Further, the costs of vindication routinely exceed the amounts at stake. Lastly, the Government does not have the economic incentive or disincentive to closely evaluate the reasonableness of its case before proceeding. For these reasons it appears that the American Rule [that each party must bear his/her own cost of litigation] is inappropriate in actions involving the Government and individuals or small business.

[2] Sec. 504(a)(1) provides:

> An agency that conducts an adversary adjudication shall award, to a prevailing party other than the United States, fees and other expenses incurred by that party in connection with that proceeding unless the adjudicative officer of the agency finds that the position of the agency as party to the proceeding was substantially justified or that special circumstances make an award unjust.

[3] Ibid.

And at page 8, the committee wrote:

> It must be noted that the real aim of this legislation is not to spend great sums to pay the costs of fighting unwarranted Federal action. Rather, it is intended that the act will force the Federal departments and agencies to substantially improve the quality of their enforcement and other proceedings. But let there be no mistake, your committee clearly intends that where a small business or individual prevails against the Government either in toto or in substance, reasonable costs and fees shall be paid to him unless the Government can show that its action was substantially justified.

Thus, the essence of the EAJA is not only to reimburse those who have been taken advantage of because of the greater resources and expertise of the United States but also to deter the United States from taking advantage of small business and other organizations by ensuring that the Government carefully reviews and evaluates those matters which it ultimately seeks to litigate.

The Act provides that any person is entitled to file a charge alleging the commission of unfair labor practices. Upon filing, the General Counsel must conduct an investigation to ascertain whether a complaint should issue. In accord with the General Counsel's fixed procedures, both the charging and the charged party are entitled to submit evidence in support of their respective positions, and the General Counsel will frequently take investigatory affidavits from witnesses who may be helpful in resolving factual disputes. Only when the General Counsel is satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that a violation has occurred will a complaint issue. But, before a complaint issues, the charged party will be given a final opportunity to avoid a formal proceeding by entering into a settlement agreement.

The Applicant seeks to be reimbursed for 30.95 hours of work, but its services total 35.60 hours,[4] of which 14.50 hours were performed prior to September 8, the date the complaint issued. Because no adversary proceeding had commenced prior to that date, these could not be allowed. As stated above, the purpose of the EAJA is to prevent governmental abuse of its power by commencing legal proceedings without justification while permitting the Government to analyze its claim to ensure that there is substantial justification for it. The Applicant, in effect, seeks partial expenses solely because the General Counsel was doing what the Act entrusted him and required him to do. Under no reading of the EAJA can such expenses be justified. In addition, the Applicant's expenses appear to include services related to its Federal court action and the Union's counterclaims, discussed below, as well as services rendered in the preparation of a letter citing legal authorities why the unfair labor practices complaint should not have issued, which letter arguably should have been prepared and filed prior to the issuance of the complaint. If the sole issue on this motion were the validity of the Applicant's specification of services rendered, I would grant the General Counsel's motion to dismiss, permitting the Applicant to amend its application to set forth only those legal services rendered in connection with the unfair labor practice proceeding.

However, I conclude that the Applicant has made no showing that it is the prevailing party in this proceeding and that the General Counsel's motion has merit.[5] The unfair labor practice complaint alleged that the Applicant violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) of the Act by failing since about January 26, 1983, to comply with two collective-bargaining agreements which required the Applicant to make payment to various fringe benefit funds, including the Union's and its International's industry funds, on behalf of various employees who were employed within the units represented by the Union. The complaint alleged that the Applicant did not make contributions on behalf of its employees who were not members of the Union.

The Applicant's answer denied the substantive allegations of the complaint and further contended that the complaint should be dismissed because: (1) Since February, the Union and the employees engaged in a strike which constituted a substantial and material breach justifying the Applicant in rescinding the agreement, a recission in which the Union acquiesced, and the Applicant was thereby released from any further obligations under any agreement since February; (2) all employees from whom the Applicant failed to make contributions were expressly exempted from coverage pursuant to an agreement made about April 19, 1982, between the Applicant and the Union's agent; (3) in the event that neither item (1) or (2) applies, then the Applicant had no duty to bargain in good faith with the Union since February, because the strike was in violation and a repudiation of the collective-bargaining agreement; (4) the payment of contributions was a nonmandatory subject of bargaining because the Applicant had no duty to bargain in good faith with the Union since February, because the strike was in violation and a repudiation of the collective-bargaining agreement; (4) the payment of contributions was a nonmandatory subject of bargaining because the Applicant had no authority or control or right to participate in the selection of employer trustees, a violation of Section 302 of the Act; (5) similarly, contributions to the industry promotion funds are not mandatory subjects of bargaining under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act; and (6) the Union committed various acts constituting a refusal to bargain under Section 8(b)(3) of the Act and, therefore, it would be unfair and inequitable to require the Applicant to make the contributions complained of or otherwise to be found in violation of the Act.

The litigation of this complaint and the answer, including the above defenses, were avoided by the settlement agreement entered into by the Applicant and the Union; but, in order to understand that agreement, it is necessary to digress and refer to a civil action brought by the Applicant against the Union in the Circuit Court of [4] Affidavit of Donald W. Jones, dated November 10, 1983. Additionally, the Applicant seeks expenses for the preparation and prosecution of its EAJA application.

[5] The General Counsel's motion was supported by documentary evidence, to which the Applicant took no exception. I have treated this motion as one for summary judgment.

Greene County, Missouri, which action was subsequently removed by the Union to the United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri, bearing Case 83-3505-CV-S-4. The Applicant's petition alleged three causes of action. First, it sought a declaratory judgment concerning whether it was covered by a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union; whether it was bound by that agreement and to what extent; and whether it was bound by an arbitration award rendered pursuant to the agreement, which award required the Applicant to pay $10,500 to the Union's apprenticeship committee. The Applicant contended that it was not bound by the agreement or, alternatively, was bound only as to three union members so long as they worked for the Applicant. Alternatively, the Applicant claimed that it was not bound by the agreement for essentially the same reasons expressed in its answer to the unfair labor practice complaint and that the arbitration award was illegal, void, and unenforceable because it constituted a penalty, contrary to the common law of the State of Missouri and Federal common law under Section 301 of the Act. Second, realleging all of the allegations of the first cause of action, it attacked various procedural irregularities concerning the arbitration hearing and award and sought to set aside the award. Third, it alleged that the Union, by its actions in fostering the strike and not giving proper 8(d) notices, should be required to pay $90,000 in damages.

The date that this action was commenced is not clear, but it must have been after the award was rendered; and the award was mailed to the Applicant on July 1. Furthermore, the Union filed two counterclaims to the Applicant's petition, but when and what they alleged is not in the record. What is in the record is the parties' three-page settlement agreement, which is dated September 27 and which explains the desire of both parties to settle all claims, disputes, and matters which had been raised in the Board proceeding and the civil action, including the Union's two counterclaims. From my perspective, not having heard any evidence involving any of the pleadings capsulized above and not knowing what were the "gut" issues which separated the parties so grievously, it is difficult to assess just what results the parties sought, what their thought processes were, where they felt themselves vulnerable, and where they felt their strengths lay. Settlements are reached by sometimes strange and obscure methods. It is because the parties are so intimately familiar with the result they desire to reach that, traditionally, both employers and unions have been averse to the notion of compulsory arbitration, feeling that no arbitrator could conceivably fathom all issues with the depth of understanding that the parties possess.

Perhaps that is the beauty of the collective-bargaining process, the promotion of which is perhaps the Act's prime purpose and which the Act fosters to enable the parties to sit down and thrash out their problems face to face, frankly, and with open minds. More often than not, a settlement is the result of compromise. It has been said, but sadly I do not know to whom to attribute it, that the best settlement is one in which neither side is happy. Certainly, there is "give and take," and the parties' settlement agreement herein is no exception.

First, pursuant to the thought expressed in the preamble, all legal proceedings were to be withdrawn. The Union was to request from the arbitrators that their award against the Applicant be withdrawn. The settlement was conditioned on the arbitrators approving the withdrawal. The Applicant was to move for the dismissal of its civil action with prejudice, and the Union was to take similar action with respect to its counterclaims. The Union was to request withdrawal of its unfair labor practice charge, and the settlement was conditioned on the Regional Director's approval of the withdrawal request.

Second, in addition to wiping clean the slate of legal actions, the slate of past claims was also to be erased. No moneys were due from the Applicant prior to September 27 and the collective-bargaining agreement was rescinded as of February 15. However, the subsisting union collective-bargaining agreements immediately became binding on the Applicant and the Applicant also agreed to be bound by the next union agreement with the Southwest Missouri Chapter of the Sheet Metal Contractors' Association, sight unseen, and agreed to continue the other of its agreements for the term of that Association agreement. However, if the Applicant were not a member of the Association, it need not make contributions to the industry funds but would pay the amount in additional wages to the employees as would have been due as contributions to the funds. The settlement also provided other modifications to the agreements, apparently to suit the Applicant's personal needs.

In sum, there is in the settlement agreement something for everyone. The liability of the Applicant, if any, for money due from February to September 27 was extinguished. But new obligations, not in being in February, arose. The remedy which the Board may have ordered was only partly extinguished, because, if it were found that the Applicant refused to bargain in good faith, it would have been ordered to do so. It is true that certain specific relief was avoided, but the Union appears to have traded the past 7-month liability for a longer and more stable relationship. And that is what the Act is all about. Faced with an all-ecompassing agreement which reconciled the parties' positions, little would be gained by the Regional Director by not acceding to the parties' wishes and refusing to approve the Union's withdrawal requested. I might add that, had I been assigned to hear this unfair labor practice proceeding and been given settlement agreement, I would have without hesitation approved the settlement, even unilaterally if the Regional Director had refused to go along with it, because the purposes of the Act are clearly effectuated by the avoidance of a hearing and the accompanying long delays which, unfortunately, presently plague this Agency, by the stabilization of industrial relations, and by the promotion of collective bargaining.

Clearly, then, the approval of the settlement and dismissal of the complaint, for those who are aware of the workings and thinking of the Board, are not admissions that the Applicant was correct all along and that its defenses to the unfair labor practice complaint were legally justified. Rather, in the broader view, the dismissal represents not a decision on the merits but an encouragement of the process of private settlement of disputes through collective bargaining and without governmental interference. The parties know far better what they want than even we administrator and administrative law judge supposedly expert in labor relations. The Act can ask no more than the parties engage in collective bargaining, and the public's right and interest are protected and enhanced by the Regional Director's final order dismissing the complaint.

In these circumstances, the Applicant cannot show that it prevailed in the underlying proceeding. Rather, the Applicant acknowledged the Union as the representative of its employees, agreed to be bound by the union agreements, and agreed to make contributions to the fringe benefit programs. That is hardly consistent with its defense to the unfair labor practice complaining that the agreement was rescinded by the Union's unlawful acts. Indeed, if the Applicant had prevailed, the complaint would have been dismissed. No order would have issued requiring the Applicant to comply with the very same agreement which, by the settlement, has been resurrected and, certainly, no order would have issued requiring the Applicant to comply with the following agreement, which is not in esse. It is true that the Applicant may have finally entered into an agreement protecting what it wanted in the first place, but not in this adjudicative proceeding. This is not to say, either, that the Respondent lost and the Government won. In the present posture, neither won nor lost, but clearly a prime purpose of the Act, the promotion of collective bargaining, was well served.

For the foregoing reasons, I conclude that the Applicant is not a prevailing party within the meaning of the EAJA. See generally Capitol Boiler Works, JD–179–83.[6]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER

1. The application of Carthage Heating and Sheet Metal Co. for attorneys' fees and expenses under the Equal Access to Justice Act is dismissed.

2. The Applicant's motion for a protective order prohibiting public disclosure of its financial statement is granted.

[6] Because I find that the Applicant was not the prevailing party herein, there is no need to dispose of the other ground of the General Counsel's motion to dismiss.

[7] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISIONS AND ORDER

CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 25 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Herman Brothers, Inc., Treichlers, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

For the reasons stated in our recent decision in Connecticut Light & Power, 271 NLRB No. 124 (July 31, 1984), we adopt the judge's finding that Local 289 did not tacitly agree to reopen the contract, thereby incurring a bargaining obligation, simply by agreeing to discuss the Respondent's proposed midterm wage modifications and offering its own counterproposals.

Chairman Dotson and Member Hunter, however, do not adopt the judge's dicta that, even if Local 289 had agreed to reopen the contract midterm, the Respondent would not have been free to unilaterally institute its last final wage offer upon an impasse in negotiations. As they have previously stated, in their view during negotiations pursuant to a midterm reopener agreement "an the employer may, absent any indication in the contract to the contrary, unilaterally modify wages and benefits following a genuine impasse in negotiations." See Kelly-Goodwin Hardwood Co., 269 NLRB 33 at 38 (1984).

DECISION

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Administrative Law Judge. On March 16, 1983, Respondent Herman Brothers, Inc. entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with Charging Party Local 289, Bakery and Confectionery Workers International Union of America, AFL–CIO (Union),[1] for a term commencing July 1, 1982, through June 30, 1985. Among other things, the agreement provides that drivers shall be paid a mileage rate of $.2788 per mile and $9.24 per hour, effective July 1, 1983; $.2938 per mile and $10.04 per hour, effective July 1, 1983; and $.3088 per mile and $10.79 per hour, effective July 1, 1984. It also provides that employees who are hired after July 1, 1982, will be paid a percentage of the hourly or mileage rate which is in effect at the time of hire which shall progress in 12 months increments, as follows: for the first 12 months, 70 percent of the applicable rate; for the second 12 months, 80 percent of the applicable rate; for the third 12 months, 90 percent of the applicable rate; and thereafter, 100 percent of the applicable rate. The agreement contains no reopener provision.

Respondent, faced with the renegotiation of its agreement for the transportation of flour for its principal customer, ConAgra, which was to expire in September 1983,[2] attempted to renegotiate midterm the wage structure to which it had previously agreed. On June 19, William H. Williams, Respondent's director of labor relations, met with the drivers and mechanics of Respondent's Martins Creek, Ironton, and Triechlers operations and explained that the wage rates paid by organized trucking companies in similar businesses in the area were less than that which Respondent then paid and that the substantial increase in wages due on July 1 would place Respondent in a worse competitive position to bid for ConAgra's business. Williams discussed the matter with the union president and business agent, Leroy Linsenbigler, on June 25 and explained Respondent's plight. The union membership met on June 26 and voted to reject the request to reduce wages, and Respondent was so advised. Williams and Linsenbigler again spoke on June 30 and arranged to meet later.

A meeting followed on July 17 during which Williams thoroughly reviewed Respondent's cost factors and explained that Respondent was looking for a wage freeze until September, at which time there would be a reduction of wages based on the results of Respondent's negotiations with ConAgra. The wage freeze had already been imposed, effective on July 1. Williams requested a vote, but Linsenbigler stated that not all union members were present and, in order to change the contract, the members were entitled to be given notice of what they would be voting on. Another meeting was held on July 20, at which Williams stated that 42 cents of each dollar received represented Respondent's total labor costs, of which 26 cents were pure wages. Williams insisted on a freeze; and the Union countered with a proposal to base wages on the amount of 26 cents of each dollar received, but not less than $9.24 per hour, and to increase the percentage paid to new employees to 80 percent for the first 6 months and 90 percent for the next 6 months. Respondent called its home office and returned to state that it would not agree to the Union's proposal to guarantee wages of at least $9.24 per hour.

[1] I find, as Respondent admits, that it is a Nebraska corporation engaged in the bulk hauling of products from its terminals located throughout the United States, incluidng its terminals at Martins Creek, Ironton, and Treichlers, Pennsylvania, and that, during the year preceding the issuance of the complaint herein, it received in excess of $50,000 from the performance of its interstate services. I conclude that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., and also conclude, as Respondent admits, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[2] All dates hereinafter set forth refer to the year 1983, unless otherwise stated.

The wage freeze continued until November 13, when Respondent called a meeting with Linsenbigler and various drivers and explained that ConAgra had accepted Respondent's offer. However, Respondent had to reduce its bid in order to retain the business; and, because of that, the employees would have to take a wage reduction to $7.81 per hour. Otherwise, Respondent would have to close its terminal. After some discussion, Respondent offered to reduce wages to $8.53 per hour. On November 20, the union membership rejected Respondent's proposed wage reduction; but Respondent nonetheless on November 21, 1983, reduced wages to $8.53 per hour and mileage rates to 23 cents per mile.[3] However, simultaneously, Respondent increased the percentage rate for new employees to 80 percent of the reduced hourly rate for the first year of employment and 90 percent of the reduced hourly rate for the second year of employment. The Union's unfair labor practice charge soon followed.[4]

In defense of its changes to the agreement, Respondent contends that it and the Union agreed to the wage freeze. However, I discredit Williams' testimony that Linsenbigler had agreed on June 25 and, again, on June 30, to forgo the scheduled July 1 wage increase.[5] In his letter to Linsenbigler, dated July 1, Williams made no mention of such an agreement. Instead, he requested Linsenbigler to consider Respondent's argument that "a wage increase, at this time, does not make good sense" and requested another meeting for July 17. There was no reason for Williams to contend that a wage increase did not make sense if he had already received the Union's consent to waive the increase. Williams testified that, on July 20, he stated to Linsenbigler that Respondent could not implement the wage increase because it could not pass the cost on to ConAgra. There was no reason he would have made that argument if he had previously agreed with the Union to the wage freeze. In Williams' notes for the November 13 meeting, he acknowledged that, subsequent to the meetings of June and July, the employees voted to strike over Respondent's failure to implement the increase due on July 1. Williams assuredly knew that union ratification was necessary to approve any change to the agreement and that the members not only did not ratify Respondent's proposal but also rejected it.

The most that I can conclude from this record is that Linsenbigler held out some hope that the employees might be receptive to forgoing the July 1 increase. Williams testified only that Linsenbigler said that he had talked to some of the drivers who were willing to accept a wage freeze. That is a far cry from a commitment by the Union, but is, at best, an indication that its members might agree to a freeze. Even if I were to credit Williams, and I do not, I find that the Union agreed to a freeze, Williams countered with a proposal that the freeze would be contingent on Respondent's completion of its negotiations with ConAgra and further reduction of wages. An acceptance of the Union's counteroffer must be clear and unambiguous. It cannot vary, add to, or qualify the terms of the offer; if it does, it constitutes a rejection of the offer. 1 Williston, Contracts § 72–73 (3d ed. 1957 & Supp. 1983). Respondent's brief contends that Respondent agreed to the freeze as an interim solution, but the Union did not offer it with that condition (if it indeed offered it). In any event, Williams agreed to the freeze while simultaneously looking towards a wage reduction, a distinct variance of the Union's proposal, and no contract was formed.

What Respondent is attempting to do is bifurcate the series of proposals so that there is an acceptance to a counterproposal while the original proposal is still outstanding and while Respondent rejected the remainder of the Union's offer. I know of no legal authority which sustains Respondent's argument. Reduced, perhaps, to be absurd, Respondent's argument on another day, in a different economic climate, would permit a labor organization to continue to hold out substantial wage increases, while agreeing piecemeal to lesser wage increases offered by an employer.

I conclude that the Union never agreed to the freeze. The Union's actions were consistent with this conclusion. The Union filed a grievance on August 16 protesting that Respondent violated its agreement by failing to pay the wage increase. Rather than pleading what at hearing was alleged to be an agreement, Respondent answered the grievance merely by stating: "Do [sic] to particular facts presented grievance is denied."[6] It is probable that, had there been an agreement to freeze wages, Respondent would have stated precisely that. Furthermore, additional actions of the Union sustain the conclusion that it never agreed to anything. For example, as noted above, the Union voted to reject Respondent's first proposal and to strike to protest the freeze. At the November 13 meeting, Linsenbigler made a counterproposal to Respondent's demand that wages be reduced by requesting that Respondent pay its employees "what [it] owed [them] up to date" and the Union would accept a freeze until the following July.

Respondent next contends the Union agreed to reopen the contract, but once again I find no support for its arguments. In sum, Respondent had a problem of retaining its contract with ConAgra and approached its employees and Linsenbigler with its problems and requests for wage

[3] The record, although not precise, indicates that the reduction affected both drivers and mechanics engaged in the hauling of flour.

[4] The relevant docket entries in this proceeding are as follows: The Union filed its unfair labor practice charge on December 5, 1983; complaint issued on January 13, 1984; and the hearing was held on May 1, 1984.

[5] Linsenbigler did not recall the contents of the June 25 conversation and could recall only that, on June 30, he agreed to meet with Williams. Despite his lack of recollection, the remainder of his testimony, which I credit, indicates that he made no agreement to freeze wages.

[6] Respondent agreed during the hearing that it does not desire to defer to arbitration pursuant to Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971).

concessions. The Union was receptive insofar as listening to Respondent's pleas, but the Union never said, in substance. "We will reopen the agreement. If we do not reach agreement on the reopener, you, Respondent, can do anything you like."[7] There is nothing in this record other than talking, listening and the possible hint of an accommodation, except for evidence that Linsenbigler on one occasion used the word "renegotiate." There is certainly nothing to support Respondent's thesis that, once having agreed to listen to Respondent or even to "renegotiate," the agreement became a nullity and that Respondent was free to comply with it or violate it, at its pleasure. To find that, once the Union agrees to listen to and to talk about midterm modifications, it waives all its rights under a written collective-bargaining agreement, would forever deter any labor organization from talking about any changes, no matter what the circumstances, and would destroy even the possibility of discussing an employer's financial difficulties.

Surely, the Act is intended to encourage bargaining, and not to impede it, as would follow from the adoption of Respondent's arguments. Indeed, Section 8(d) "shall not be construed as requiring either party to discuss or agree to any modification of the terms and conditions in a contract for a fixed period, if such modification is to become effective before such terms and conditions can be reopened under the provisions of the contract." The General Counsel cogently argues that "discuss or agree" permitted the Union to discuss, but imposed no obligation on the Union to agree. And, if there is no obligation to agree, Respondent may not impose its own proposals as if the Union had agreed, thus nullifying the Union's statutory privilege to agree.

Section 8(d) of the Act also provides that no party to a contract shall modify a contract unless the party desiring such modification (1) serves a written notice on the other party of the proposed modification, (2) offers to meet with the other party, (3) notifies the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Services and any state agency established to mediate and conciliate disputes within 30 days after such notice, and (4) continues in force all the terms of the existing agreement for a certain period. There is no question that Respondent did not serve the notices required by Section 8(d)(1) and (3) or modify the agreement without the consent of the Union. Respondent was required to serve such notices, because the Union sought to modify and did modify the existing agreement. In addition, Respondent contends that its inaction was not alleged in the complaint and that it would violate due process to find a violation in this respect. However, the complaint clearly encompassed Respondent's failure to comply with Section 8(d) by its unilateral change and Respondent was not misled into failing to litigate this issue. Rather, it stipulated to facts at the beginning of the hearing which were relevant only to the 8(d) notice issue. In addition, although Respondent alleges a failure of due process, it neglects to advise what it omitted from the record because of its alleged lack of understanding of the complaint.

Finally, I turn to the second change the reduction of wages. I have already rejected Respondent's contention that there was any commitment to reopen the agreement. But, even if there was, no mention was made about what was to happen if the parties failed to reach agreement. Respondent puts the burden on the Union to fix the terms of the reopener agreement, despite the fact that it was Respondent who desired to change the agreement. Respondent's argument, in essence, is that because there was no agreement either to arbitrate or to continue in effect the terms of the existing agreement, the parties were freed from all structures of the agreement and could take such economic action as they deemed desirable. I find this contention unreal and groundless. I find no basis in anything said by anyone that at the point the Union agreed to discuss the financial problems of Respondent, the collective-bargaining agreement became a nullity, to be disposed of at the whim of Respondent. Nor do I find that the Act, as a matter of law, requires such a peculiar result. The law is so clear as to be without doubt; and various of Respondent's contentions raised at the hearing and in its brief have been fully answered by Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Giannasi in La Porte Transport Co., JD–152–84, as follows:

> It is undisputed that Respondent implemented changes in an existing collective-bargaining agreement without the Union's consent. Such conduct is violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act because Section 8(d), which defines the duty to bargain, prohibits such changes. In pertinent part, Section 8(d) provides that "no party to [an existing collective bargaining agreement] shall terminate or modify such contract" unless certain notice provisions and other conditions are met. Section 8(d) continues, "and the duties so imposed shall not be construed as requiring either party to discuss or agree to any modification of the terms and conditions contained in a contract for a fixed period, if such modification is to become effective before such terms and conditions can be reopened under the provisions of the contract" [emphasis added]. In this case, the Union did not agree to Respondent's proposed modifications. In these circumstances, the Board and the Courts have clearly and consistently found an employer's mid-term modification of a fixed term contract to be unlawful. See Oak Cliff-Golman Baking Company, 207 NLRB 1063, 1064 (1973), enfd. 505 F.2d 1302 (C.A. 5, 1974), cert. denied 423 U.S. 826 (1975); C & S Industries, Inc., 158 NLRB 454, 457–458 (1966); We-Care Trading Company, Ltd., 265 NLRB No. 56, slip op. at 7 (1982).[8] This is true even though continued compliance with the contract will cause the employer financial hardship. See, Ross Crane Rental Corp., 267 NLRB No. 50, slip op. at 6 (1983); Oak Cliff-Golman, supra, 207 NLRB at 1064.

[7] I discredit, in general, Williams' testimony and, in particular, Respondent's notice posted on November 21 in which Respondent claimed that the Union's negotiating committee agreed to reopen the agreement on June 19. The negotiating committee was not present at the June 19 meeting. I also discredit the self-serving statement in Respondent's November 15 letter to its employees that the Union's negotiating committee agreed in June to reopen the agreement. No testimony was adduced that the committee met in June.

Respondent alleges that it was justified in unilaterally implementing its proposals to alter the existing agreement, notwithstanding the Union's refusal to agree to the alterations, because (1) an impasse existed; . . . [This allegation is] patently without merit.

First, an impasse in negotiations is irrelevant in a situation where a party seeks unilaterally to change an existing agreement. Respondent had agreed to a contract in April of 1982 and less than a year later sought to change specific provisions of that agreement whose terms were to continue through March of 1985. Section 8(d) provides that this cannot be done without the Union's consent. As the Board stated in a case where, as here, an employer proposed mid-term contract modifications, the union indicated a willingness to discuss the matter and the employer subsequently declared an impasse and implemented its proposed modifications without the union's consent:

> The Union's consent was required if management's proposed modifications were to take effect. When the Union lawfully withheld its assent, a stalemate did obtain. The Trial Examiner correctly found, however, that although an employer may unilaterally institute changes when an impasse occurs during the negotiations for an initial bargaining agreement or following the expiration date of an expiring contract, the employer may not do so where, as here, the contract has not yet terminated. Accordingly, the Trial Examiner correctly ruled that Respondent was not free in the manner sought to modify the unexpired agreement over the Union's objections, but was obligated to maintain in effect all preexisting contractual commitments for the contract term. We affirm, therefore, the Trial Examiner's finding that by unilaterally publishing and implementing terms and conditions of employment inconsistent with the extant collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. [Footnote omitted.]

The Standard Oil Company, 174 NLRB 177, 178 (1969).

Section 8(d) specifically prohibits such unilateral changes. Indeed, in the absence of a contractual reopener clause, a party may refuse even to discuss proposed changes. See C & S Industries, supra, 158 NLRB at 457. However, where mid-term bargaining does take place pursuant to such a clause, compliance with the Section 8(d) notice requirement simply permits a party to thereafter resort to a strike or lockout. See NLRB v. Lion Oil Company, 352 U.S. 282, 291–292 (1957). Compliance with the notice provisions of Section 8(d) does not confer upon a party the right to unilaterally change an existing agreement particularly since Section 8(d) specifically prohibits such conduct.

[6] Additionally, in order for a violation to occur, the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement which are unilaterally modified must constitute mandatory subjects of bargaining. See Allied Chemical Workers v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 187 (1971). There is no dispute that the provisions of the contract which are the subject of the instant case do constitute mandatory subjects.

Accordingly, I conclude that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and 8(d) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act, including the posting of the attached notice. In particular, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to rescind its unilateral changes retroactive to July 1, 1983, and to make whole the employees covered by the collective-bargaining agreement for the loss of wages that they sustained as a result of Respondent's unlawful conduct of both not increasing wages on July 1, 1983, as its agreement requires, and reducing wages on November 21, 1983. Such payments shall be made with interest thereon as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record,[8] I issue the following recommended[9]

ORDER

The Respondent, Herman Brothers, Inc., Treichlers, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with Local 289, Bakery and Confectionery Workers International Union of America, AFL–CIO by unilaterally modifying and refusing to comply with the provisions of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, dated May 16, 1983, concerning hourly wages and mileage rates.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Bargain with the Union by restoring, placing in effect, and complying with all the terms and conditions of employment provided for in its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, retroactive to July 1, 1983.

(b) Make whole the employees in the unit covered by the collective-bargaining agreement for any loss of wages which the employees sustained as a result of Respondent's unlawful conduct, in the manner set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

[9] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its Martins Creek, Ironton, and Treichlers, Pennsylvania facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[10] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with Local 289, Bakery and Confectionery Workers International Union of America, AFL–CIO by unilaterally modifying and refusing to comply with the provisions of our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, dated May 16, 1983, concerning hourly wages and mileage rates.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL bargain with the Union by restoring, placing in effect, and complying with all the terms and conditions of employment provided for in our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, retroactive to July 1, 1983.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 19 August 1982 Administrative Law Judge Wallace H. Nations issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions, supporting briefs, and answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The Respondent is engaged in the publication and sale of law books, and it markets its products through approximately 100 commissioned sales representatives. The Respondent's supervisory hierarchy consists of President Gosnell, Vice President of Marketing Anderson, National Sales Manager Bissett, Vice President of Personnel Bennett, Personnel Manager Roth, and approximately 11 regional managers. The regional managers are the immediate supervisors of the sales representatives.

The sales representatives became dissatisfied with the Respondent's "subscription growth" plan of compensation, and in December 1979 sales representative Stanley Dash initiated a union organizing drive. The Respondent became aware of the organizing activity on 9 January 1980,[2] and subsequently launched a campaign in opposition to the Union. On 5 May the sales representatives voted against union representation and, beginning in late May, Dash took a leave of absence because he had been under stress. The Respondent threatened to discharge Dash on 30 May, and in June it delayed his receipt of disability benefits and refused to provide him with a copy of its insurance policy. Dash returned to work on 22 September after the Respondent required him to undergo a psychiatric examination. On 5 November the Respondent discharged Dash, and it subsequently challenged his application for unemployment compensation benefits. The Respondent also discharged Regional Manager Warner on 22 May, sales representative Kensler on 25 August, Regional Manager Carduner on 11 October, and sales representative Redd on 23 October.

On 14 January the Union filed unfair labor practice charges in Case 30-CA-5603, and on 28 March the General Counsel issued a complaint. The complaint as later amended alleged that during the organizing campaign and prior to 5 May the Respondent engaged in violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3). The parties subsequently reached a settlement agreement which was signed by the Respondent on 15 September, signed by the Union on 18 September, and approved by the Regional Director on 1 October.

On 12 November Dash filed a charge in Case 30-CA-6152. The Regional Director set aside the settlement agreement on 7 January 1981 and issued a consolidated complaint on 15 January 1981. The complaint alleged, inter alia, that on 15 August the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by acting to delay Dash's return to work until 22 September. It further alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by transferring Dash to a different region and manager on 22 September and by discharging him on 5 November. The complaint also alleged that the Respondent unlawfully threatened to discharge Dash on 30 May.

The complaint, as later consolidated and amended, also alleged that the discharges of Warner, Kensler, Carduner, and Redd were unlawful. It further alleged that the Respondent violated the Act by appealing Dash's unemployment compensation award, by refusing to provide Dash's attorney with a copy of its disability insurance policy, and by delaying the payment of Dash's disability benefits. The complaint was also amended to allege additional unlawful conduct prior to the 5 May election.

The judge found that the Respondent engaged in violations of Section 8(a)(1) prior to the 5 May election. He also found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by requiring Dash to undergo a psychiatric examination before his return to work on 22 September. The judge further found that, after the settlement agreement, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by discharging Dash and by appealing his award of unemployment compensation. The judge concluded, and we agree, that the remaining postsettlement allegations should be dismissed.[3] Consequently, the only remaining postsettlement allegations involve Dash's discharge and the Respondent's appeal of his unemployment compensation award. Because we find no merit to those allegations, we shall dismiss the complaint and reinstate the settlement agreement.[4]

1. The complaint alleges that on 15 August the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by delaying Dash's return to work until 22 September. In this connection the judge found that the Respondent discriminatorily required Dash to undergo a psychiatric examination before returning to work from his leave of absence. We note that this conduct occurred prior to the settlement agreement, and we therefore consider it only for the purpose of shedding light on the Respondent's motive for its postsettlement conduct. We conclude, for the reasons below, that the Respondent was motivated by legitimate concerns in requiring the examination.

Dash took a leave of absence from late May until 22 September after his psychologist informed him that he was suffering from a "gross stress reaction." On 9 June Roth sent Dash a disability form and a letter stating that the Respondent was immediately placing him on disability status. Dash's attorney sent the Respondent a letter from Dash's psychologist, which stated that the purpose of the leave of absence was to enable Dash to obtain "relief" from the job-related factors causing him stress. Roth testified that, because the letter did not state that Dash was unable to work, he began to doubt whether Dash was eligible for disability benefits. On 30 June Dash's attorney returned the completed disability claim form, which stated that Dash was totally disabled from a "gross stress reaction." However, in an accompanying letter Dash's attorney stated:

> You have requested that Mr. Dash complete and submit this form. His cooperation in doing this should not be construed as any admission on his part that he is "ill" or "disabled" within the meaning of these programs or for any other purposes. While Mr. Dash may indeed be entitled to benefits under these programs he does not yet have sufficient information to determine whether it is in his interest to submit a claim or accept benefits under them.

The attorney's letter also noted that Dash had not signed that portion of the form which authorizes a general release of medical information to the Respondent's insurance carrier. The letter indicated that, because of its "personal and sensitive" nature, such information would be released only pursuant to "specific" and "reasonable" requests by the insurance carrier.

On 15 July Roth stated that the Respondent could not treat Dash as being on sick or disability leave because he would not release information or admit that he was ill or disabled. Roth stated that Dash was instead being placed on inactive status pending clarification of his medical condition, and he indicated that the Respondent was reserving the right to have Dash examined by a physician of its choosing before permitting him to return to work. On 21 July Dash's attorney replied that the release of medical information would be authorized if such information were "reasonably necessary to evaluate" Dash's claim. The attorney requested a copy of the Respondent's insurance policy and indicated that Dash "is unable to determine whether he is ill or disabled within the meaning of the company insurance policy since he does not have a copy of the policy." On 30 July Roth responded that, because of the uncertainty created by the attorney's 30 June letter, the Respondent would continue to keep Dash on inactive status pending clarification of his medical condition. Roth also enclosed a copy of the Respondent's personnel policy concerning illness and injury.

On 12 August the attorney informed Roth that Dash had received his psychologist's approval to return to work, but on 15 August Roth indicated that before resuming work Dash would have to undergo an examination by the Respondent's physician. Roth stated that this procedure was necessary to ensure that Dash was "fully capable" of return-

[3] We agree with the judge that the Respondent lawfully discharged Hubert Redd on 23 October and Robert Carduner on 11 October. In its exceptions the General Counsel notes that the judge failed to find whether the Respondent acted unlawfully by discharging Carduner instead of merely demoting him to a sales representative position. For the reasons cited by the judge to find Carduner's discharge lawful, we find that the Respondent did not violate the Act by refusing to demote Carduner.

We also agree with the judge that the Respondent did not violate the Act by assigning Dash to a different regional manager on 22 September, assuming, arguendo, that this conduct can be characterized as postsettlement conduct.

[4] A settlement agreement will be set aside if its provisions are breached or if postsettlement unfair labor practices are committed. Cambridge Contracting, 259 NLRB 1374, 1381 (1982); Ann's-Schneider Bakery, 259 NLRB 1151, 1152 (1982). Therefore, we must initially determine whether the Respondent engaged in any postsettlement misconduct which violated the settlement agreement. However, the Board has observed that presettlement conduct may be considered as background evidence in determining the motive or object underlying a respondent's postsettlement conduct. Vore Cinema Corp., 254 NLRB 1288, 1291–92 (1981); Laborers Local 185 (Joseph's Landscaping), 154 NLRB 1384 (1965). We have given appropriate consideration to the judge's findings concerning the Respondent's presettlement conduct but, in our view, these findings do not warrant the conclusion that the Respondent's postsettlement conduct was unlawfully motivated. Although the Respondent's presettlement conduct may constitute background evidence in support of the General Counsel's prima facie case, we conclude, for the reasons set forth, infra, that the Respondent would have discharged Dash and appealed his unemployment compensation award, even in the absence of his union activity. In this connection we also emphasize our conclusion, discussed infra, that prior to the settlement the Respondent was motivated by legitimate concerns in requiring Dash to undergo a psychistric examination before returning to work from his leave of absence.

ing to his duties, and he requested that Dash's medical records be forwarded to the Respondent's physician. On 2 September Dash's attorney reiterated that the medical records were "obviously of a highly personal and confidential nature," and there is no evidence that those records were ever released. On 9 September Dash was examined by a psychiatrist selected by the Respondent, and he resumed working as a sales representative on 22 September.

We conclude that the Respondent had legitimate reasons for requiring that Dash undergo a separate medical examination prior to his return to work. We note particularly that Dash, through his attorney, was seeking disability benefits while refusing to concede that he was ill or disabled and while resisting the release of medical information. We also note that the initial letter from Dash's psychologist in June did not state whether Dash was able to work, and that Dash's 12 August offer to return to work was unaccompanied by any medical documents. We agree with the Respondent that Dash's communications raised legitimate questions concerning the nature and extent of his medical problems and his ability to resume his duties.

Further, the evidence indicates that in requiring the examination the Respondent was motivated solely by these legitimate concerns and not by Dash's union activity. The Respondent consistently communicated its doubts about Dash's condition by informing the attorney that his letters had created "uncertainty" and that Dash would remain on inactive status pending clarification of his condition. The Respondent reserved the right to require an examination by a physician of its choosing a full month before Dash indicated his availability to resume work. This suggests that the Respondent decided on this requirement in response to unusual circumstances, and that it did not simply present Dash with a hastily conceived obstacle to delay his return to work.

Contrary to the judge, we decline to draw an inference of proscribed motive from the fact that Dash was the first employee required to undergo a separate medical examination. Although other disabled employees were permitted to return to work without such an examination, we are not persuaded that their circumstances were similar to Dash's. Evidence is lacking that the medical condition of the other employees was ever in doubt, or that those employees hesitated to release medical information concerning their condition. We also find, contrary to the judge, that the favorable report by the Respondent's psychiatrist does not undermine the Respondent's contention that it was concerned about Dash's ability to perform his job. In view of the foregoing, we find that the Respondent was motivated solely by legitimate concerns in requiring the examination.

2. The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by discharging Dash on 5 November. We find merit in the Respondent's exceptions and for the reasons below we find that Dash's discharge was lawful.

The record discloses that on 4 November Dash telephoned the Respondent's customer service department and spoke with Patrina Fulton, a collection correspondent. It is undisputed that Dash and Fulton became involved in an argument concerning a problem with a customer's account, and it is also undisputed that Fulton immediately reported the incident to Michael Santangelo, the supervisor of the Respondent's customer service department. Santangelo then telephoned Dash to ascertain his version of the incident, but there is conflicting testimony about the conversation that ensued. The judge did not resolve the conflict between the testimony of Dash and Santangelo, but he concluded that Dash's discharge was unlawful even assuming the accuracy of Santangelo's version. Contrary to the judge, we conclude that the Respondent did not violate the Act even if the accuracy of Dash's version of the conversation is assumed.[5]

According to Dash, Santangelo began the conversation by stating in an "insulting" tone of voice that he had just spoken with Fulton and that he now wanted to hear Dash's side of the story. Dash responded, "Mike, what you want and what you get are two different things." He told Santangelo that he was late for work and that "right now" he did not want to talk about the incident. Santangelo then said, "[Y]ou don't want to talk to me right now?" When Dash said, "That's right," Santangelo responded, "Who do you think you are? You will talk to me or I will rip up, return or lose every order of yours that comes through this department for clearance." Dash testified that at that point he "blew [his] cork" because his livelihood was being threatened, and he conceded that he "could very well have" used profanity. Dash and Santangelo began "shouting" at each other, and after 2 minutes they simultaneously hung up their phones.[6]

[5] The Respondent contends that Dash was discharged because of his conduct during the conversation with Santangelo. It does not contend that Dash's conduct with Fulton was sufficient to warrant discharge.

[6] According to Santangelo, Dash responded to his first question by saying, "F—k you . . . I don't have to tell you a f—king thing." Santangelo told Dash to calm down and discuss the problem, but Dash stated that he did not have to do what Santangelo said. Dash's voice became extremely loud, and Santangelo stated that if Dash did not calm down he would "personally watch over" all of Dash's orders and reject those which did not have every "i" dotted and "t" crossed. When Dash continued to raise his voice and told Santangelo not to threaten him, Santangelo hung up.

Uncontradicted testimony establishes that Santangelo immediately related the conversation to National Sales Manager Bissett and Personnel Manager Roth, and then repeated it in the presence of Vice President of Marketing Anderson, Vice President of Personnel Bennett, Vice President of Finance Fogel, his own supervisor, Smith, and Bissett.[7] On the same day Santangelo and Fulton again discussed the events with Bennett and the Respondent's attorney. Dash testified that on 5 November he received a phone call from Bissett, who told him that he was immediately discharged because the Respondent was tired of his "rude, abusive treatment" of employees.[8] Bissett declined to listen when Dash offered to explain his conduct.

Even if we assume, arguendo, that Dash's protected activity was a motivating factor in the Respondent's decision to discharge him, we find that the Respondent met its burden of establishing that Dash would have been discharged even in the absence of his protected activity. In reaching this conclusion, we place particular reliance on the extensive background evidence establishing that the Respondent had long considered Dash to be an employee with serious behavioral problems.

The record establishes that as early as 17 October 1977, the Respondent's national sales manager observed in a memo that Dash harbored a "negative attitude" and often exhibited an "argumentative" and "loud" voice. The memo indicated that Dash's behavior was a "longstanding" problem which "may eventually lead to termination." Subsequently, the Respondent began to receive complaints from customers about Dash's conduct. In June 1978 Marcia Koslov, the Wisconsin state law librarian, informed the Respondent that Dash's behavior in a sales meeting had been "rude" and "arrogant." In a memo to Regional Manager Murrell, the Respondent's national sales manager described the Koslov complaint as "one more" problem among the "ongoing" problems that the Respondent was encountering with Dash. The Respondent directed Dash to write a letter of apology to Koslov.

On 26 April 1979 the Respondent received another customer complaint from Gary Monson, a Wisconsin attorney, who stated that Dash's conduct had been "extremely arrogant, offensive, unprofessional, and extremely obnoxious." The letter also indicated that Dash's "attitude and demeanor" had been "disgusting." Vice President of Marketing Anderson apologized in writing to Monson, and Dash was removed from the account. In connection with this incident, Anderson wrote a memo to Gosnell in which he noted that Dash suffers from "moments of irrationality."[9]

The judge found, and we agree, that on 9 January Murrell properly threatened to put Dash on probation after he argued with some of the Respondent's customer service correspondents in the fall of 1979.[10] The judge also found that in late May Dash began his leave of absence without first informing his regional manager,[11] and that on 30 May the Respondent sent him a telegram threatening him with discharge if he did not contact the office within 4 days. We agree with the judge that the 30 May threat was not improper.

When viewed against this background, Dash's conduct on 4 November was simply an egregious manifestation of a longstanding behavioral problem.[12] Santangelo was conducting a legitimate investigation of the Fulton incident, but Dash refused to cooperate at the outset when he belligerently stated, "[W]hat you want and what you get are two different things." Dash conceded that he became extremely angry, and it is clear that he never gave substantive answers to Santangelo's questions.

The record therefore establishes that over several years the Respondent was repeatedly confronted with the issue of Dash's behavior, and we infer from its previous reactions that the Respondent would have discharged him on 5 November even in the absence of his union activity. Its previous reactions first demonstrate that it viewed the problem as serious long before the onset of union activity. The memo of 17 October 1977 discloses that 2 years before Dash initiated the organizing drive,

[7] As noted above, we are considering the issue of Dash's discharge in a light most favorable to Dash. Consequently, we are assuming, arguendo, that Dash's version of the facts represents what actually transpired, that those facts were related to the Respondent's officials by Santangelo, and that it was on those facts that the Respondent based its decision.

[8] According to his own testimony, Dash also told Bissett that his discharge did not come as a surprise in view of his union activity. Dash's testimony does not indicate whether Bissett responded to this statement.

[9] The documents in connection with the Koslov and Monson incidents, as well as the 17 October 1977 memo, are relevant in determining the Respondent's perception of Dash's behavioral problems and the motive underlying its discharge decision. We need not make factual findings with respect to what actually transpired during Dash's encounters with Koslov and Monson, and we do not rely on the documents for that purpose.

[10] The judge also found that Murrell discussed the Koslov and Monson incidents with Dash when he threatened him with probation.

[11] Dash contends that he sent a telegram to the Respondent's national sales manager, but the judge found that the Respondent never received it.

[12] In fact, our dissenting colleague tacitly concedes the existence of this problem by, inter alia, agreeing that the Respondent's requiring Dash to be examined by a psychiatrist prior to his return to work was "motivated by legitimate concerns." In this regard, contrary to our dissenting colleague, we find it irrelevant that the psychiatrist hired by the Respondent cleared Dash of "any problems," since the Respondent discharged Dash for his unacceptable behavior on the job, not for a medical disorder. Thus, as we noted earlier, the favorable medical report does not undermine the Respondent's contention concerning Dash's ability to perform his job.

one of the Respondent's highest officials recognized that his "longstanding" behavioral problem "may eventually lead to termination."

The Respondent's reactions also demonstrate that it took progressively stronger measures over time to control Dash's conduct. The Respondent first compelled him to write the letter of apology noted above, then threatened him with probation on 9 January, and finally threatened him with discharge on 30 May before actually terminating his employment on 5 November. This progressive response indicates that the discharge decision was the logical culmination of the Respondent's previous reactions over several years. What emerges from the record as a whole, therefore, is that the Respondent gave Dash every opportunity to rectify his behavior, but that it finally discharged him when confronted with his insubordinate obstruction of Santangelo's legitimate investigation. In view of all the above evidence, we conclude that Dash's discharge did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1).[13]

3. The judge found that the Respondent's appeal of Dash's award of unemployment compensation benefits was discriminatorily motivated. We agree with the Respondent that its conduct was not unlawful.

Dash applied for unemployment compensation benefits following his discharge. The Respondent contested the application, but the Wisconsin Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations (DILHR) determined that Dash qualified for benefits. The Respondent filed an appeal of the award and a "telephone hearing" was held before an examiner of the Appeal Tribunal of the DILHR. The examiner issued a decision which upheld the award of benefits, and the Respondent petitioned for review to the Wisconsin Labor and Industry Review Commission (Review Commission). The Review Commission dismissed the Respondent's petition, finding that it was untimely filed. The Respondent filed a complaint in the circuit court of Dane County, Wisconsin, naming the State of Wisconsin, the DILHR, the Review Commission, and Dash as defendants. The complaint requested that the court set aside the decision of the Review Commission, reverse the examiner's decision, and remand the proceeding to the Appeal Tribunal of the DILHR to reopen the hearing de novo. At the time of the hearing in the instant proceeding, the Respondent's action in the circuit court was still pending.

In Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. NLRB, 103 S.Ct. 2161 (1983), the Supreme Court set forth the test which the Board must apply in determining whether a state-court lawsuit may be enjoined as an unfair labor practice. The Court stated (103 S.Ct. at 2173) that > . . . the Board may not halt the prosecution of a state-court lawsuit, regardless of the plaintiff's motive, unless the suit lacks a reasonable basis in fact or law. Retaliatory motive and lack of reasonable basis are both essential prerequisites to the issuance of a cease-and-desist order against a state suit.

A suit has a reasonable basis in fact if it raises "a genuine issue of material fact that turns on the credibility of witnesses or on the proper inferences to be drawn from undisputed facts."[14] A suit has a reasonable basis in law "if there is any realistic chance that the plaintiff's legal theory might be adopted."[15] Applying this test to the instant case, we find that the Respondent had a reasonable basis in fact and law to support its appeal of Dash's award of unemployment compensation.

We find at the outset that the Respondent had a reasonable basis for pursuing its appeal of the DILHR's initial determination. The examiner's decision discloses that the issue at the hearing was whether Dash's conduct with Santangelo on 4 November[16] constituted "misconduct connected with [13] We are aware that the Respondent did not attempt to ascertain Dash's version of the 4 November incident before discharging him, but we conclude in the circumstances of this case that its failure to do so does not warrant a finding of unlawful motive. Although the Respondent's failure to consult Dash is among the factors to be considered, contrary to our dissenting colleague, we conclude that it is outweighed in this case by the extensive evidence discussed above that the Respondent could no longer retain Dash in the face of his persistent misconduct. We also find it noteworthy that the 4 November incident was given extensive consideration by several of the Respondent's highest officials. Santangelo discussed the incident with Bissett and Roth, and then discussed it again in the presence of Anderson, Bennett, Fogel, Smith, and Bissett. Santangelo and Fulton then engaged in further discussions with Bennett and the Respondent's attorney. We do not minimize the Respondent's failure to ascertain Dash's version, but in light of the above evidence we cannot say that the Respondent did not investigate the 4 November incident before deciding to discharge Dash.

In concluding that the Respondent's motive was unlawful, our dissenting colleague emphasizes Dash's previous performance as a sales representative. We do not dispute that Dash had been an excellent salesman, but we think it fair to conclude that the Respondent determined that his sales performance eventually came to be overshadowed by his longstanding behavioral problems.

Finally, in ascertaining the Respondent's motive, we also disagree with our dissenting colleague that Dash did not present any problems to the Respondent which were not common to the rest of the sales force. Although the record contains examples of sales representatives who were not disciplined after engaging in various types of abrasive conduct, there is no evidence that any other sales representative exhibited the consistent behavioral problem which the Respondent had long recognized in Dash. There is also no evidence that any sales representative had escaped discipline after obstructing a supervisor's legitimate investigation of an employee dispute. An inference of unlawful motive based on disparate treatment is therefore unwarranted.

[16] The decision also referred to alleged arguments with two unnamed customers in 1978 and 1979.

his employment" within the meaning of the applicable Wisconsin statutory provision.[17] In his decision the examiner noted that the Supreme Court of Wisconsin has interpreted this statutory language to include:

> Conduct evincing such willful or wanton disregard of an employer's interests as is found in deliberate violations or disregard of standards of behavior which the employer has a right to expect of his employee, or in carelessness or negligence of such degree or recurrence as to manifest equal culpability, wrongful intent or evil design, or to show an intentional and substantial disregard of the employer's interests or of the employee's duties and obligations to his employer.[18]

As noted above, there is a factual dispute as to the substance of the 4 November argument between Santangelo and Dash. According to Santangelo, the argument became quite heated, and Dash used profanity and refused to answer questions about the Fulton incident. Dash conceded that he "blew [his] cork" and "could have" used profanity, but asserted that he did not become angry until he was provoked by Santangelo's threat to destroy his orders.

In view of the dispute between Dash and Santangelo as to the substance of their argument, we find that the Respondent's appeal was based on a genuine issue of material fact.[19] The appeal also had a reasonable basis in law because under Santangelo's version Dash's conduct at least arguably fell within the category set forth in the Wisconsin statute as interpreted by the Wisconsin Supreme Court.[20] We cannot say that there was no "realistic chance" that the Respondent's legal theory could have been adopted.

Furthermore, we are not persuaded that the Respondent acted unlawfully by continuing its appeal after the examiner issued his decision. The Respondent contends that it was denied an opportunity to present witnesses and be represented by counsel at the "telephone hearing" as a result of ambiguous and misleading instructions from the DILHR. On 2 January 1981 the Respondent received instructions which indicated that the 13 January proceeding would be a "telephone hearing" in which the Respondent would participate by telephone from its office in Rochester, New York, while Dash appeared in person at the DILHR's office in Madison, Wisconsin. In pertinent part, the instructions further stated that:

> This case has been scheduled for a telephone hearing. Your testimony will be taken and recorded over the telephone. The average hearing length is one hour.
> . . . .
> Immediately telephone the Office Manager if you wish to:
> A. Have witnesses present at the hearing; (Requires personal appearance hearing),
> B. Be represented by an attorney or another person; (Requires personal appearance hearing)
> . . . .
> Personal appearance hearings will be scheduled only upon your request.

Although there is no evidence that either the Respondent or Dash requested that a "personal appearance hearing" be scheduled, Dash nonetheless appeared at the hearing on 13 January with his attorney. When apprised of this situation, Personnel Manager Roth stated over the telephone that he had interpreted the instructions to prohibit counsel at a "telephone hearing," and he requested an adjournment to obtain counsel for the Respondent. The examiner denied the request and subsequently asked Roth whether he intended to present any witnesses. Roth again stated that he had interpreted the instructions to prohibit witnesses at a "telephone hearing," and the examiner denied his request for an adjournment to permit the Respondent to call witnesses. Subsequently, in his decision upholding the award of benefits, the examiner relied on the Respondent's failure to present any witnesses and found that it had failed to meet its burden "to introduce competent, admissible evidence" concerning the circumstances of Dash's discharge.[21] The Respondent's subsequent petition to the Review Commission, as noted above, was dismissed solely on the ground that it was untimely filed.[22] In the complaint which it filed in the circuit court of Dane County, Wisconsin, the Respondent alleged a violation of due process and requested that the hearing be reopened to permit it to present witnesses and be represented by counsel.

We find that the Respondent had a reasonable basis in fact and law for continuing its appeal after [17] Under this provision, an employee who is discharged for "misconduct connected with his employment" is ineligible for benefits.

[18] The examiner quoted the decision of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in Boynton Cab Co. v. Neubeck & Ind. Comm., 237 Wisc. 249 (1941).

[19] Although we have found the discharge to be lawful even if Dash's version is deemed accurate, we cannot say that the conflicting versions would not be of significance to a Wisconsin state court attempting to apply the test set forth above.

[20] We need not consider whether Dash's conduct, according to his own version, arguably fell within the statutory category.

[21] The examiner stated that Roth "had no first-hand knowledge" of the incident between Dash and Santangelo.

[22] Although the Respondent's petition was dated 26 January, it was not received by the Review Commission until 30 January. The filing deadline was 28 January.

the examiner's decision. The instructions set forth above present a genuine issue of material fact, since they arguably prohibit legal representation and the presentation of witnesses at a telephone hearing. In view of this ambiguity in the instructions, we find that the Respondent reasonably could have contended, as it did in its complaint before the Wisconsin court, that it was prejudiced by the examiner's refusal to adjourn the hearing to permit the Respondent to obtain counsel, and by the examiner's reliance in his decision on the Respondent's failure to produce witnesses. We cannot say that there was no "realistic chance" that the court could have adopted the Respondent's legal theory that it was denied due process.

Because we find that the Respondent's appeal had a reasonable basis in fact and law, we are precluded from enjoining the appeal regardless of the Respondent's motive. In any event, we also find no evidence that the appeal was unlawfully motivated.[23] The judge inferred the existence of an unlawful motive from his finding that the appeal was marked by dilatory tactics, by lack of a serious effort to prosecute the action, and by strategies that differed from previous proceedings involving unemployment compensation benefits. In concluding that the Respondent engaged in dilatory tactics, the judge apparently relied on his finding that the Respondent "waited until the last day" to appeal the initial determination. The DILHR issued the award on 1 December and the Respondent requested an appeal by telegram on 15 December. The latter date does represent the filing deadline, but we find that the Respondent's timely filing of its request, 2 weeks after the issuance of the decision, hardly warrants the conclusion that it engaged in dilatory tactics.

In finding that the Respondent did not make a serious effort to prosecute the action, the judge found that the Respondent "chose" not to present witnesses or affidavits at the 13 January hearing. As discussed above, however, the hearing instructions arguably prohibit the presentation of witnesses at a telephone hearing. We are not of the view that the Respondent's confusion over the proper procedure is sufficient to support a finding that its effort was less than serious.

[23] In Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. NLRB, 103 S.Ct. 2161 (1983), the Supreme Court stated that if genuine material factual or legal issues exist, the Board must await the results of the state court adjudication. The Court further stated that "[i]f the state proceedings result in a judgment adverse to the plaintiff, the Board may then consider the matter further and, if it is found that the lawsuit was filed with retaliatory intent, the Board may find a violation and order appropriate relief." 103 S.Ct. at 2173. At the time of the hearing the state court had not rendered a final judgment. We consider the Respondent's motive at this point only to avoid further proceedings should the state court render a judgment adverse to the Respondent.

Contrary to the judge, we see no reason to draw an inference of unlawful motive from the fact that the Respondent made a personal appearance, rather than a telephonic appearance, at a prior unemployment compensation proceeding involving another employee in New York. The Respondent was simply acting within its rights under Wisconsin procedure by participating by telephone in the 13 January hearing. We can find no significance in the fact that the Respondent chose to pursue different strategies in different proceedings, particularly since the record discloses little evidence of the circumstances surrounding the prior New York proceeding. Indeed, if the limited evidence of that proceeding establishes anything, it establishes only that the Respondent's challenge to Dash's claim was not without precedent.

We therefore find no evidence that the Respondent's appeal of Dash's award of benefits was unlawfully motivated. In view of this finding and our conclusion above that Dash's discharge was lawful, we find that the Respondent did not violate the Act after the settlement agreement. Consequently, we shall reinstate the settlement agreement and dismiss the complaint. Cambridge Contracting, 259 NLRB 1374, 1381–83 (1982); Ann's-Schneider Bakery, 259 NLRB 1151, 1160 (1982).

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the settlement agreement in Case 30–CA–5603 be reinstated.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting in part and concurring in part.

I dissent from my colleagues' reversal of the judge's finding that union activist Stanley Dash was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Notwithstanding the factors cited by the majority, the fact remains that Dash was an excellent sales representative who had won sales prizes and been considered by the Respondent for a position as regional manager, and whose previous activities noted by my colleagues had always been condoned by the Respondent. Indeed, the Respondent was aware prior to the organizing campaign that aggressive behavior which sometimes became abusive or profane was not unusual among the sales representatives, and management tolerated such behavior as long as the representative was successfully making sales. That Dash's union activity was the sole motivating factor in the Respondent's decision to discharge him on 5 November 1980 is evidenced by the fact that the Respondent not only failed to seek out Dash's version of the precipitating incident with Santangelo, but refused to listen when Dash tried to explain his side of the story. The Respondent's determination to hear only Santangelo's version establishes that its interest was in finding a plausible pretext for the discharge, and not in ascertaining what actually occurred.[1]

Because I find Dash's discharge unlawful, I would not honor the parties' settlement, as my colleagues do. Rather, I would consider and essentially affirm the judge's finding that the Respondent committed numerous violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

I do, however, concur in my colleagues' finding that the Respondent did not act unlawfully when it earlier required Dash to undergo a psychiatric examination before returning to work following a prior leave of absence,[2] or when it appealed his award of unemployment compensation benefits. In contrast to its discharge of Dash, the record indicates that the Respondent was motivated by legitimate concerns with respect to these two actions, and I agree with my colleagues that these allegations of the complaint should be dismissed.

[1] The fact that any number of the Respondent's highest officials may have participated in the decision to discharge Dash does not detract from the undisputed fact that these officials did not ascertain Dash's version of the incident for which he was allegedly discharged prior to the decision to discharge him. Contrary to my colleagues, who find that the Respondent's failure to consult Dash about the incident is outweighed by the "extensive evidence . . . of his persistent misconduct," I find it more likely that Dash's union activities eventually overshadowed his excellent sales performance in the Respondent's view.

[2] My colleagues conclude that I tacitly concede the existence of a longstanding behavioral problem on Dash's part because I agree with them that the Respondent's requiring Dash to be examined by a psychiatrist prior to his return to work following an earlier leave of absence was motivated by legitimate concerns. To the contrary, I find the fact that the psychiatrist selected by the Respondent itself gave Dash permission to return to work establishes that whatever psychiatric problems the Respondent may have perceived Dash to have had in the past did not warrant the Respondent's later actions in firing him. Thus, the judge found: "The psychologist who interviewed Dash on the Company's behalf completely cleared him of any problems and issued a fairly impressive report about the state of Dash's condition." Notwithstanding this finding, however, I find that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the judge's conclusion that this examination was motivated by unlawful reasons. Dash refused to concede that he was ill or disabled and resisted the release of his medical information while at the same time seeking disability benefits from the Respondent. In these circumstances, the General Counsel failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the Respondent's requiring Dash to undergo an examination to determine his condition was discriminatorily motivated.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALLACE H. NATIONS, Administrative Law Judge. Charges were filed against Lawyers Cooperative Publishing Company (Respondent) on January 14, 1980, by Office and Professional Employees International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC, on November 12, 1980, by Stanley Dash, on February 20, 1981, by Robert Carduner, and on February 20, 1981, by Irving Kensler, each resulting in the issuance of complaints against the Respondent. All of the individual cases were consolidated for hearing. The consolidated complaint alleges that during the course of a union organizing campaign and thereafter the Respondent has unlawfully interrogated its employees, created the impression of surveillance of its employees, threatened its employees because of union activity, granted benefits during the course of the union campaign, discharged employees Stanley Dash, Robert Carduner, Irving Kensler, Richard Warner, and Hubert Redd, and disciplined employee David Outlaw because of union activity. The consolidated cases were heard in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on July 20–30, 1981; in Washington, D.C., on August 11–19, 1981; and again in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on August 24–25, 1981. Briefs were received from the General Counsel and the Respondent.

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Lawyers Cooperative Publishing Company (LCP) of Rochester, New York, engages in the sale and publication of law books and other legal publications on a nationwide basis. It has admitted the jurisdictional allegations of the consolidated complaint. I find that it is an employer within the meaning of the Act and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction in this proceeding.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Office and Professional Employees International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

III. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE ALLEGATIONS

A. Background

Lawyers Cooperative Publishing Company of Rochester, New York (LCP), is one of the nation's leading publishers of law books and other legal publications. It markets its products primarily through a large sales force of commissioned salespersons. The Company has divided its sales territory into various regions managed by regional managers, who report to a national sales manager. This manager is directly responsible to LCP's vice president of marketing and its president.

The basis for the involved union organizing campaign had its inception in 1977 when the Company abandoned its former compensation plan for sales representatives and introduced what it calls a "subscription growth" plan. The details of this plan are unnecessary to the decision of this proceeding. It is sufficient to know that the plan had the effect of reducing sales commissions for many senior sales representatives because of various factors beyond their control. The operation of the subscription growth plan from the outset caused dissatisfaction among many of the Company's field sales representatives. Although this dissatisfaction was made known to management in a variety of ways, LCP's management was and is committed to the subscription growth plan. Some adjustments to the plan were made in the first 2 years after its introduction to cure some of its deficiencies, but opposition to the plan remained among the Company's sales representatives. One of the LCP sales representatives, Stanley Dash, determined that the only solution to the problem was to have the Company's field sales representatives form or join a union. He also believed that with the aid of a union solutions could be found to other perceived problems including the Company's pension plan, its disparate treatment of salespersons in the field compared with personnel in the home office, and the manner in which sales quotas were computed.

In early December 1979, Dash organized a conference call between himself and several other sales representatives including alleged discriminatee Irving Kensler. Dash indicated that he had received union authorization cards from the Chicago branch of the Office and Professional Employees International Union (the Union) as well as advice on an organizing campaign with a list of do's and don'ts to be used during the campaign. The sales representatives participating in the conference call indicated interest in the Union, and Dash had authorization cards sent to these persons for distribution to the remainder of the sales force.

Knowledge of the organizing campaign which resulted in a Board election on May 8, 1980, came to the Company's management on January 9, 1980. Though some of the Company's lower-level management may have known or heard rumors that such a campaign was being conducted at a slightly earlier date, I credit the Company's witnesses that its top management did not become aware of the campaign until January 9. Immediately following receipt of knowledge of the campaign, the Company contacted its attorneys for advice on how to combat the organizing drive. LCP admits that it did not want the Union and sought advice on how to win the campaign.

Acting on advice of counsel, Company Vice President of Marketing Richard Anderson and National Sales Manager Peter Bissett called each of the 11 regional managers on January 10 and 11 and sought their knowledge of any union organizing campaign. The regional managers expressed no knowledge of the campaign. Shortly thereafter, again after meeting with counsel, the regional managers were called by Bissett and Anderson and asked to telephone one or two of their sales representatives to state that they had heard a rumor about union organizing and ask if the representatives were aware of it. The regional managers were instructed to say nothing further, not to inquire who was involved, not to inquire whether authorization cards had been distributed or signed, and not to ascertain underlying issues or grievances. However, it is clear from the evidence that though these instructions may have been given, the regional managers in varying degrees failed to carry them out with care. The regional managers violated the Act by illegally interrogating their sales representatives, creating an atmosphere of surveillance, and implying that benefits would result from staying nonunion. After the initial canvass of the sales representatives by the regional managers, it became clear that an organizing campaign was well underway. Acting upon advice of counsel, LCP decided to have the regional managers explain in one-on-one conversations the significance of union authorization cards. The instructions given the regional managers were to: (1) meet face to face with each sales representative, (2) state that the Company was aware of the organizing attempt, (3) state that cards had been sent out, and (4) state that the Company wanted its sales representatives to know the significance of the cards.

The Company also instructed the regional managers not to ask questions about any individual's participation in union activities and to state that they were not interested in whether the representatives received a card, signed it, or sent one back. The regional managers were also told not to make any threats and not to promise anything. In explaining the significance of the authorization cards, the regional managers were to make the following statements: (1) If a majority of the sales representatives signed the cards and sent them back, the Union can go to LCP's management and say, "We have a majority of the people who want a union and we want to represent them." The Company can agree and there will be no election (2) if a majority of the people sign the cards and send them in resulting in an election, though the election may be lost by the Union, it could go to the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) and tell it they had a majority, that the Company must have done something to cause the election against them, and a new election can be held or the NLRB can direct the Union to be the representative and (3) if the cards were signed, you can request the cards to be returned.

The regional managers were told to listen and answer questions, if questions were asked, but not to ask or question anybody about anything. They were also instructed to report to Bissett and keep him informed but to be extremely careful about what they said and how they handled themselves.

The face-to-face meetings between the regional managers and the individual sales representatives took place generally between January 14–18, 1980. After these meetings, LCP conducted its campaign primarily through letters and the use of the other officials in the Company, including Thomas Gosnell, its president, Donald Bennett, Vice President of Personnel Anderson, and Bissett. Following the regional manager-sales representatives meetings about the authorization cards, LCP gave the regional managers further guidelines on how to conduct themselves during the organizing drive. On January 22, LCP mailed to each regional manager a four-page summary of dos and don'ts for supervisors. On February 4–6, a meeting for regional managers was held in Chicago at which time LCP's labor counsel explained the election process, elaborated on the dos and don'ts, talked of probable union campaign techniques, and explained how LCP's campaign would be run.

At the same meeting, the regional managers were asked to fill out questionnaires on the sales representatives working in their regions. These questionnaires, among other things, required the regional managers to give their best estimate of their sales representatives union sympathies.

Following the Chicago meeting, LCP carried out a campaign based on letters from President Gosnell, communication meetings with Gosnell, and informational meetings where Bennett, Bissett, and Anderson explained LCP's benefit programs and marketing procedures. The General Counsel urges that the initial meetings of the regional managers with the sales representatives, the meeting of company management with groups of sales representatives, the company letters to the sales representatives, and changes in the company's pension program and compensation program during the course of the campaign, all constitute violations of the Act.

During the course of the campaign, LCP threatened Stanley Dash with probation and placed sales representative David Outlaw on probation for 6 months. Following the election in May 1980, which the Union lost, the Company discharged one of its regional managers, Richard Warner. It also engaged in a course of harassment of Stanley Dash which is discussed in detail at a later point in this decision. Region 30 and LCP entered into a comprehensive settlement in Case 3–CA–5603 in September 1980, which was set aside when LCP discharged Dash in November. Earlier in August LCP discharged sales representative Irving Kensler. LCP discharged Regional Manager Robert Carduner following a meeting with company attorneys in preparation of LCP's defense of the reopened proceeding. In October, sales representative Hubert Redd was discharged. It is alleged that the motivation for all of the above personnel actions was LCP's union animus and thus each action is alleged to be a violation of the Act.

B. Discussion and Conclusions

1. Implementation of five-percent buffer to subscription growth plan during the campaign

On March 4, 1980, the Respondent announced the implementation of a so-called five-percent buffer, a change in the existing compensation plan. This new plan was announced to sales representatives at meetings held in March 1980. The purpose of the change was to ease some of the more adverse effects of the subscription growth plan which began in 1977 and about which there had been much controversy among the sales representatives. Development of the five-percent buffer began in April 1979, which LCP Vice President of Marketing Anderson initiated discussions with his counterpart in Bancroft Whitney, a wholly owned subsidiary of LCP. By May 1979, both vice presidents were corresponding on the elements of what was to become the five-percent buffer plan and the plan had been placed on the agenda of a July management meeting for discussion. During June 1979, Anderson had some initial figures prepared regarding the dollars that might be involved in changing the then-current compensation plan.

At the July meeting, the five-percent buffer plan was agreed on and a decision was made to implement the plan by January 1, 1980, conditioned on the Company's receiving a satisfactory indepth cost-benefit analysis. The plan, at this point, was detailed as indicated by a memorandum introduced into evidence. In August 1979, information on how much the five-percent buffer would affect the sales representatives' commissions was being collected. These figures were sent to LCP's comptroller for verification and a discrepancy was discovered in the calculations. In September, Anderson decided that the quantity of information for determining the cost-benefit analysis was not sufficient and further information was collected. The comptroller recomputed the figures and another meeting was scheduled for review of the plan in November 1979. At the November meeting management decided to get more information to further refine the calculations. Because of this information request, the Company decided that it was impossible to implement the five-percent buffer on January 1, 1980, because the final figures would still be coming in. The decision was made at this time to present the final revised plan to the regional managers at a scheduled February 1980 meeting in Hawaii before announcing it generally. It was also agreed at that point that the five-percent buffer would be made retroactive to January 1, 1980.

At the November meeting, the president of LCP gave his final approval to the five-percent buffer plan subject only to the final figures being simiar to the acceptable calculations that had already been made.

About January 3, 1980, the vice president of Bancroft Whitney asked Anderson whether the final calculation could be computed in time to announce the buffer plan at the Hawaii meeting. Anderson responded on January 8 that the figures were not yet completed but that he would do his best. Anderson also testified that he also decided at this time to hold a small meeting of regional managers from LCP and Bancroft Whitney to be sure that there would be no differences of opinion between the companies as there had been in the past. This meeting was held in Dallas[1] with satisfactory results and the five-percent buffer was announced to the regional managers at a general management meeting held in Hawaii in March. The plan was announced shortly thereafter to sales representatives.

I find from the evidence that the five-percent buffer was developed and a decision to implement it had been made prior to the beginning of the union organizing campaign and the time that the Company gained knowledge of the drive.

Thus, I find that the plan was not instituted and implemented in order to influence the election in violation of the Act. As both the decision to implement the plan and the timing for the announcement of the plan was made prior to the Company's knowledge of the campaign, I conclude that the timing of the announcement of the plan was consistent with the Company's prior actions in announcing changes in compensation plans and was not unlawful. See B. L. K. Steel, 245 NLRB 1347 (1979). Therefore, I recommend that the complaint, insofar as it alleges a violation of the Act in this regard, be dismissed.

2. Lowering the forecasts

The complaint alleges that LCP granted a general reduction in sales quotas to sales representatives in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The 1980 sales quotas were given to the representatives after LCP had knowledge of the union organizing campaign. However, the forecasts themselves were prepared pursuant to a consistent company policy at a time well before January 9. The procedure for developing forecasts begins about August of the year preceding the forecast year with sales representatives submitting their quotas. These requests are paired with company goals under a rather complicated procedure which results in final quotas by December. Additionally, though many sales representatives' sales forecasts were lowered, at least one-third of the sales representatives' forecasts were increased for the year 1981. The General Counsel failed to meet the burden of proof to support the allegation that ther Company lowered the forecasts in order to have an effect on the union organizing campaign and, accordingly, I recommend that the complaint, insofar as it alleges a violation of the Act in this regard be dismissed.

[1] The Dallas meeting is significant because it was mentioned by some regional managers to their sales representatives in advance of the meeting, with the implication that improved benefits might be forthcoming.

3. Washington meeting between Gosnell, Fogel, Mann, and Kensler

A meeting between LCP President Gosnell, LCP Treasurer Seymour Fogel, and sales representatives David Mann and Irving Kensler was held in Washington, D.C., in a hotel on April 11, 1980. The complaint alleges that at this meeting Gosnell interrogated the representatives concerning their union activities and sympathies, solicited complaints and grievances from Mann and Kensler, promised increased benefits and improved conditions of employment, created an impression of surveillance by asking Mann and Kensler the names of other employees involved in organizing the Union, and sought to undermine the Union's organizing drive by soliciting them to inform other employees of their antiunion sympathies in order to cause them to abandon support for the Union.

Everything about this meeting is in controversy. The General Counsel contends, through the testimony of Regional Manager Robert Carduner and Kensler, that the meeting was set up at the insistence of Kensler in a message relayed through Carduner. As to the meeting itself, its content is in complete dispute. Kensler, on the one hand, contends that his active participation was limited to a momentary attempt to explain an alternative to the Company's subscription growth plan, after which he was cut off and interrogated by Fogel and Gosnell as to the union organizing campaign and what could be done to defeat it. Gosnell and Fogel, on the other hand, submit that Kensler presented a very detailed alternate compensation plan and other ideas on how to defeat the union organizing campaign. They contend that at no time did they interrogate either representative, promise any improved benefits, or request the identities of any persons involved in the organizing campaign.

With respect to this meeting, I believe that the testimony given by Fogel and Mann is the most credible. The General Counsel points to the testimony of Carduner and Kensler to the effect that Gosnell, through Bissett, requested a meeting to be set up between Gosnell and several influential sales representatives. Bissett testified that Carduner contacted him in March or early April stating that he had been contacted by five representatives who wanted to meet with Gosnell for the purpose of resolving the union problem. Bissett further testified the he instructed Carduner to have the sales representatives contact Gosnell directly. Anderson testified that Carduner later called him to confirm that two representatives identified as Kensler and Mann wanted to speak with Gosnell. Anderson also advised that they should contact Gosnell directly. Regional Manager George Synder testified that Kensler, in late March, requested that he set up a meeting between Gosnell, Kensler, some influential sales representatives, and some regional managers.

One of the participants in the meeting, Rober Mann, testified that Carduner called him about the meeting and said nothing about acting at Gosnell's direction. Mann also recalled that Carduner said that several sales representatives were going to be included in the meeting as of the first call. Carduner testified that he was never seeking more than two. Telephone bills introduced into evidence show that during the period immediately before the meeting Carduner talked extensively with Mann and Kensler, including nine calls to Mann on April 9. As the Respondent points out, these are hardly the acts of one who is acting solely as an intermediary.

I also agree with the Respondent that the hotel arrangements indicate that Kensler and Mann initiated the meeting. A blackboard was placed in the meeting room at Mann's request. The Respondent urges, and I agree, that if Kensler and Mann were meeting with Gosnell solely at his request, the purpose of the meeting being left unstated, then no arrangements would have been made to have available a blackboard for a presentation. With respect to the events at the meeting, Kensler's and Mann's testimony conflict sharply. As noted earlier, Kensler testified that Gosnell interrogated Mann and him with respect to the identity of other union supporters, solicited grievances, and encouraged them to work against the Union. On the other hand, Mann testified that Kensler made a lengthy presentation with respect to an alternate compensation plan that he had devised and utilized notes. Kensler denies having any notes. Kensler stated that he never indicated opposition to the Union at this meeting or at any other time, although Mann testified that both he and Kensler stated at the meeting that they were opposed to the organizing drive. Seymour Fogel, a very credible witness based on demeanor and manner, verified these portions of Mann's testimony. Fogel testified that at the meeting Kensler stated his opposition to the Union and that he had a plan to defeat the Union. Kensler then explained the sales representatives' opposition to the subscription growth plan program and offered in a lengthy fashion an alternative compensation plan. Kensler utilized the blackboard to explain his program. Fogel also testified that Kensler proposed that he be reinstated as national sales manager to replace Bissett. I can find no credible evidence at this meeting Gosnell actually interrogated Kensler or Mann about the identities of union supporters or promised any benefits. However, Mann testified that President Gosnell asked him about what he doing about defeating the Union and why he was not on the telephone calling and telling other sales representatives about his view of the Union. Mann further testified that Gosnell said that was what he should be doing. Although Gosnell denies these statements, Fogel testified that near the end of the meeting Kensler gratuitously said that he was either going to call the salespersons or if any of the salespersons called him he was going to tell them to vote against the Union. Fogel testified that Gosnell's response to that was something like, "Well, Irv, you know I cannot tell what you can or cannot do. But, if you're to do that, that would be nice" or "It's nice to know that you're on the Company's side."

I credit Mann's testimony corroborated, at least in part, by Fogel, that Gosnell urged both Mann and Kensler to take action to discourage union support among their fellow sales representatives. I find that Gosnell's actions in this regard constitute a direction to discourage other employees from supporting the Union and is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. See Galax Apparel Corp., 247 NLRB 159, 162 (1980). In all other respects, I find the actions taken by the Respondent's management at the Washington meeting to be nonviolative of the Act and will recommend that the other allegations relating to this meeting be dismissed.

4. Gosnell information meetings

During the campaign in the spring of 1980, the Respondent scheduled a series of meetings between its sales representatives and President Gosnell. At these meetings, Gosnell gave what he characterized as an unstructured presentation of the Company's point of view with respect to the Union. After this portion of the meeting, Gosnell solicited comments from the sales representatives in an attempt to answer their questions. The General Counsel urges that the meetings constituted an unfair labor practice in that they were a departure from the Company's past practices in communicating with sales representatives, that the comment sessions constituted solicitation of grievances, and that the answers given by Gosnell amounted to a promise to remedy such grievances thereby constituting an impermissible promise of benefits to discourage union support.

The Company's past practice with respect to communicating with sales representatives had been through the normal channels of management. Management views were passed through Bissett to the regional managers who then discussed whatever subject management wanted them to with the sales representatives on a one-to-one basis. Information that the sales representatives wanted to make known to the management generally passed back to management in the same fashion. However, the Company had a practice of having regional sales meetings and annual meetings at which top management did speak to the sales representatives and discuss company policy with them. Thus, Gosnell's meetings with the sales representatives were not unique to the organizing campaign. The Respondent has the right to communicate its views and its policies to the Union during the course of the campaign. I cannot find that the fact that Gosnell met with the sales representatives in and of itself was unlawful.

The question of whether or not Gosnell, by asking for comments, was soliciting grievances is another question. Clearly the Company wanted to explain its views to the sales representatives and wanted to hear the sales representatives' views or it would not have held the meetings. Gosnell carefully avoided words such as grievance when asking for comments or questions relating to the topics about which he spoke, which included working conditions, benefits, and the Company's commission plan. However, under the circumstances, he was clearly asking the employees to air their grievances. The Board has held that the vice in solicitation of grievances is that, by responding to the grievances, employers may either expressly or impliedly promise to remedy them, thus promising a benefit. From the best evidence introduced into this record with respect to what Gosnell actually said, I cannot find tha he ever promised or even implied a benefit in reponse to sales representatives' questions.

During the course of a question-and-answer session, a sales representative made a recording and thus preserved the questions and Gosnell's answers. This transcript reveals that Gosnell, at worst, defended the Company's existing policies. There is not even a hint in the transcript that Gosnell intended to change any policies, commission structure, or other matters of interest to the sales representatives. As there is no showing that there was some expressed or implied promise to remedy real or imagined grievances, I cannot find that Gosnell's responses constituted an unfair labor practice. There was some equivocal testimony given about Gosnell promising to review the Company's commission policy with respect to one set of books sold in New York. This testimony was not clear and is at odds with Gosnell's demonstrated performance as shown by the tape of an actual meeting. After reviewing all of the evidence with respect to these meetings, I have concluded that the General Counsel has failed to prove that the meetings constituted an unfair labor practice and will recommend that the allegations of the complaint, based on these meetings, be dismissed.

5. The Company's antiunion letters

During the course of the campaign, the Respondent sent a series of letters to its sales representatives dealing with campaign issues. It is contended that certain of these letters contained statements which constitute unfair labor practices. (a) In a letter dated April 2, 1980, President Gosnell wrote the sales representatives, inter alia:

> Contrary to what you have been told, you do not need to sign a card in order to vote. If you have already signed a card and you wish it back, you may get it back by writing to the Union requesting that it return your card to you. The Union's address is: Office and Professional Employees International Union, Local 2121, 290 Franklin Street, Room 203, Buffalo, New York 14202.

The General Counsel urges that this statement constitutes an unlawful solicitation of the employees to return their authorization cards. On brief, the General Counsel draws an analogy between the clearly unlawful supplying of stamped, self-addressed envelopes in a solicitation of employees to withdraw with their authorization cards to the Respondent's supplying the address of the Union, relying on Deutsch Co., 180 NLRB 8 at 20 (1969). In that case, the Board did find it unlawful for an employer to supply self-addressed, stamped postcards which required no more than the employee's signature to effect a revocation of his or her authorization. The question in the instant case is much closer. First, there is clearly no solicitation to withdraw the cards in the quoted paragraph. The supplying of the Union's adddress is certainly not the same as supplying a stamped postcard which only needs a signature. The employee would have to actually write a request to withdraw authorization and supply postage to effect the request. Yet supplying the address and the procedure for withdrawing the card, absent an employee request for this information, does go further than merely informing employees of their right to withdraw their authorization if they choose voluntarily to do so. On balance, in light of the strong campaign being waged by the Company against the organizing campaign, I find that the Employer in this regard has provided more than information to its employees and that its letter of April 2, 1980, does constitute an unlawful solicitation to withdraw support from the Union.

(b) Gosnell sent a letter dated April 14 to the sales representatives stating:

> I would like you to take a minute to consider what it would be like living with a Union, if the Union should win the election.
> NO LONGER will you be able to work directly with the company as an individual. With a Union, an adversary reltionship between you and the company will exist. As a matter of fact, the usual way we will be required to work with you is through your union steward.
> NO LONGER will it be possible to make "judgment calls" in individual sales situations. Strict rules and regulations as specified in a union contract will govern all aspects of your job and your relationship with the company.
> NO LONGER will you have individuality, flexibility, independence and ability to completely plan your own work schedule. With a union, all working onditions, sales quotas, and other job-related conditions as provided by the collective-bargaining agreement would have to be rigidly and consistently enforced.
> Consider what you would give up if you belonged to a union.

Although the Respondent has the right to make predictions as to what might happen as a result of a union victory based on objective facts, it does not have the right to make misstatements of law and threats of worsened working conditions. The April 14 letter is not couched in terms of what could happen as a result of bargaining. Rather, I believe it is couched in terms of what will happen. Thus, I do find that it constitutes a threat of harsher working conditions and thus is unlawful in its entirety. See Colony Printing, 249 NLRB 223, 224 (1980), enfd. 651 F.2d 502 (7th Cir. 1981). The letter's misstatement concerning employees' rights to speak directly to management about terms and conditions of employment is also impermissible under Board law.

(c) In a letter dated April 15, 1980, President Gosnell wrote the sales representatives, inter alia:

> What does a strike mean to you?
> It means:
> 1. Loss of income.
> 2. Loss of customers to competition.
> 3. Loss of job (in the event of an economic strike, you can be permanently replaced).
> Remember, the Union's only real strength is its right to strike. Don't take a chance vote "NO."

I find that this paragraph of the letter constitutes an unfair labor practice in that it both infers that permanent loss of job will be a result of a strike and fails to give even a hint of the existence of an employee's poststrike rights. See Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970).

6. Changes in LCP's pension plan

On April 10, 1980, the Respondent advised its employees that it had changed its pension plan to make it more generous. The credible evidence reveals that in April or May 1979 Company Vice President of Personnel Donald Bennett began to question whether the Company's existing plan was adequate and competitive. He initiated a study of this plan in comparison with others using private, actuarial consultants. The study was completed and given to Bennett in June 1979. Reviewing the study, Bennett decided that the LCP plan was not competitive and began a program to determine how to adjust the plan to make it more competitive. The record reflects correspondence respecting possible changes in the retirement plan passing between the consultants and LCP throughout the period of August to November 1979.

The Company initially had hoped to implement the changes in this retirement plan on January 1, 1980. The Company had historically always announced and instituted changes in its retirement program on either January 1 or July 1. Because the information required to make a final decision about the pension plan was put together too late to meet the January 1 deadline, the Company next set July 1, 1980, as the date that the new plan would be implemented. The changes were made final and approved in the latter part of March 1980. These changes were announced on April 10, 1980, 1 month before the union election.

Based on the foregoing, I believe that the changes in the benefit plan had nothing whatsoever to do with the union organizing campaign. However, I do believe that the timing of the announcement was selected because of the Company's desire to defeat the organizing effort. The timing of the announcement appears to be a substantial deviation from past practice. The Company's stated reason for the April announcement was that a large amount of clerical work had to be done to prepare the date necessary to determine the proper amounts to be paid to each retiree on July 1. The Company contends that this work could not be done in a "closet" and that it felt that the fact of the impending changes in the plan would soon become widely known. It felt, therefore, that it had to make a public announcement. Why these reasons had never applied to the announcement of any previous changes to a pension plan is not explained in the record and I find them unconvincing. Accordingly, I find that the announcement of the pension plan changes was motivated, at least in a substantial part, for the effect it would have in resolving one of the sales representatives' primary grievances and was designed to affect the outcome of the election. Accordingly, I find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by the timing of its announcement of the proposed pension changes.

7. Bennett's promise of a benefit

In March 1980, at a meeting in which the five-percent buffer program was described to several of the sales representatives, in a private conversation, sales representative Joseph Robinson asked Personnel Director Bennett about possible changes in the Company's short-term disability program. Bennett indicated to Robinson that the program was under review by management.

The General Counsel contends that Bennett's response implies a promise of benefits, especially so since it was made at a time when the five-percent buffer program had just been announced.

The Respondent asserts that the program had been under review for some time dating back to the fall of 1979. It also cites the testimony of Robinson that Bennett did not say anything favorable about the review and did not indicate whether there would or would not be a change in the program. There is no evidence that Bennett's response was untrue. In these circumstances Bennett's acknowledgement of the review without more does not constitute an implied promise of benefit. Accordingly, I would recommend that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges a violation of Section 8(a)(1) by virtue of Bennett's response.

8. Bissett's threat of discharge of Talbot

In March 1980, at a meeting held for certain of the sales representatives in Syracuse, New York, to discuss the five-percent buffer, National Sales Manager Bissett is alleged to have had a threatening conversation with sales representative Gregg Talbot. Talbot was a young sales representative, brought into the Company by Bissett, who acted as his first regional manager. The evidence reflects that Bissett considered Talbot something of a protege. After the company meeting, the two went to dinner and then to a cocktail lounge. Bissett remarked to Talbot that he had been doing rather well for a young man, in light of his background, that "I was doing pretty good for a kid, that type of a statement."

Talbot's further testimony regarding this conversation is as follows:

> Q. What else did he say?
> A. Well, he said I was making a lot of money to which I said, "Well", I said, "I am paying a lot of taxes now." And that was the thrust of the conversation. Well, following that now I must say I was somewhat taken aback when I said I was paying a lot of taxes. He said, "Well, we could fix that." And I said, "How is that." And he said, "We could fire you." Which was out of the blue. I had to get my breath back. And I said, "How could that happen or how is that?" And he said "You should be careful how you act. You should remember where you came from." And that was the end of the conversation.
> Q. Now I would like to direct your attention to te next afternoon. Did you have another conversation with Mr. Bissett?
> A. Yes. We met in the lobby. There was a lot of people moving around in the Holiday Inn. And he had a completely different demeanor about him. He indicated that the future managers were coming from young people like myself. And that I had a lot of places to go. And briefly just said things like that.

The General Counsel contends that the threat to fire Talbot was a serious one and was designed to threaten him about any union activity. Bissett's version of the conversation is very similar to that given by Talbot except the motivation for the statement is far different than that suggested by the General Counsel. Bissett testified that the conversation took place out of his pride in the success enjoyed by Talbot. He explained that, in the past when he complained about paying a lot of taxes, his former boss had always told him that if he had no job he could pay no taxes. He testified that he merely repeated that comment to Talbot. He futher claimed that his comment about watching how Talbot acted was predicated on the fact that Talbot was performing far better than many of the people his own age. He was concerned that if Talbot partied with these people in the evening he could not continue to perform successfully as a sales representative. Based on the demeanor of the witnesses, I fully credit Bissett's explanation for the conversation. His remarks had nothing to do with union activity. There has been no showing in this record that as of the date of the conversation he would have had any knowledge with respect to Talbot's feelings vis-a-vis the Union. In fact, the record reflects that all input to Bissett up to that point about Talbot's union sympathies would have indicated that he was opposed to the Union. Accordingly, I find that Bissett's conversation with Talbot did not relate to union activity and therefore did not constitute a threat in derogation of Talbot's rights under Section 7 of the Act.

9. Garret-Klausing conversation

Sales representative Richard Klausing, a 23-year employee of LCP, learned of the union campaign in December in a conversation with Stan Dash. As a result of this conversation he was sent an authorization card and some union literature and signed the card, dating it December 19, 1979.

Klausing testified that he had a telephone conversation with his regional manager, Larry Garret, in late December 1979. He testified that Garret wanted to know if he had been contacted by anyone concerning the Union, asked if he had signed an authorization card, and wanted to know who, if anyone, had contacted him concerning the Union.

I do not credit the testimony with respect to the December telephone call. Garret denies that it occurred and there is nothing in this record to support a finding that the Respondent had knowledge of the Union's organizing campaign until January. I believe that Klausing is mistaken with respect to the timing of his call, if it actually occurred and, because of the mistake in timing, I will not credit testimony regarding the telephone call. There were several other sales representatives in the region who were contacted by Garret at Bissett's request and presumably, if Garret had interrogated Klausing about the Union and others who might be in it, as alleged, he would hae made a similar interrogation of at least one of the other representatives.

Klausing testified that about January 12, 1980, he received a call from Garret requesting that he meet with him personally. According to Klausing, the two met in Lexington, Kentucky, a few days thereafter. During this meeting, Klausing testified that Garret inquired as to what complaints he had heard salesmen make and Klausing mentioned the commission setup as well as certain other perceived problems. During this conversation, Klausing testified that Garret indicated that the Company had certain long-range things that it was trying to do and that he was going to Texas to talk over a possible change in the commissions program. Thereafter, Garret asked Klausing to keep an open mind. About the same time he asked Klausing how he felt about the Union.

According to Garret, the only conversation regarding the Union took place on January 14, 1980, in Lexington, Kentucky. Garret testified that he told Klausing that the Company had become aware of union activities and asked him was he aware of such activity. Garret denied have asked Klausing who contacted him or whether Klausing had signed a card.

With respect to these alleged conversations, it is extremely difficult to determine where the truth lies. Although Klausing was a hesitant and forgetful witness, there is absolutely no reason shown in this record why he should fabricate testimony. He and his regional manager, Garret, were shown to be close friends and thus no personal animosity existed between the two which would give rise to an attempt to "get back" at either this manager or the general management of the Company. Klausing's testimony that Garret solicited complaints and told him immediately thereafter that cerain regional managers were going to Texas to discuss changing the commission program is consistent with similar conversations held between other regional managers and their sales representatives. For this reason, I credit this testimony and find that a violation of Section 8(a)(1) occurred in the solicitation of grievances was followed closely by at least an implied promise of benefits. I also credit Klausing's testimony that Garret asked how he felt about it (the Union). As of the time of the January meeting between Klausing and Garret in Kentucky, the regional manager had not been given the specific written instructions on how to deal with unions which followed shortly thereafter. As Klausing and Garret were old friends, this question, though improper, appears to me to be likely to be asked. I believe that the question, by its very nature and in the context of a conversation regarding the Union, tends to be coercive and is thus a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

10. Tuttle's conversation with Vogel, Hoover, and Rindross

On January 15, 1980, in Chicago, Regional Sales Manager Robert Tuttle met with sales representative Paul Vogel. Based on testimony concerning this meeting, the General Counsel asserts that Tuttle created an impression of surveillance, made an unlawful promise of benefits, and threatened Vogel with a loss of benefits in order to induce him to abandon his support for the Union.

Vogel's affidavit, given to a Board agent after an investigation in this proceeding, was offered into evidence as his testimony conflicted with it in certain regards. With respect to the meeting in question, Vogel's affidavit indicates that Tuttle, upon meeting with Vogel, said, "As you probably know, there is an organization drive among the sales represenatives. I had to drop everything and take care of this and I have got to go to South Chicago, Iowa, and Southern Illinois to talk to my other sales representatives. My advice is to keep your card in your pocket and have patience because there are some changes coming which I can't get into now, but things will be better. If a contract is signed with the Union, the contests, dinners, and trips could be discontinued, so hang on, there will be changes." The affidavit goes on to state that at no time "did he [Tuttle] specifically tell me not to go into the Union, nor did he talk unfavorably about unions in general."

Vogel's testimony at the hearing was to the effect that all of Tuttle's comments were in response to questions initiated by him. Vogel testified, "Well, I think I asked him [Tuttle] a question to the effect as to when is this going to be over with. It was one way or another. I was tired of it going on. And I think he responded something to the effect of be patient, it will blow over or something like that."

Vogel further testified:

> Q. Did he initiate any statement that he was aware of of an organizing drive?
> A. Okay. I think the way it came about was when we sat down. I started asking him questions about, specifically, the Union. And I think I even asked him what would he do if he was in my situation since he had sold for quite a bit more time than I have. And knew the company a lot better than I did. And that's how we got into the conversation
> . . . .
> Q. What did he say about authorization cards?
> A. Authorization cards specifically, I don't think he talked about them. Generally I think the phrase was used when I asked him what he would do in this situation, I think he mentioned something about he would leave it in his pocket.
> Q. Did he initiate the statement that he would keep an authorization card in his pocket?

A. He might have used that as just a method of telling me that in his opinion that if he were in my shoes, he wouldn't be in favor of the Union.

Q. . . . Mr. Vogel, during this discussion did Mr. Tuttle say anything about contests, or dinners, or trips being discontinued by the company?

A. I think the only time that was mentioned, I did ask him what the company would do if the Union got in. I remember asking him that.

Q. What was his response?

A. First thing he said was that he didn't know. But then he said, "I'm sure that if it cost them money, the money would come from other things."

Q. And what did he say the Company would do?

A. Well, he didn't know what the Company would do. He was just trying to—I was just asking him what he would do in my shoes. And what he thought the Company would do. In other words, just a breakfast discussion. He says that if money was taken from—if the Union being in would cost the Company money, obviously there would be less money available to do other things.

The General Counsel urges that Tuttle's opening comments and remark about keeping your card in your pocket constitutes an unlawful impression of surveillance.

The campaign was at this time fairly common knowledge in the Company and I do not think these remarks would give the impression of surveillance. However, the request to hold his card, taken together with the suggestion that Vogel be patient, that things were going to get better, I find to be an impermissible promise that benefits would result if the Company remained nonunion. Likewise, the suggestion that existing company benefits may be discontinued if the Union won the election I find to be a threat designed to influence Vogel's support for the Union. The threat was not couched in terms of possible results of bargaining.

b. Tuttle-Hoover conversations

On January 17, 1980, Tuttle met with David Hoover, one of his sales representatives, to give him the speech on the union authorization cards as he had been directed to by Bissett. Based on this meeting, the General Counsel contends that Tuttle promised improved benefits to undermine union support, created by the unlawful impression of surveillance, and unlawfully inquired into employees' union activities.

Hoover first became aware of the Union's organizing activity through a casual conversation with a fellow salesmen in his general territory, Gary Hoad. Hoad discussed the campaign briefly with Hoover and mentioned that Stan Dash was heading up the organizing committee. Hoover called Dash in December and after the discussion Dash sent an authorization card to Hoover. On January 17, Hoover met with Tuttle at a Holiday Inn in Davenport, Iowa. According to Hoover, Tuttle opened the conversation stating "that he didn't know whether or not I had an authorization card and he didn't care whether I had an authorization card but that if I had one to please sit on it until after he comes back from Dallas which would be the following weekend." Hoover said Tuttle told him that "two or three sales managers from LCP, and two or three from Bancroft-Whitney and a few people from the home office were going to meet to go over subscription growth and possibly help offset salesmen like myself with big traveling territories with some type of incentive."

Hoover also testified that the conversation continued as follows:

> He said that he had to leave to meet Mr. Rindfuss [another sales representative] that evening for dinner, and he stated that he would have to see everyone in the region that week. And I asked him if he had seen Gary, and he said no. Gary Hoad. And he said no, it would be better to talk to Gary after he had gotten back from Dallas because he would have something with a little more substance to talk to him about because he felt that he was already deeply involved in the Union. And I asked him if I could mentioned [sic] our conversation to Gary, and he said that was entirely up to me. And I told him that I would, and he said that he expected that.

Hoover also admitted on cross-examination that Tuttle had gone through the series of statements which each of the regional managers was told to convey to their sales representatives about authorization cards and their effect.

Tuttle denies telling Hoover to sit on his authorization card, but does not deny mentioning the upcoming trip to Dallas. I credit Hoover's version of the conversation in that the urging of Hoover to keep his card, combined with he information given with respect to the Dallas meeting, is consistent with Tuttle's meeting with Vogel. I also find that Tuttle committed a violation of Section 8(a) of the Act in his regard as he did in his meeting with Vogel.

I do not find that this comments with respect to Gary Hoad constitute a violation of the Act. Hoover testified that he specifically asked Tuttle whether Tuttle was going to see Hoad. Likewise, the reason given by Tuttle for not seeing Hoad was prompted by a question on that point by Hoover. Crediting Hoover's version of the entire conversation, I agree with the Respondent that it would be a form of entrapment to find an unfair labor practice resulting from Tuttle's answers about Hoad.

c. Tuttle-Rindfuss conversation

After Tuttle's meeting with Hoover, he traveled to Springfield, Illinois, to meet with James Rindfuss, an 18-year employee with LCP. Rindfuss testified that, following a dinner with Tuttle, Tuttle said , "I would assume that you know why I am here." He continued to say, "There is some activity to forming a union by the representatives. I don't know what your position is. I would recommend that everyone be patient because the situation is going to be improved soon, and your potential will be greater than it has ever been." He also said, "In the event that you have signed a card, I would recommend that you ask for it to be withdrawn." Rindfuss then testified that Tuttle asked for his comments and, on Rindfuss' asking about changes in the retirement plan, Tuttle replied that he would look into it.

Tuttle denied telling Rindfuss to return his card if he had signed one. Tuttle testified that all he stated was that an employee could request his card back if he had changed his mind after signing it. Tuttle also denied promising Rindfuss anything except that, in response to Rindfuss' questions about inadequacies in the dental plan, Tuttle said that the plan would be voted on again in 3 years and, "if we have patience, we hope for better things." Based on Rindfuss' version of the conversation, I cannot agree with the General Counsel that Tuttle gave Rindfuss the impression of surveillance or inquired what his position was with respect to the Union. However, I do agree witht he General Counsel that Tuttle's conversation amounted to a request to Rindfuss to withdraw his union card if he had signed one and implied a promise of benefits. This part of the conversation is consistent with Tuttle's conversations with the other sales representatives with whom he met and who testified in this proceeding. I find that, as with other two conversations, Tuttle impliedly or expressly promised benefits to influence the outcome of the election and solicited the withdrawal of authorization cards in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

11. Carroll's conversation with Outlaw and Redd

a. Carroll-Outlaw conversation

On January 16, 1980, Regional Manager John Carrol met with sales representative David Outlaw in Nashville, Tennessee. Inter alia, Outlaw testified that Carroll said to him:

> He told me that he didn't know whether I had signed a card or not, and that if I had signed a card, I could retract it.

He also told me that at one point in the conversation—"if they [the Union] had enough cards signed that they could come in and force themselves on the sales force whether they wanted it or not. And he told me that the Company had gotten the message, that it was sometimes like talking to a donkey. Sometimes you have to take a two-by-four and hit them over the head and they got the message and were willing to listen. Also, he told me that three managers from LCP were going out to Dallas the following week to meet with three managers from Bancroft-Whitney to discuss the subscription growth plan. They felt that was the major issue and problem, and that some good things would come back from the plan—would be reported to them in Hawaii which they were going to. All the regional managers were going to a couple of weeks later. And that was said, and then he summarized again and said that we could retract our card if we wanted to, and felt that things would be better without a union."

Carroll testified that he told Outlaw, with respect to authorization cards, if a majority of sales representatives signed authorization cards, the Union could become the exclusive bargaining agent for all the sales representatives.

Carroll also testified that Outlaw initiated the conversation about whether Lawyers Cooperative was going to make any changes in the subscription growth plan. Carroll stated that, with respect to this inquiry, he told Outlaw that "there would be a meeting in Dallas and that the subscription growth program is on the agenda, but I am not going to be there so I don't know what the results will be." On cross-examination, Outlaw testified that Carroll generally made the statements that he was told by Bissett. He also testified that the information about subscription growth and the meeting in Dallas were in response to a question asked by him.

Having considered the testimony of both witnesses, I credit Carroll's version of the conversation. Carroll's memory of the occasion was more complete and his testimony more detailed, yet consistent generally with much of Outlaw's version. Thus, I do not find that Carroll gave the impression of surveillance or threatened Outlaw. However, I do find that the mention of the Dallas meeting about subscription growth is an implied promise of benefits, as I have found with other manager-representative conversations. Mentioning a concrete action, i.e., the meeting in Dallas to discuss subscription growth, could only result in the listener thinking that something positive was being done by the Company.

b. Carroll-Redd's conversation

On January 14, Redd testified that he met with his regional manager, John Carroll, at the Augusta, Georgia airport. At this meeting, Redd testified that Carroll mentioned that it was his understanding that there were cards mailed out—union cards—to all sales representatives, and "he didn't try to find out if I had one, if I signed a card, if I had not signed one." But he stated that "with the majority of people signing cards that the majority would overrule and I would be in the Union whether or not I liked it." He said that "if I had signed a card that I could withdraw my signature, withdraw the card, and that it would not count. He said—he did not say anything about what type of plan was involved, but that there would be a plan or plans. I can't remember if it was, you know, plan or plans in the making to assist the income of the sales representatives."

Carroll testified that what he said to Redd, with respect to authorization cards, is: "That on the strength of the number of cards that might have been signed or sent in prior to an election that the Union might ask that they become the bargaining agent."

On cross-examination Redd's testimony wavered on several points but he was insistent on the point that he had been told that, if the majority signed cards, he would be in a union whether he liked it or not. I credit the testimony and find that it constitutes a threat in violation of the Act. I also credit Redd's testimony, with respect to the statement made by Carroll, that a plan or plans were in the works that would benefit the salesmen and thus find that the Respondent had made an implied promise of benefits in violation of the Act.

12. Snyder-Black's conversation

Regional Manager George Synder met with sales representative Donald Black in Miami, Florida, on January 18. According to Black, Snyder said, "Well, he said I don't know whether you are aware of it or not, but I understand that some of the salesmen are trying to organize a union. I am not going to ask you whether you are interested in it or involved in it or not, but I want you to be aware that if a majority goes to the Union, you will be bound by the same deal. You can't say, 'Well, I am not in favor of it.'" And so I thanked him, and we ate. It was very quiet. And then you said, "I am going to Dallas next week to a meeting. What do you think if I did not fill Frank Merville's territory?"

The witness interpreted the last statement as an implied benefit as territories left unfilled were split among existing salesmen and improved their chances for increased income.

The General Counsel contends that the opening statement made by Snyder constitutes an impression of surveillance. Since the meeting came at a point in time well after the union campaign was underway and was common knowledge among the salesmen, I do not find that the statement was anything more than a conversation opener and did not give an impression of surveillance. However, I find Black's testimony about Snyder—the statement with respect to the Merville territory—to be credible and does constitute an impermissible promise of benefits.

13. Bisig-Scott's conversation

On January 14, 1980, Regional Manager George Bisig met with sales representative Chester Scott following National Sales Manager Bissett's instructions. Scott testified that Bisig stated: "Well, we talked a lot of business. We talked, then he asked me if there was a petition going around. He wanted to know if I had heard about it. I said, 'I sure have.' He said, 'Are you unhappy with anything with the Company?' I said, 'I have always been unhappy with the Company on two subjects, and that was my pension plan and no security as far as job goes. We have contract, no anything.'" George asked me then would I sign the petition the way I felt right now. I said that I would be number one on the ticket.

Bisig denies this version of the conversation in its entirety, and I credit Bisig's denial. Scott testified that Bisig made no statements whatsoever about the significance of the union authorization cards, which I find to be highly improbable because the entire purpose of the meeting was to explain the purpose of authorization cards in the terms set forth by National Sales Manager Bissett. Also, having heard the testimony of Scott, a bold forthright man nearing retirement with the Company, and an old friend of Bisig's, I have no doubt that he would have volunteered his feelings about the Union without any prompting. I find that Scott's memory of the conversation is unlikely. No other salesmen who met in the same timeframe with Bisig came forward to detail their conversations with him.

14. Warner-Robinson's conversation

It is contradicted that on January 12, 1980, former Regional Manager Richard Warner called sales representative Joe Robinson and asked him, "What if anything I knew of the union activities." I find that this question constitutes an unlawful request to Robinson to divulge activities of himself and others.

15. Murrell-Weist's conversation

At National Sales Manager Bissett's instructions, Regional Manager Dave Murrell conversed with sales representative Frederick Weist in mid-January 1980. Weist testified, "I was asked about labor activities going on in the Company and if I knew anything. And I believe at that time, if my memory serves me correctly, I was also asked about any activity I knew of relating to Stan Dash. I responded by saying that I knew very little. Only a few rumors or whatever and I didn't know any specifics."

Murrell denies asking anything specifically about Stan Dash, pointing out that he did not know that Stan Dash was involved in union activities as of the date of the phone call, January 12. Murrell testified that he did not become aware of Dash's involvement in the Union until it was brought to his attention by National Sales Manager Bissett that Dash had filed a charge against the Company. The charge was filed on January 14, 1980. I credit Weist's version of the conversation. Management has just learned of the campaign and undoubtedly Dash's identification with it. The likelihood that Murrell was trying to determine Dash's extent of involvement is overwhelming. Therefore I find that Murrell's conduct in this regard constitutes an illegal interrogation and impression of surveillance in violation of the Act.

The Respondent argues that the question of Weist, "if I knew anything about the labor activities going on in the Company," did not require Weist to disclose his own views or anyone else's on the desirability of a union. I disagree. The question is broad and does solicit any information that Weist might have about the Union. Thus I find that it is in violation of the Act.

16. Carduner's conversations with Hill, Flint, and Murphy

Carduner admitted, while testifying in the proceeding, that the evidence offered by witnesses Hill, Talbot, and Flint, in regard to their conversations, was essentially accurate. There is nothing in the record which would prove the contrary so I find the following recitation of evidence as fact.

a. Hill-Carduner's conversation

On January 15, 1980, sales representative Roland Hill met with his regional manager, Robert Carduner, at which time Hill testified that Carduner asked him such questions as: "[D]id I hear about the attempt to organize and start a union; did I receive a card; what did I know about it and so forth." He also told Hill at the first meeting that President Gosnell would not like a union and that the sales representatives did not need a union. He also told Hill that, if the Union came in, sales representatives would lose their pension plan, approximately half of the sales force would be fired, the sales representatives would be given a car and put on a salary, and the sales representatives would not be doing as well as they are doing now. Carduner indicated to Hill that his income would suffer if the Union got in. Approximately 10 days later, in another conversation between the two men, Carduner repeated the questions to Hill and mentioned to Hill that Stan Dash was one of the leaders who was trying to organize the sales representatives. At another meeting between the two men on February 20, 1980, Carduner interrogated Hill, sales representative Gary Talbot, and special account representative (SAR), Theresa Gintilly, asking what they knew about the Union and had they received a card. He stated that, though they had problems with their commission growth plan, they were better off; if a problem existed, it could be solved by themselves within the region. At the February 20 meeting, Carduner also stated to the employees present that management was contemplating some changes in the commission on a set of books, raising the commission from 10 to 15 percent. He also said that quotes would be lowered for the year 1980. Additionally, he mentioned the names of Irv Kensler and David Mann as people the Company thought might be in the Union.

At yet another meeting on March 4, 1980, between Carduner, Hill, SAR Gintilly, and SAR Bob Taylor, Carduner repeated many of the things he had said before.

b. Carduner-Talbot's conversations

In mid-January 1980, sales representative Greg Talbot testified that his regional manager, Robert Carduner, called him on the telephone, asking him point blank, "What do you know about a union?" Carduner then asked Talbot if he received anything in the mail and did he know anyone who had received anything? Talbot also confirmed his presence at the meeting with Carduner, Hill, and Gintilly.

c. Flint-Carduner's conversations

Ralph Flint, a sales representative, met in mid-January at Hauppauge, New York, with his regional manager, Carduner. At this meeting, which was also attended by two other sales representatives and one of their wives, Carduner inquired about what the sales representatives felt about unions. Sales representative Anton Murphy also testified that he had attended this meeting and verified Flint's version of it.

As noted above, in response to a question while testifying in this proceeding, Carduner admitted that the testimony of the witnesses noted above was essentially correct. Therefore, I find that the General Counsel has proven the allegations in the complaint relating to Carduner and thus the Respondent has unlawfully interrogated its employees with regard to their union sympathies and activities, created the impression of surveillance, promised benefits in order to influence the outcome of the election, threatened worse working conditions if the Union were voted in, and coercively attempted to discourage support for the Union.

17. The discharge of Stanley Dash

LCP hired Dash in 1971 as a sales representative for northern Illinois. At a later point he transferred to a territory in southern Wisconsin, where he worked until his termination. During most of the period relevant to the allegations in the complaint, Dash's regional manager was David Murrell. Effective September 22, 1980, Dash was assigned to Robert Tuttle, although his territory did not change.

As noted previously, Dash was the prime mover behind the Union's organizing drive. Following the initiation of organizing activities by Dash, but before LCP became aware of the campaign, Dash returned his Christmas bonus check to LCP's home office. In November, Dash had read in one of the Company's in-house publications the Company's formula for giving Christmas bonuses to its employees. Apparently, home office and salaried employees received a bonus far in excess of the Company's sales representatives. Because Dash considered this to be unfair, he returned his bonus check as a protest. Another sales representative in Dash's territory, Peter O'Donnell likewise returned his check at Dash's request.

After this action by Dash, and following several argumentative telephone conversations between Dash and customer service correspondents in the home office, Murrell met with Dash on January 9, 1980, to explain the Company's position with respect to the Christmas bonus, to deliver Dash's sales forecast for 1980, and to discuss Dash's attitude relative to his customers and home office personnel. This meeting was the subject of an unfair labor practice charge filed by Dash on January 14, 1980.

At the January 9, 1980 meeting between Murrell and Dash, Dash was threatened with being placed on probation. It is the General Counsel's contention that the threat of probation was made because of Dash's concerted activity in retuning his bonus check. In this regard I disagree with the General Counsel. At the meeting, the matter of the Christmas bonus check was discussed, Dash's 1980 forecast was discussed, two complaints from customers about Dash's attitude[2] and some recent incidents in the fall of 1979 when Dash was involved in arguments over the telephone with the Company's service correspondents. Based on all of the testimony with respect to this meeting, I do not believe Dash's actions in returning the Christmas bonus check to the Company was a moving reason for the Company's threat of probation. At the time of the meeting, company correspondence indicated that mangement thought that Dash's actions were merely the result of a misunderstanding and not part of any organizational effort on behalf of the Union or any concerted activity on the part of Dash for his fellow employees. Nor can I consider customer complaints the reason for the threat because these had occurred at a time prior to the time when Dash was called to the Company's home office for an interview for a promotion to a regional manager's position. If LCP considered the two customer complaints serious enough, to result in probation, it surely would have disciplined Dash for these incidents before seriously considering him for a promotion. I do believe the Company's position that the probation was predicated upon Dash's arguments with the service correspondents at the home office. The Company had for some time been trying to improve its relationship between the sales representatives and the service correspondents. I believe this is a legitimate business function and would form a proper basis for disciplinary action.

Following the filing of the charge with the Board after the January 9 meeting, the probation of Dash was dropped.

The General Counsel also contends that the increase in Dash's 1980 sales quota constitutes harassment of Dash and consequently is an 8(a)(1) violation of the Act. Again I disagree. The Company's formulation of sales forecasts begins about midway through a preceeding year. The sales representatives prepare their recommendations for their personal forecast and this recommendation is forwarded through channels to the home office. Thereafter, the Company, through a complicated series of reviews and sales estimates, arrives at an overall company forecast for the following year and then breaks it down to individual sales representative forecasts. This process continues throughout the entire fall of the year preceding the year for which the forecast is made. Based on the evidence, I find that Dash's forecast was prepared finally in December 1979, before the Company had any knowledge of the Union's organizing campaign or Dash's part in it.

The General Counsel contends that Dash's forecast was increased whereas most sales representatives' forecasts were decreased in the year 1980. Thus, the General Counsel contends that Dash has been singled out for disparate treatment vis-a-vis the other sales representatives in the Company. This position is not borne out by record evidence. Although the majority of sales representatives in the Company did receive lower forecasts for the year 1980 than they had for the preceding year, a substantial number of sales representatives were increased for the year as was Dash's. Moreover, Dash's increase brought his overall forecast in line with his actual performance in the preceding year. Given the fact that the General Counsel has failed to prove that the Company had knowledge of the Union's organizing drive or Dash's relationship to it at any time prior to presentation of the sales forecast to Dash, I find that the General Counsel has failed to make a prima facie showing that the increase in his forecast violated the Act. Additionally, the General Counsel has failed to show that Dash was singled out in the matter of forecast increase.

About January 9, 1980, the Company became aware of the Union's organizing campaign and Dash's leadership position. Following the defeat of the Union in a Board-sponsored representation election, Dash, claiming a disability caused by "gross stress reaction," went on a leave of absence from May 27 to September 22, 1980. It is fair to say from the evidence that the union campaign took its toll on Dash's stamina. About May 23, 1980, Dash decided to take a leave of absence. Contrary to company procedures, he did not immediately contact his regional manager informing him of this decision. Dash contends that he did notify National Sales Manager Bissett by company telegram on May 25. LCP never received this telegram and maintains that Dash fabricated it after the fact. Regardless of whether Dash did or did not fabricate the telegram, I believe that the Company did not receive the telegram and thus for a few days was unaware of Dash's whereabouts. Dash contends that he also attempted to call his regional manager by telephone the weekend of May 24 and 25, but was unable to reach him. Early the following week, either by a call from Murrell to Dash's fiancee or vice versa, the Company learned that he intended to take off 30 days at the advice of his doctor and would be out of touch. Dash did not contact Murrell directly during this period of time though it is unclear whether or not he actually tried.

On May 30, Bissett sent a telegram to Dash threatening him with discharge if he did not contact the home office within 4 days. On receipt of this telegram, Dash did contact the office and the matter of discharge was dropped. The General Counsel contends that the telegram is evidence of the Company's intention to harass Dash and constitutes harassment to the extent that it is a separate violation of Section 8(a)(1). I disagree. Had Dash cleared his intention to take a leave of absence with his regional manager, the telegram would not have been sent. Had it been sent after notice by Dash to the regional manager, I would agree with the General Counsel. It would have constituted treatment shown on the record to be different than that given to other employees taking leaves of absences. However, in all other cases where employees have taken leaves of absences for health-related reasons, notification was given to the regional manager or to the Company or to both prior to the employee taking leave. I do find, however, that the harshness of the penalty threatened, i.e., termination, is indicative of the Company's strongly adverse attitudes toward Dash. Other evidence strongly points to the existence of this attitude and will be discussed hereafter.

Because of the Company's telegram threatening termination, Dash secured the services of a private attorney. Thereafter, the Company's reaction to his attempt to return to work, as well as the processing of his claim for disability insurance, took on all the aspects of an adversary procedure. Shortly after June 3, 1980, a conversation was held between Dash's attorney and an attorney for the Company. In this conversation, LCP was informed that Dash's doctor considered him too ill to travel to Rochester and that he was expected to be absent from work for a period of 30 to 60 days. In response to this information, LCP Personnel Manager Roger Roth wrote Dash on June 9, 1980, placing him on disability status and enclosing for Dash a disability claim form. Thereafter, the Company received a letter dated June 6 from Dash's attorney enclosing a letter from Dash's psychologist. The psychologist indicated that it was his opinion that Dash should take a leave of absence or a vacation.

The Company contends that the wording of the doctor's letter raised its suspicions about the nature of Dash's disability and, thereafter, on June 12, 1980, Roth sent a memo to the salary section of the Company directing a discontinuation of draw and disability benefits for Dash. Roth contends that discontinuation of draw is routine for a sales representative who is not working and that no disability benefits were authorized because Dash's entitlement was not clear from the material that LCP had available to it. Roth's supervisor testified that, when there is doubt of the fact of disability, LCP does not begin paying benefits without an investigation and determination by its insurance carrier.

Roth further testified that he called Dash on June 20, asking him of the whereabouts of the claim form that had been sent to him. Dash informed Roth that the form was with his attorney and, thereafter, Roth asked an LCP attorney to inquire of Dash's attorney regarding the form. This attorney did so on June 27. On June 30, Dash's attorney returned the completed claim form on which Dash's psychologist confirmed an apparent total disability because of "gross stress reaction." Dash's attorney's letter accompanying the form, however, stated as follows:

> You have requested that Mr. Dash complete and submit this form. His cooperation in doing this should not be construed as any admission on his part that he is "ill" or "disabled" within the meaning of these programs or for any other purposes.

This apparent contradiction between the lawyer's position and that of the doctor does support the Company's contention that it was unclear as to whether Dash was ill or not. The Company also contends that it was receiving evidence that Dash was processing certain of his sales accounts during this period and thus believed that he might be working.

On July 15, 1980, Roth sent a letter to Dash's attorney explaining that, under the circumstances, Dash could not be considered as being on disability leave, but that he would be placed on inactive status with continuation of benefits until ambiguity created by Dash in his attorney's letter could be clarified. This prompted a response from Dash's attorney which, in part, stated:

> At present, Mr. Dash is unable to determine whether he is ill or disabled within the meaning of the Company insurance policy . . . .

The letter also requested a copy of the "Company's insurance policy."

Roth replied on July 30 that, because of the uncertainty created by Dash's attorney, Dash was being continued on inactive status pending clarification of his medical condition. He further informed the attorney that Dash's insurance form had been forwarded to the disability carrier for processing. Roth also included a copy of the Company's personnel policy outlining its "26-week income continuation plan." The plan included explanations of the Company's insurance carrier, disability coverage, workers compensation coverage, and supplemental disability coverage.

Dash's claim for disability benefits was rejected by the disabilty insurance carrier on July 31, 1980. It was rejected on the basis that Dash's physician considered the disability to be work related. The Company indicated that if Dash's physician changed his position on the work-relatedness of the disability then it would reconsider its denial. Following this rejection, the Company submitted Dash's claim some months later on the basis that the claim was not work related. Thereafter, the claim was again submitted to the disability insurance carrier which paid Dash benefits with company benefits called for under its personnel guidelines.

The General Counsel contends that the delay in the handling of the claim, as well as LCP's refusal to send the Company's master insurance plan to Dash's attorney, constitutes harassment in violation of Section 8(a)(1). The Company's actions in this regard in and of themselves did not constitute a violation of the Act. There was nothing done by the Company during this period that was either contrary to its policy or that could not be construed as a misunderstanding because of the communications between it and Dash's attorney. The adversary relationship, which began with the introduction of an attorney on behalf of Dash, created problems in the handling of the disability claims. With respect to the issue of the insurance policy, the Company's procedure is not to make available a policy to any employee other than top management. It did supply Dash and his attorney with a copy of the information which it normally made available to its employees. I cannot find that the actions of the Company in either of these regards violated the Act. However, as with the telegram, the overall tenor of the Company's actions support the view that the Company considered Dash to be different than other employees and in an adverse relationship with management.

In Dash's attorney's letter of August 12, 1980, requesting a copy of the Company's insurance policy, he informed the Company that Dash had been approved to return to work by his doctor. By letter dated August 15, 1980, Roth stated that the Respondent wanted Dash to come to Rochester to be examined by a doctor chosen by LCP. The record reflects that this was the first time that an employee on disability was not allowed to return to work on approval of his or own physician. Dash submitted to the doctor's examination. On September 9, the Company's doctor gave Dash permission to return to work and saw no reason why Dash could not continue to work with his regional manager.

The Company contends that Dash's disability was so unique that it required it to deviate from its normal practice and require a private examination by a doctor of its choosing. In support of this position, it relies on the fact that Dash had had psychiatric problems many years earlier and his two prior incidents with customers, the Monson and Koslov incidents. At this point, I disagree with the Company's position. As noted previously, the Company, in 1979, had Dash come to Rochester to be interviewed for a job as a regional manager. Clearly at that time the Company was not concerned with either Dash's previous brief health problems or the customer complaint incidents. During the summer of 1980, the period in which Dash was disabled, he had had some customer contracts and this fact was known at the Company. As the Company had had no complaints from its customers about Dash's behavior after the Koslov and Monson incidents to the point at which it ordered him to cease seeing customers, I do not believe it had any reasonable basis to require a unique examination.

Based on all of the evidence of its treatment of other disabled employees, including a current regional manager who had had a leave of absence because of alcoholic exhaustion problems, I find that the Company's unique requirement that Dash be separately examined by a company physician constitutes disparate and discriminatory treatment and is indicative of its adverse attitude toward Dash. The psychologist who interviewed Dash on the Company's behalf completely cleared him of any problems and issued a fairly impressive report about the state of Dash's condition. This report undermines LCP's contention that it had legitimate concern for Dash's ability to perform his job.

Dash was ordered to return to work on September 22 and was told to report to a different regional manager. Dash's territory, however, was not changed. The General Counsel contends that the switch in regional managers also constitutes harassment of Dash. On this point I cannot agree. Had the company decided to change Dash's territory, his customers, or any other normal day-to-day aspect of his employment which would have increased its difficulty or hurt his income, I would agree. However, the Company had a policy of changing managers from one territory to another and, further, the manager transferred to Dash's region was one with whom he had a good working relationship in the past.

The next and most important occurrence with respect to Dash's employment with LCP is his discharge.

On November 4, Dash telephoned LCP's customer service department to resolve a problem with a customer order and got into an argument with Patrina Fulton, a correspondent. Both she and Dash raised their voices at each other and eventually hung up. Fulton then went to her immediate superior, Mike Santagelo, and reported the argument, bursting into tears, and telling Santangelo that Dash screamed at her, twisted her words, tried to back her into a corner, and was incooperative. The Company does not contend that the argument with Fulton was serious enough to justify Dash's discharge. However, Santangelo then called Dash to determine what was going on. It was a fairly standard practice for Santangelo to call after one of his correspondents had an argument with a sales representative. Almost immediately after reaching Dash, Santangelo and Dash were in an argument. It is Santangelo's version of this argument that Dash immediately started swearing at him over the phone telling him that he did not have to talk to him or do whatever Santangelo said. Dash, on the other hand, testified that Santangelo threatened him almost immediately with at least slowing down the process of his orders, if not rejecting them outright, which threat caused him to react strongly. The sequence of the argument is considered somewhat important by the General Counsel and the Respondent. The General Counsel contends that the threat came before any swearing by Dash and that Dash's swearing was, under the circumstances, justified. The Respondent's witness contends the swearing came first and the threat was not made seriously but merely to calm down Dash.[3] In either case, the conversation upset both men seriously. Dash immediately prepared a telegram to his superiors complaining of the argument, and Santangelo immediately went directly to Dash's superior, Bissett, bypassing his own superior and head of the customer service department. As soon as Dash's name was mentioned by Santangelo, Bissett stopped him from speaking until Roth (from personnel) could be brought in to hear what he had to say.

Santangelo then explained his version of what had happened over the telephone to Roth and Bissett, leaving out any mention of a threat made by him to Dash. With no discussion, Roth and Bissett decided to terminate Dash. Shortly thereafter, when Dash attempted to contact Bissett and explain his side of the story, Bissett refused to listen.

Following his termination and the filing of a charge with the Board, Dash applied for unemployment compensation benefits. The Respondent contested this filing and, when it lost before the involved Wisconsin State Agency, it waited until the last day to appeal the decision. LCP lost the appeal with the agency and then sued the State of Wisconsin and Dash in Wisconsin's state courts. The appeal was pending as of the time of hearing.

There is no question in my mind but that Dash was terminated by LCP because of his union activities. The record reflects that Dash was an excellent salesman for the Company and was not shown to have presented any problems to the Company that were not common to the sales force generally. As I have noted elsewhere, following the union election in May, virtually every contact the Company had with Dash was one of overreaction. The threat of termination after Dash was missing for a few days in late May, the handling of the disability claim, the unique examination by a company-picked physician before Dash could return to work, the reaction of Santangelo in going directly to Bissett, rather than through channels, with his complaint about Dash, Bissett's immediate decision to terminate Dash without further investigation, and the immediate concurrence he received from his superior, Anderson, the vice president of personnel, Bennett, and Personnel Manager Roth, all indicate that Dash had been singled out for harassment and for ultimate discharge.

Santangelo's action on the day of discharge struck me as unusual at the time of hearing and still does at this date. The record reflects that there is nothing particularly unusual about sales representatives becoming angry with customer service representatives. There was nothing unusual shown about occasional cursing taking place during conversations between customer service representatives and sales representatives. Though Santangelo may have been upset at the conversation with Dash and had a valid reason to file a complaint through channels, there is nothing so unusual about the conversation that would require him to race to the national sales manager's office to tell him about it. Likewise, there is nothing so unusual about the conversation that would require Bissett to discharge Dash, without even inquiring of Dash as to either the truthfulness of Santangelo's story or Dash's version of it. I believe that LCP was looking for a reason to get rid of Dash and had been looking for a reason for sometime; utilizing its own psychiatrist to examine Dash before it would allow him to return to work is consistent with this belief.

I find that LCP's discharge of Dash was made by it because of its desire to rid itself of a union activist and to discourage future union activity on the part of its employees. LCP's appeal of Dash's unemployment compensation claim with the State of Wisconsin, which was marked by dilatory tactics, constitutes further harassment of Dash and, though legal, was certainly unnecessary in all the circumstances.

LCP's appeal of Dash's unemployment compensation claim with the State of Wisconsin constitutes further harassment of Dash and I find it to be unlawfully motivated as was his discharge and the Company's other harassment of him. The appeal has been marked by dilatory tactics, by lack of serious effort to prosecute its defense (other than to drag out the appeal), and by actions taken that differ from previous appeals of unemployment compensation awards to discharged employees. For example, though it was in possession of evidence in the form of affidavits relating to Dash's discharge, and it, of course, had available witnesses to the incidents surrounding the discharge, it chose not to present either to the Wisconsin agency. The record reflects, in another instance when an employee named Deborah Davis was terminated, LCP sent both its attorney and national sales manager to the State of New York to contest the unemployment compensation. I conclude that the Respondent's only purpose in pursuing the appeal was to further harass Dash.

I have found that Dash's discharge was unlawfully motivated in violation of the Act. I similarly find that its appeal of Dash's award of unemployment compensation benefits resulting from his termination is likewise discriminatorily and unlawfully motivated and constitutes a separate violation of the Act. In order to dissipate the effect of LCP's filing of its appeal, I find and recommend that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from prosecuting the appeal and to withdraw it. I further find that the Respondent, in order to restore Dash to the position he would have been in absent the Respondent's action, I shall recommend that the Respondent be ordered to make Dash whole for all legal expenses he has incurred as a result of the Respondent's appeal of his award of unemployment compensation benefits. See United Credit Bureau of America, 242 NLRB 921 (1979), enfd. 643 F.2d 1017 (4th Cir. 1981).

The General Counsel contends that Dash's discharge and other harassment by LCP not only violates Section 8(a)(1) and (3), which I find to be correct, but also Section 8(a)(4) of the Act. I can find no evidence of the record which would indicate that Dash was discharged because of the filing of his unfair labor practice charges with the Board. It may well be that this filing did play a part in the decision, but there is no clear evidence to underlie a finding of an 8(a)(4) violation.

18. Discharge of Irving Kensler

Kensler began work for LCP in 1965 as a sales representative. In 1971 he was promoted to regional manager and in 1975 he joined the LCP headquarters as sales administrator and training coordinator. Later that year, he was promoted to national sales manager.

In April 1979, Kensler requested that he be relieved of his sales manager's duties and that he be reassigned to an open sales territory in Florida. LCP honored that request, giving Kensler full relocation allowance and continuing his sales manager's salary for 4 months. Within 3 months, Kensler requested further consideration for management opportunities. By mid-1979 he also requested a transfer to a sales territory in New York City. These requests were denied and Kensler continued work as a commission sales representative in Florida. In August 1980, Kensler was discharged.

After his discharge, in November 1980, Kensler filed a charge under the Florida discrimination statutes claiming he was discharged because of his age. Following an adverse decision in that proceeding, on February 20, 1981, Kensler filed his present charge with the Board.

I cannot find from the evidence that Kensler was discharged because of his activities on behalf of the union organizing drive or for any concerted actvity protected under the Act. Kensler was one of the initial persons contacted by Dash and he participated in the initial organizing meetings by conference call. He donated $100 to the organizing drive. However, there is no showing in this record that these facts were ever made known to LCP management. Thereafter, virtually every action Kensler took was one which would indicate antiunion bias and an active stance in support of the Company's antiunion drive. Kensler claims Bissett informed him that the Company was going to get him because of union activity and Carduner contends that Bissett told him to stay away from Kensler because of Kensler's union activity. I cannot credit either of these allegations in light of the objective facts of record and Bissett's denial that these conversations ever took place.

First, there is no showing in this record that other than the very first actions at the outset of the Union's organizing campaign Kensler ever did anything that would indicate his involvement on behalf of the Union. Virtually every action he took which would have come to the attention of management was antiunion. Perhaps the most telling action taken by Kensler, which refutes his own testimony, as well as that of Carduner, is the meeting that Kensler had with fellow salesman Dave Mann, President Gosnell, and the Company's financial officer, Seymour Fogel. The details of this meeting are discussed elsewhere in this decision. As noted at that point, the substance of the discussion at this meeting varies; however, both sides agree that the purpose of the meeting was to determine how to pacify the sales force and to defeat the Union's organizing campaign. I also find that Kensler indicated his willingness and desire to return to management to help solve the Company's problems with its sales force. I find that there is no clear evidence that the Company had actual knowledge of Kensler's feelings about the Union and, after a review of the evidence, I cannot be sure, even at this juncture, what Kensler's views were vis-a-vis the Union. I find that one must infer from the record why he was discharged. A number of inferences are possible. Of course, one could infer that the reasons Kensler was discharged were the ones given by the Company.

The Company's primary contention is that he was discharged because he released what it considers confidential information about the Company's plans to release a new series of law books prior to public disclosure and announced that a split in sales territories would take place in North Carolina when and if LCP received a contract from the North Carolina state government to print its state code. I find two problems with this defense. First, it appears from the evidence that Kensler made his predictions about the split in the North Carolina sales territories while he was national sales manager many years before his dishcarge. Second, the information Kensler was supposed to have released about the upcoming publication of the new series of books was apparently common knowledge in the industry because of past LCP practices. Moreover, there is no direct evidence that Kensler actually ever voiced this information. Kensler denies doing so and no person to whom he was supposed to have made these statements was brought by the Company as a witness, although these persons were other salesmen for the Company.

The secondary reason given by the Company for Kensler's discharge, and one denied as a contributing reason by Bissett, the person who discharged Kensler, was Kensler's lack of success in sales after his move to Florida. The figures with respect to Kensler's sales do show that his sales were not up to par in the territory. There was also some friction evident between Kensler and his regional manager, George Snyder. However, the figures show that Kensler had acknowledged to Snyder that his sales were not up to par and that he wanted until October 1980 to reach quota or he would voluntarily retire from the Company. Given the fact that Kensler's sales were not anywhere near the worst in the Company and not nearly as bad as a number of salesmen who are still employed by LCP and, given Kensler's rather spectacular career with LCP, I find it difficult to credit the Company that it would discharge him for not making his quota in August when he had voluntarily offered to retire in October if he did not do so.

In my opinion, the evidence does not support a finding that Kensler was discharged for either of the reasons given by the Company.

One could infer that the Company did have some knowledge, unproven in the record, about Kensler's early involvement in the organizing campaign. One could also infer that current management of the Company, including Bissett and Anderson, for their own reasons, wanted to get rid of Kensler because of his desire to return to management and his support among the salesmen of LCP. However, regardless of which inference may be slightly more likely than the other, I find that there is no clear proof that Kensler was discharged because of any prounion or protected activity and that the General Counsel has failed to meet his burden of showing that Kensler's discharge was motivated by union animus or because Kensler engaged in protected concerted activity. Accordingly, I will recommend that the complaint in this regard be dismissed. See E. R. Carpenter Co., 260 NLRB 91 (1982).

19. Discharge of Robert Carduner

Robert Carduner was a regional manager for the Respondent and was a supervisor with the meaning of the statute. Several of the alleged unfair labor practices in this proceeding involve actions taken by Carduner during the course of the union campaign. Following the campaign and the filing of unfair labor practice charges involving him, in preparation for trial on the issues, Carduner was ordered to the Company's headquarters at Rochester for a meeting with the Company's attorneys. Following the meeting between the Company's attorneys and Carduner, which will be discussed in detail below, Gosnell, Company attorney Ulterino, Anderson, and Bennett determined to discharge Carduner. Subsequently, after the Company's national sales meeting approximately a month later, Carduner was discharged with Bissett informing Carduner of the decision. Bissett, one of Carduner's closest friends, was not informed of the early decision to discharge him until after the national sales meeting so as not to impair the performance of Bissett at that meeting. The reasons given by the Respondent for Carduner's discharge was the likelihood of his failure to follow company instructions in the course of the union organizing campaign and thus the likelihood that he actually did commit certain unfair labor practices, his uncooperative attitude at the meeting with the Compnay's attorneys prior to trial in Case 30–CA–5603, and problems with respect to Carduner's managerial abilities within his region.

Carduner was admittedly against the union campaign from its inception. The Respondent cannot be accused of discharging Carduner because of any prounion activity. Thus, as he was not caught up in the campaign, the only protection afforded Carduner under the Act is if his discharge was calculated to thwart the Board's processes, i.e., being discouraged by the Respondent from testifying truthfully in Case 30–CA–5603. Regardless of whose version of the meeting between the Respondent's attorneys and Carduner in Rochester one accepts, I find that it is clear that Carduner was not responsive and cooperative with the attorneys at that meeting. Lack of cooperation with the Company's attorneys in preparation for their case is clearly a lawful reason for his discharged by the Company if it chooses to do so. The evidence reveals that at the meeting Carduner, either purposely or otherwise, was unable to supply any details with respect to the portions of the involved complaint directed to him. He was unable to tell the Company's lawyers whether or not these allegations were true or untrue. There are hints in this record, alluded to in the General Counsel's brief, that there may have been an attempt on the part of the Respondent to encourage perjury by Carduner and thereby undermine the integrity of the upcoming Board hearing. However, there is no allegation in the complaint in this regard and I can find no proof that any attempt to influence Carduner to testify untruthfully was made by the Respondent or its attorneys.

After the meeting with the Company's attorneys, the Respondent's officials and attorneys determined to settle the issues in Case 30–CA–5603 in a settlement entered into with the involved Region. For reasons other than those relating to Carduner, this settlement has been set aside.[4] Given the extremely limited scope of protection afforded by the Act to supervisory personnel, I cannot find that the Respondent has violated the Act by discharging Carduner for his failure to cooperate in preparation for trial absent a clear showing that an attempt was made by the Company to encourage him to testify untruthfully. There is no such showing in this record, and I find that the Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act by its discharge of Carduner and recommend that the complaint in this regard be dismissed.

20. Discharge of Richard Warner

Richard Warner was hired by LCP as a sales representative in January 1971. During his early career with the Company, Warner was a leading salesman. In 1975 he became regional manager of the Company's region 38, where he also performed in an excellent manner. In early 1979, he was transferred to region 63 as a regional manager. Region 63 was a problem region for the Company from the standpoint of sales and continued to remain a problem for the Company during the time in which Warner was its regional manager and thereafter a problem. The General Counsel asserts that Warner was terminated by the Company in May 1980 because of his association with Kensler as part of the Campany's alleged campaign to rid itself of those shown to be involved in the campaign and to impress upon the remaining employees the Company's union animus. It is clear that Warner was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

In defense of the allegations made by the General Counsel, the Company has a number of defenses, all having merit. First, the Company raises a Section 10(b) defense as Warner's discharge occurred on May 22, 1980, and the only charges to which allegations concerning Warner can be tied are those filed by Dash. As no charges were timely filed by Warner, allegations concerning Warner must be "closely related" to those filed by Dash. Although I have found the Company committed an unfair labor practice in its termination of Dash for his union activity, I cannot find that the Company's action with respect to Dash is closely related to its action with respect to Warner. First, Warner was clearly opposed to the Union and cooperated fully with the Company's campaign to defeat the Union's organizing campaign. The General Counsel strongly suggests that Warner was discharged because of his close ties to Kensler who he alleges was discharged because of his union activities. As I have previously found, that the Company did not have knowledge of Kensler's activities on behalf of the Union or know that Kensler was actually in support of the Union, I likewise cannot find that the discharge of Warner, because of the close relationship with Kensler, was based in any part on the Company's union animus. As Warner was admittedly a supervisor, he is not afforded protection of the Act except in limited circumstances. There is no allegation that Warner was discharged because of prospective testimony before the Board or discharged in any manner to thwart any of the Board's processes. The General Counsel asserted, through testimony given by Carduner, that Warner was to be discharged because the Company believed that he was a pipeline of company information to Kensler. Perceived disloyalty by a supervisor to management is a legitmate ground for discharge of a supervisor.

Additionally, the Company introduced credible evidence that it was dissatisfied with Warner's performance as a regional manager in region 63. General Sales Manager Bissett was dissatisfied with the performance and held several meetings with Warner to seek to improve his performance. While the General Counsel will admit that Warner's performance within the Region was not adequate to meet the Company's expectations, he defends his performance by pointing that other managers within the same Region had not performed well and were still employed by the Company and that other managers throughout the Company's system performing similarly were not discharged. There are differences, however, in the evidence in Warner's performance and that of some other regional managers whose performances were was not up to company standards. Warner had been given warnings in November 1979 prior to the beginning of any organizing campaign that he was not spending enough time with his sales representatives. He was given at that time and over the next several months several specific instructions by Bissett designed to improve the region's performance. Many of these he failed to carry out. Bissett's efforts to improve the region's performance culminated in a letter written to Warner in May 1980 requesting Warner to give Bissett a detailed report on what steps Warner intended to take to improve the region's performance. The report submitted by Warner was introduced into evidence is but a cursory response to the request from Bissett. Bissett then terminated him. I credit Bissett's assertion that the decision to discharge Warner was motivated by genuine business concerns. Therefore, I cannot find that the Company's action in regard to terminating Warner violates that Act in any regard.

21. Discharge of Hubert Redd

From November 1978 until October 1980, Redd was an LCP sales representative for parts of Georgia and South Carolina, under Regional Manager John Carroll. The General Counsel urges that Redd was discharged in October 1980, because of his known prounion sentiments. In this regard, the General Counsel produced evidence that Redd had indicated on more than one occasion to fellow sales representatives that he was in favor of the Union, that the Company had knowledge of his signing of the union authorization card, that he had expressed his prounion sentiments to his regional manager, Carroll, and that, at an information meeting conducted by President Gosnell, Redd asked a number of questions which would indicate prounion sympathies.

[4] The Respondent at the hearing and on brief urges its motion to dismiss this allegation because the Regional Director abused his discretion in setting aside this settlement. The motion was denied by order of Associate Chief Administrative Law Judge John M. Dyer dated June 23, 1981. I concur with Judge Dyer's ruling.

In defense of its action, the Respondent denies having any knowledge of Redd's union sympathies, raises a Section 10(b) defense as no charge had ever been filed by Redd against the Respondent as of the hearing, and pointed out that it had legitimate business reasons for discharging Redd relating to his personality and performance. There is no clear showing that Redd's union sympathies were known to the Company or played any part in the Company's decision to terminate him. The closest showing made by the General Counsel in this regard is that the Company knew that Redd gave an affidavit to a Board agent, in anticipation of this testimony before the Board, in a hearing resulting from the original charges filed by Dash. However, it was shown that a number of company representatives gave affidavits to the Board with regard to that complaint and that it was known to the Company that Redd did not desire to testify in the proceeding. There has been no discipline by the Company of any of the other employees who gave affidavits to the Board.

I also find that, contrary to the General Counsel's contentions, Redd was not a model employee of the Company and that it did in fact have legitimate reasons for discharging him which were not pretextual. From the outset of his employment, Redd had problems with LCP. During his initial sales training, in Rochester, New York, Redd overcharged the Company for expenses. Later, ostensibly to complete a house move, Redd took off 2 weeks after telling his supervisor that he would only be gone over a long weekend. According to credible testimony given by Redd's supervisor, Carroll, Redd's sales techniques were not satisfactory. He was disparaging of other company's products in front of customers and when he could not deal with the customer he would not call on him again. Carroll also credibly related problems relating to Redd's willingness to give customer service or aid in making collections.

Perhaps more importantly, it is clear that Redd had problems in dealing with his regional manager, Carroll. On one occasion, because of a mixup in communication, Carroll and Redd engaged in an oral confrontation, for which Carroll later apologized. It appears from the evidence, that at least thereafter, the relationship between Carroll and Redd was strained on several occasions. Carroll suggested to Bissett that Redd be disciplined or terminated. A number of times, the incident which resulted in Redd's termination took place at the Company's annual sales meeting in New Orleans, Louisiana, in October 1980. There, in a public restaurant, after becoming intoxicated, Redd told Bissett that he could not work for Carroll and that Carroll was a "son-of-a-bitch." Upon being apprised of this conversation by Bissett, Carroll requested that Redd be terminated as he did not believe that he could motivate Redd nor work with him further. Bissett complied. I find that this discharge was not motivated by union animus or any activities by Redd on behalf of the Union.

22. Discipline of David Outlaw

Outlaw was a 3-year sales representative with LCP who was placed on probation in March 1980 by the Company for failure to properly submit required reports. It is admitted by all parties that prior to his suspension Outlaw consistently failed to submit adequate reports of calls on prospective customers and was warned repeatedly during his tenure of employment about this problem.

Outlaw was a supporter of the Union's organizing campaign and was its treasurer. It was his testimony that he informed his supervisor in the course of the campaign that he was a union supporter. Although his regional manager, Carroll, denies the conversation, in completing the sociogram on Outlaw, Carroll indicated that he believed that Outlaw was in support of the Union.

The Company had a legitimate interest in seeking better compliance with its reporting requirements by Outlaw; however, a question is left as to whether the timing of the probation given Outlaw was primarily the result of union animus and whether the severity of the punishment, i.e., 6 months' probation, was a result of a legitimate desire to improve his performance or motivated by union animus.

Between September 1978 and February 1979, Kensler, who was then LCP's national sales manager, sent a number of letters to Outlaw's then regional manager, Carroll, in which he stated that Outlaw was not submitting his reports. Kensler further stated that such failure was intolerable and could be grounds for Outlaw's termination. Kensler demanded that Outlaw bring the reports up to date. In November and December 1978, Carroll sent memoranda to Outlaw directing him to bring his reports up to par or he would be terminated. Carroll was replaced as Outlaw's regional manager in June 1979 by Bissett, who again informed Outlaw of the reporting requirements. However, in August 1979, Outlaw submitted call reports for only 10 of 25 reportable days. Bissett was shortly replaced as Outlaw's supervisor by Carroll who had been on a leave of absence. Carroll again warned Outlaw of the need to properly submit call reports. In October and November 1979, Carroll again warned Outlaw about his failure to properly complete such reports. In February 1980, Carroll had a compilation made of the call reports of his sales representatives for the month of January. He learned that Outlaw had reported only 18 interviews with prospective customers for the entire month of January and had made no reports for the week of January 20 to 26. Carroll then sent Outlaw a memorandum admonishing him for his poor performance and in March, when he next met with Outlaw, placed him on 6 months' probation. LCP demonstrated a positive correlation between the submission of sales call reports and performance. Outlaw's sales performance was not outstanding, and I find the Company had a legitimate reason for requiring him to submit call reports in an adequate manner. Because of the repeated warnings given to Outlaw during the entire tenure of his employment with LCP, I find that the Company did not violate the Act by its action in placing David Outlaw on probation for 6 months and would recommend that the complaint in this regard be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is and has been at all times material herein an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Office and Professional Employees International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC is and has been at all times material herein a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By giving notice of improvements in its pension plan during the course of the union campaign, the Respondent has offered its employees benefits in an attempt to influence the outcome of the election in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The Respondent, by its letter from its president to its employees concerning the campaign and the Union, has threatened its employees with harsher working conditions and the possibility of permanent replacement in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. The Respondent, by the actions of its president in a meeting with sales representatives in Washington directed them to discourage fellow employees from their support of the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. The Respondent, by the actions of its regional managers in meetings with individual sales representatives in January 1980, has interrogated its employees with regard to thier union sympathies, solicited withdrawal of authorization cards, given the impression of surveillance, threatened its employees, and impliedly offered benefits and improved working conditions to influence the outcome of the election in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. By requiring Stanley Dash to be examined by a doctor of the Respondent's choosing before he could return to work from a health-related leave of absence, by discharging him on November 4, 1980, because of his activities in support of the Union, and by its appeal of his award of unemployment compensation benefits, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

9. The Respondent has not engaged in other unfair labor practices as discussed above.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order the Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I recommend that the Respondent, having discriminatorily discharged Stanley Dash for engaging in union activity, be required to offer him immediate and full reinstatement to his former position, without prejudice to whatever seniority and other rights and privileges he would have enjoyed had the Respondent not discriminated against him, dismissing, if necessary to make a position available for him, any employee hired to a position he would have held but for such discrimination and shall make him whole for any loss he may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against him. All backpay due under the terms of this Order shall be computed, with interest, in the manner described in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1960), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). The Respondent shall expunge from its personnel files, or other records, any reference to the discharge of Stanley Dash on November 4, 1981, and notify him in writing that this has been done and that the evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him.

In order to dissipate the effect of the Respondent's filing of the appeal of the award of unemployment compensation benefits to Stanley Dash, I shall further recommend that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from prosecuting the appeal and to withdraw it. In order to restore Dash to the position he would have had, in absent the Respondent's unlawful appeal, I shall recommend that the Respondent be ordered to make Dash whole for all legal expenses he has incurred as a result to said appeal.

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered determinative challenges in and objections to an election held 30 December 1983 and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows 60 for and 55 against the Petitioner, with 8 challenged ballots.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, has adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations,[1] and finds that a certification of representative should be issued.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Teamsters Local 773, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees of the Employer at its 110 Main Street, West Easton, Pennsylvania facility; BUT EXCLUDING all other employees of the Employer, including office and plant clerical employees, professional employees, leadmen, confidential employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting.

Contrary to the Regional Director, I find that the Petitioner engaged in objectionable conduct by making an impermissible offer to waive its initiation fee. Accordingly, I would set aside the election.

It is undisputed that the Petitioner, Teamsters Local 773, distributed to the employees a campaign letter, dated 19 December 1983, which stated in pertinent part:

> [A]ll employees in the bargaining unit will not have to pay the $50.00 Initiation Fee if they vote for the Teamsters to represent them. Also dues will not be payable until there is a signed contract.

The Regional Director found that although the Petitioner's statement "may have been inartfully drafted," it was sufficiently clear that the statement meant that the Petitioner would waive the initiation fee for all unit employees, without distinction, if the Petitioner won the election and became their collective-bargaining representative. He further found that the statement did not require the employees to join the Union or to take any other action before the election as a condition of the offer to waive the initiation fee. The Regional Director concluded that the waiver was offered to all employees unconditionally and that therefore the Petitioner's statement was not violative of NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270 (1973).

Contrary to the Regional Director, I find that the Petitioner's statement in its 19 December 1983 letter with respect to the waiver of the initiation fee is ambiguous on its face. In the Regional Director's view the above statement is to be read as an unconditional offer to waive the initiation fee for all unit employees. However, the Regional Director's interpretation is not the only plausible interpretation. Rather, the statement is equally susceptible of the interpretation that the offer to waive the initiation fee was conditioned on the individual employee's vote in the election and in my view the employees reasonably could have so construed the statement.[1] Such a waiver offer is impermissible under Savair. It is also well established that in circumstances, as here, in which a union's offer to waive initiation fees is ambiguous, it is the union's duty "to clarify that ambiguity or suffer whatever consequences might attach to the employees' possible interpretations of the ambiguity." Crane Co., 225 NLRB 657, 659 (1976). See Inland Shoe Mfg. Co., 211 NLRB 724, 725 (1974). It is apparent that

[1] Chairman Dotson emphasizes that the interpretation urged by the Employer of the Union's statement that "All employees in the bargaining unit will not have to pay the $50.00 Initiation Fee if they vote for the Teamsters"—i.e., that only those employees who voted for the Union would qualify for the waiver—is unreasonable in light of the Board's fully publicized secret-ballot procedure.

[1] I cannot agree with Chairman Dotson that this interpretation of the Petitioner's statement is unreasonable in light of the Board's fully publicized secret-ballot procedure. In my view, the Chairman's reliance on the Board's secret-ballot procedure necessarily leads to the conclusion that waivers of initiation fees which are conditioned solely on how an employee votes in an election are permissible. Such a conclusion is clearly contrary to Savair. Thus, I note that in Savair the Court set forth the Board's analysis in DIT-MCO, 163 NLRB at 1021–22, that "it is completely illogical to characterize as improper inducement or coercion" a waiver of initiation fees for those who vote "yes" when the whole problem can be avoided by voting "no," and that the Court specifically rejected that analysis as ignoring the realities of the situation. See 414 U.S. at 277–278.

the Petitioner here did not clarify its offer to waive the initiation fee.[2]

Accordingly, I find, contrary to the Regional Director, that the Petitioner's offer to waive its initiation fee was violative of Sawair and I would sustain the Employer's objection, set aside the election, and direct a second election.

I therefore dissent from my colleagues' adoption of the Regional Director's report.

[2] In this regard, I note that in its brief in opposition to the Employer's exceptions the Petitioner, in arguing that no hearing is warranted in this case, states: "In this case the letter containing the waiver language speaks for itself. There is no dispute as to any issue of material fact because the only material fact is the letter itself."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 18 June 1981 Administrative Law Judge Raymond P. Green issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting in part.

I dissent from my colleagues' adoption of the judge's decision with respect to two issues. I would find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act on 13 March 1980[1] by discharging employee Robert Monsky because of his union organizational activities. I would also find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by coercively interrogating employees Harold Baylis and Nick Buttacavoli about the Union.

Monsky's Discharge

The Respondent is a small, family-run automobile parts wholesale distributor. Other than company officers, managers, and supervisors, it has only 12 employees. In early 1980, employee Monsky called the Union to express an interest in gaining representation for the Respondent's employees. Around 4 March, Monsky invited employees to his home for an 8 March organizational meeting. On 5 March, Monsky told the Respondent's vice presidents Wachler and Mastrobuoni that he was interested in forming a union and that he was concerned that unionization could affect adversely their positions with the Respondent as independent contractor-glass installers. Wachler and Mastrobuoni told him that as corporate officers their positions would not be affected by unionizing and that Monsky should do whatever he liked, but that the Respondent's owner Grasso "would never go for it." At the 8 March meeting, Monsky and fellow employees Baylis and Buttacavoli signed cards authorizing the Union to act as their representative. On 10 and 12 March Monsky successfully solicited two other employees to sign cards. Further, Baylis testified that there was a great deal of discussion about the Union among the employees throughout the week after the meeting at Monsky's house.

On the afternoon of 13 March the Respondent's general manager Lawlor informed Monsky that he was terminated. Lawlor told Monsky that the Respondent was dissatisfied with Monsky's work and that an incident which occurred earlier in the day was the last straw. This final incident involved Monsky's selection of the wrong type of glass for a customer's order. Monsky inadvertently pulled from inventory a safer, more expensive piece of safety plate glass instead of the safety sheet glass called for in the order. The error was corrected before the glass was sent. Grasso testified that Monsky was never more than a marginal employee who exhibited sloppy work habits, a lack of enthusiasm, consistent tardiness, inadequate care for company property, and inattention to job responsibilities. This last incident involving the wrong glass allegedly prompted him to tell Lawlor to let Monsky go.

With respect to Monsky's work record, the evidence is that he had initially worked for the Respondent for several months during 1978, left on

[1] In dismissing the allegation that Robert Monsky's discharge violated the Act, we agree with the judge that its timing—coming shortly after Monsky signed a union authorization card—raises a suspicion of a causal connection. However, as the judge correctly points out, a suspicion is not proof. Even assuming the Respondent's knowledge of Monsky's activities, there is no evidence that the Respondent threatened employees, promised them benefits, or displayed any intent to retaliate against employees because of their union activities. In these circumstances, we have at best an unsupported inference that the termination was unlawful. Moreover, the judge credits the Respondent's testimony that Monsky's work habits provided a legitimate basis for discharge. Therefore, unlike our dissenting colleague, we are unwilling to engage in building inferences upon speculation to arrive at the tenuous conclusion that the Respondent violated the Act.

We correct an error in the judge's discussion of the Monsky discharge incident. The judge refers to the customer's order as calling for AS—2 "plate" glass. The correct designation of the AS—2 glass is "sheet" glass.

[2] In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent's 14 March 1980 questions to two employees as to what they knew about the Union do not constitute unlawful interrogation in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1), we rely on the absence of evidence of hostility toward the Union, the generalized nature of the inquiries, the informal and noncoercive atmosphere in which the questions were asked, the absence of threats or promises accompanying the questions, and the forthrightness of the employees' replies which indicates that no intimidation or coercion existed. Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984). We note moreover that employee Buttacavoli could not recall such an interrogation.

[1] All dates are in 1980, unless otherwise indicated.

his own initiative, and then was readily rehired by Grasso in February 1979. Monsky was given a $20-a-week raise in August 1979 as an inducement from Grasso to remain with the Respondent rather than accept an offer from a competing employer. Grasso had also repeatedly expressed satisfaction with Monsky's performance by promoting him to warehouse foreman, complimenting him in front of customers, reassuring him of his position with the Respondent, and, just a week before terminating him, telling him that he had done a good job while Grasso was out of town.

The judge accepted as valid and legitimate the Respondent's justification for discharging Monsky. In recommending dismissal of the complaint, he also noted particularly the Respondent's lack of demonstrated union animus and of direct knowledge of Monsky's involvement in protected union activities. Contrary to my colleagues, I find error in the judge's findings with respect to animus, knowledge, motivation, and, ultimately, the occurrence of an 8(a)(3) violation.

As discussed below, I would find that Grasso unlawfully interrogated employees about the Union only a day after Monsky's discharge. Apart from this evidence, Wachler and Mastrobuoni admitted the Respondent's union animus when they told Monsky that Grasso "would never go for" unionization. This same encounter between Grasso and the Respondent's officers clearly established knowledge of Monsky's activities no later than 5 March. In addition, the small size of the Respondent's family-run business and the open in-plant organizational activities of Monsky further support the inference that the Respondent must have known about those activities before his discharge. In reliance on the foregoing evidence, I would find that the Respondent clearly knew about and was opposed to Monsky's union activity.

I would further find that Monsky's general work performance and his error in selecting plate glass were blatant pretexts designed to mask the Respondent's antiunion discriminatory motivation for discharging him. Although there is evidence that Monsky was not always a model employee, the record shows that the Respondent nevertheless considered him sufficiently valuable to overlook his deficiencies, offer encouragement and reassurance of his tenure, grant him increased responsibilities, and even increase his salary rather than risk his loss. The Respondent was willing to overlook whatever inadequacies Monsky may have demonstrated without so much as a disciplinary warning until Monsky's union activities began. It is far too improbable to believe that Monsky's mistake in pulling a more expensive, safer, higher quality piece of glass than called for in a customer's order, a mistake which was corrected before the glass was even loaded on the delivery truck and which resulted in no additional expense for either the Respondent or the customer, was such a drastic departure from or exacerbation of his previously condoned conduct as to justify his precipitate discharge. The Respondent's sudden strictness with regard to Monsky's work betrayed its pretextual character.[2] Accordingly, I would find and conclude that Monsky's discharge on 13 March violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1).

The Unlawful Interrogations

On Friday, 14 March, the date after Monsky's discharge, Union Representative Gableman telephoned Grasso and told him that the Union represented a majority of the Respondent's employees and that he wanted to negotiate a contract. According to Grasso's own account, he followed up on this phone conversation by asking employees Baylis and Buttacavoli what they knew about the Union. My colleagues have adopted the judge's recommendation to dismiss these alleged interrogations as noncoercive, isolated, and trivial in nature. I disagree.

It is well established that questions probing into employees' union sympathies reasonably tend to coerce employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights even absent accompanying threats of reprisal or promises of benefits. Here, according to the Respondent's own witness, the Respondent set out to discover which employees supported the Union simply by asking individual employees what they knew about the Union. Such inquiries undoubtedly tend to inhibit employees' concerted activities. Particularly within the context of this case, in a small 12-employee plant where only 1 day earlier the Respondent unlawfully rid itself of the leading union activist, these interrogations by the Respondent owner cannot be characterized as either trivial or isolated. Therefore, I would find that Grasso's questions to Baylis and Buttacavoli violated Section 8(a)(1) and warrant appropriate remedial action. See Brooks Cameras, 250 NLRB 820 (1980).

[2] Both Grasso and Lawlor testified about the wrong glass incident and the decision to terminate Monsky. Their asserted concern about the safety aspects of such an error should it have occurred in reverse, i.e., that a lower quality glass might be substituted for an order requiring the better quality product, seems particularly contrived in light of the circumstances actually presented.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RAYMOND P. GREEN, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were tried before me on December 17, 18, and 19, 1980, and April 1, 1981.[1] The charge in Case 29–CA–7861 was filed by the Union on March 18 and the charge in Case 29–CA–7904 was filed on April 4. Pursuant to these charges, a consolidated complaint and notice of hearing was issued by the Regional Director for Region 29 on May 30. In substance, the complaint alleges:

1. That, about March 13, a majority of the Respondent's employees in a unit of service, production, and maintenance employees designated the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

2. That, about March 14, the Union requested the Respondent to recognize and bargain with it as the representative of the employees.

3. That the Respondent discharged its employees Phil Vito on March 12, Robert Monsky on March 13, and Greg Galano on March 18 because these employees joined or supported the Union.

4. That, about March 14, and on various other unknown dates in March, the Respondent by Joseph Grasso and by other unknown agents and supervisors interrogated employees concerning their membership in, activities on behalf of, and sympathy for the Union.

5. That the Respondent's conduct, as heretofore alleged, prevented the holding of a fair and free election and therefore a bargaining order is required.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and after consideration of the briefs filed, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent admits the jurisdictional allegations of the complaint. Therefore, it is found that the Respondent is a New York corporation located at 157A Grant Avenue, Islip, New York, where it is engaged in the wholesale distribution of automobile parts and related products. Annually, the Respondent purchases goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which are delivered directly to it in interstate commerce from States other than the State of New York. Accordingly, it is concluded that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Although the status of the Union as a labor organization was denied, it is clear from the testimony of Charlie Gableman that it is an organization in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose of representing employees vis-a-vis employers regarding wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment. It therefore is concluded that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

The first contact between the Union and employees of the Company occurred in January or February 1980. In this respect, employee Andrew Agosta was approached by Union Agent Gableman and asked if he wished to join the Union. Agosta then told Joseph Grasso, the Respondent's owner, of this approach and the latter responded, "Don't worry about it." No further contact was made between the Union and the Respondent's employees until early March 1980.

In early March, Robert Monsky called the Union indicating his interest in having representation and arranged for a meeting at his home on March 8. On March 4 or 5, Monsky spoke with various employees inviting them to the meeting. According to Monsky, around March 5 he spoke with Robert Wachler and Gaspar Mastrobuoni in the shop, told them that he was interested in forming a union, and asked if this would jeopardize their positions with the Company. Monsky states that he asked them this because he understood that Wachler and Mastrobuoni were independent contractors who installed glass for the Company and he was concerned that under a union contract they would not be able to continue in that relationship. Monsky states that they responded that a union would not affect them because they were officers of the Company and that they would "like to see the look on Joe's face because he would never go for it." Monsky also states that they said that he should do whatever he liked.

Since the above transaction involved Wachler and Mastrobuoni, it would be useful at this point to describe their status with the Company. It appears that both individuals do glass installation work for the Company and in connection with their functions do not have any supervisory duties or responsibilities. However, both were made vice presidents by Grasso, about January 1, 1979,[2] and Mastrobuoni is the latter's nephew. According to Grasso, he made Wachler a vice president because he was very dedicated and loyal.[3] (Lawlor and Mastrobuoni were also made vice president at that time, no doubt because they were relatives.) Grasso also testified that the designation of Wachler and Mastrobuoni as vice presidents did not bring them any added compensation or any equity in the Company, although he did have an understanding that ultimately, when he left the business, the vice presidents would take over.[4] In effect, the arrange-

[1] Unless otherwise indicated, all dates are in 1980.

[2] About January 1, 1979, Wachler, Mastrobuoni, and Lawlor were made vice presidents, and Grasso's wife, Frances, became the Company's president. Lawlor is concededly a supervisor within the meaning of the Act, and is Grasso's son-in-law. Frances Grasso is the Company's bookkeeper.

[3] The testimony also establishes that Wachler owned his own truck, has his own company, and was assumed to be an independent contractor by Grasso.

[4] Although the General Counsel contends that Wachler and Mastrobuoni should be excluded from any unit found to be appropriate, it is noted that she does not allege that they are supervisors or agents of the Respondent.

ments made in 1979 appear to be a kind of insurance policy to provide for the continuation of this small family-owned business if and when Grasso left the Company for health or retirement reasons.

Getting back to the main plot of the story, a meeting was held at Monsky's home on Saturday, March 8, which was attended by Union Agents Gableman and Bondi and by employees Robert Monsky, Harold Baylis, and Nick Buttacavoli. At this meeting where the union agents spoke of the benefits of unionization, the three employees signed cards authorizing the Union to represent them for collective-bargaining purposes. However, subsequent to the meeting Baylis, after speaking with his wife, decided that he did not want to join the Union and on several occasions during the next week asked Monsky for his card back. In this regard, Monsky's testimony was that he could not recall if Baylis asked for his card back but it could have happened. I credit the testimony of Baylis that he did ask for his card back.

According to Monsky, about March 10 or 11 he asked Greg Galano and Phil Vito to sign union cards. These two employees did sign such cards, Galano's being dated March 10 and Vito's card being dated March 12. Therefore, in toto, five employees signed cards for the Union.[5]

On Wednesday, March 12, Phil Vito was told by Lawlor that he was discharged. According to Vito, about a week before, he took his truck to a gas station where, in addition to getting gas, he bought a pack of cigarettes which were put on the bill charged to the Respondent. He explained that he did not have change to buy the cigarettes but that the attendant told him that they were put on the gas bill. Vito testified that he intended to pay the Company for the cigarettes when he got back. Although the impression was given during direct examination that this event took place on the same day that Vito was discharged and that he tendered the money as soon as he returned to the Respondent's premises, it soon became apparent that Vito "forgot" to repay the money for about a week and that on March 12, when Lawlor approached him, Lawlor accused Vito of charging cigarettes on the Company's credit card and that it "was the principle of the thing" with which he was concerned.

According to Lawlor, he had received a call from the gas station on the morning of March 12 pursuant to which he visited the station and learned that Vito was making a habit of charging cigarettes to the Respondent. He states that, when he confronted Vito about this, the latter admitted it. Lawlor testified that he therefore decided to discharge Vito. In connection with the discharge of Phil Vito, I note here that there was no direct evidence that either Lawlor or any other company agent had knowledge of the fact that Vito had signed a union card earlier that day. It also is noted that there was evidence that, on one other occasion when an employee was suspected of stealing, he was given the option of resigning.

On March 13, Monsky was discharged. That morning Monsky, who is in charge of the warehouse, received an order calling for the delivery of plate glass designated as AS–2 for the side window of a bus. In this regard, there are various types of glass used in motor vehicles, among them being glass designated as AS–1 and AS–2. The former (AS–1) is required by Federal law for windshields, is clearly marked as such on the glass itself, and is somewhat more expensive than AS–2 glass. AS–2 glass, on the other hand, can be used for any window on a vehicle other than the windshield.[6]

Having received the order, Monsky went back to the warehouse to get the glass and, instead of pulling out a piece of AS–2 glass, pulled out a piece of AS–1 glass. According to Monsky, after pulling the glass Grasso yelled at him "Don't you know what you are pulling. You're pulling out a more expensive piece of glass." Monsky states that in response he said that the glass was marked wrong, "so how was I supposed to know."[7] He then testified that he responded further by saying that he did not have the other piece of glass, apparently meaning that he did not find the AS–2 glass in stock. At one point in Monsky's testimony he stated that Grasso said that he had pulled AS–1 instead of AS–2 glass, but he later testified that Grasso did not say anything about AS–1 or AS–2.[8] Monsky further testified that "it was not a big thing, as far as I was concerned." According to Monsky, later in the day Lawlor told him that he was fired. Monsky states that Lawlor told him that he was not productive, not happy, that the Company was family owned and he could not go further, and that Lawlor had unsuccessfully tried to get raises for Monsky.[9] Therefore, ac-

[5] As of March 14, when the Union made a demand for recognition, the General Counsel asserts that the following people comprised an appropriate collective-bargaining unit: Harold Baylis, Ernie Phillips, Nick Buttacavoli, Phil Vito, Greg Galano, and Robert Monsky. The Respondent asserts that the unit should include Robert Wachler, Gaspar Mastrobuoni, Andrew Agosta, Harold Baylis, Ernie Phillips, George Puleo, Nick Buttacavoli, Mike Reissman, but excluded Vito, Galano, and Monsky.

As to Vito and Monsky, the General Counsel asserts that they should be included in the unit notwithstanding the Respondent's contention that they no longer were employed because she asserts they were illegally discharged. As to Galano and Vito, the Respondent contends that they essentially did office work whereas the General Counsel asserts that they were drivers. With respect to Wachler and Mastrobuoni, the General Counsel contends that they should be excluded from the unit because they are vice presidents and because of their special relationship with the Company. The General Counsel also objects to the Respondent's contention that Reissman and Puleo should be included in the unit as she argues that the former was a management trainee and that the latter was on extended sick leave. Finally, the General Counsel takes no position as to Andrew Agosta.

[6] For safety reasons, the National Highway and Safety Administration is empowered to adopt safety standards pursuant to which items of motor vehicle equipment cannot be sold unless meeting safety standards. 80 Stat. 722. Pursuant to the statute, Motor Safety Standard No. 205 was promulgated which deals with glazing materials and requires, inter alia, that such materials conform to the American National Standard "Safety Code for Safety Glazing Materials for Glazing Motor Vehicles Operating on Land Highways." The American Standard Safety Code, in turn, designates AS–1 glass as being suitable for windshields and AS–2 as not being suitable for windshields. Pursuant to the statute, a violation of the law or any attendant regulation can subject a company to a fine.

[7] Monsky conceded, however, that AS–1 glass is clearly marked as such with the designation etched onto the glass.

[8] Early in his testimony, Grasso said that Monsky pulled out AS–2 glass rather than AS–1 glass which was called for by the order. He later corrected himself and testified that it was AS–2 glass which was called for in the order and not AS–1 glass.

[9] According to Monsky he had been pressing the Company repeatedly over several months for a raise but was continuously put off.

cording to Monsky's account Lawlor did not mention the glass incident when he was being discharged.

While Lawlor acknowledges telling Monsky that he felt that Monsky was not happy with his work, he states that he specifically told Monsky that the glass incident was the final straw. In this regard, Lawlor testified that, when Monsky pulled the wrong piece of glass, he questioned Monsky about it and the latter said that he could not find the right glass. Lawlor further testified that he told Monsky, "This was not right," and that if he could not find it he should ask. According to Lawlor, he gained the impression from Monsky's response, and the fact that Monsky was supposed to be in charge of the warehouse and know its inventory, that Monsky did not really care if he pulled the wrong glass which could, in the future, result in the wrong glass being pulled when AS–1 glass was required. As such, Lawlor concluded that Monsky showed a lackadaisical attitude and a disregard of his responsibilities, a conclusion which tends to be supported by Monsky's testimony that his pulling of the wrong glass was not a big thing as far as he was concerned.

As part of the General Counsel's case, she adduced through Grasso that, prior to March 13, he considered Monsky to have had poor work and personal habits for a substantial period of time and had tolerated this. She also established that Monsky had received a raise in the summer of 1979 when he indicated that he was offered a job by a competitor. From this, the General Counsel argues that, if the Respondent considered Monsky to be a poor or indifferent worker for so long a period of time and tolerated this condition, then the only logical intervening factor which could have precipitated the decision to discharge him was his union activities.

On Friday, March 14, Gableman, on behalf of the Union, called Grasso on the phone and said that the Union represented a majority of the Company's employees and that he wanted to negotiate a contract. According to Gableman, Grasso replied that he could visit the shop and speak with him on March 17 at 10 a.m. Later in the day, according to Grasso, he told Lawlor about the call and asked Baylis if he knew anything about the Union. According to Grasso and Baylis, the latter said that he signed a union card but had unsuccessfully asked Monsky for its return. Also, in his pretrial affidavit, Grasso said that he also asked Nick Buttacavoli about the Union. However, Buttacavoli, in his testimony, could not recall such an interrogation, asserting instead that Grasso, without mentioning the Union, merely asked if he was happy with his job and if he had any complaints. In connection with these incidents, I credit Grasso's testimony that he questioned Baylis and Buttacavoli, after receiving the telephone call from Gableman.

On March 17, Gableman and Bondi went to the Company's premises only to discover that Grasso was not in. They then left and did not return. On March 18, the Union filed a petition for an election in Case 29–RC–4909 which was later withdrawn on June 30, 1980. Given normal mail delivery, the petition would therefore have been received by the Respondent on March 19 or 20.

On March 18, Greg Galano was discharged. As will be recalled, Galano had signed a union authorization card on March 10. However, apart from signing this card, it does not appear that Galano participated in any other union activities and there is no direct evidence that the Respondent's agents were aware that Galano had signed a union card.

Galano had been hired about 4 weeks before March 18 and, according to the Respondent, he was hired as a probationary employee to work mainly in the office taking orders over the phone. Galano maintains, however, that he was never told that he was on probation. He does concede that the major part of his work was in the office taking orders over the phone. He asserts, however, that he also drove a good deal of the time.

According to Galano, on March 18 Lawlor told him that he was being discharged. Galano states that when he asked why, Lawlor said that he was not the type of person that the Company was looking for. He further states that when he asked if his layoff had anything to do with the Union, Lawlor paused and said, "I've heard some rumors." According to Galano, he then asked Grasso why he was fired and states that Grasso said that he was not the right type of person for the job, that they were looking for someone with more schooling, and that Galano liked to be out on the road which was not challenging enough for him. He also states that Grasso said something about sending out a wrong piece of glass which Galano denied ever happening.

According to Lawlor, he and Grasso decided on March 18 to discharge Galano because, in their opinion, he was not suited for the job that he was hired to do. In this respect, they testified that Galano did not have a good telephone personality, that he was too rough on the phone, and that since he was hired mainly to take calls from customers, Galano was not sufficiently useful to the Company. Lawlor testified that he had discussed this problem with Grasso prior to March 18 but that, when Galano did not improve, it was decided to let him go. As to his conversation with Galano on March 18, Lawlor conceded, after being shown his pretrial affidavit, that Galano did ask him if his discharge had anything to do with the Union. Lawlor asserts that he answered "no" to this inquiry.

It appears from the testimony of Agosta that, after Monsky was fired, the Union established a picket line at the Company's premises and that Monsky participated in that picketing. According to Agosta, Grasso, on one occasion, on seeing Monsky on the picket line, said that he did not understand why Monsky would "go that route, join the Union, and that the "guys didn't come to him and . . . try to work something out before setting up this union." It is noted that apart from these statements made to Agosta and the two instances when Grasso questioned employees as described above, there was no other evidence that any other representatives of the Respondent's management communicated to any employees about the Union much less expressed, in any way, any intention to retaliate against employees who joined or supported the Union.

IV. ANALYSIS

In my opinion, the critical issue in this case is whether the Respondent illegally discharged Robert Monsky, Phil Vito, and Greg Galano because of their union activities or whether they were discharged for other reasons. In cases such as this, it must first be ascertained whether the General Counsel has made a sufficient showing "to support the inference that protected activity was a 'motivating factor' in the employer's decision," which, if shown, requires the Respondent "to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of protected conduct." Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).[10]

It is self-evident that the timing of the three discharges (Vito on March 12, Monsky on March 13, and Galano on March 18), occurring shortly after they signed union cards, does suggest, at the very least, a suspicion that a causal connection exists. Nevertheless, suspicion is not the same thing as proof and while timing may justify an inference of antiunion animus, inquiry must be made into all of the circumstances leading up to the discharges including, inter alia, whether the employer had knowledge of the union activities, other evidence union animus, whether any intervening transactions occurred which may have caused the discharges, and whether the reasons asserted by the employer were pretextual in nature or were contrary to its normal custom and practice.

In the present case, the General Counsel contends that the Employer had knowledge of its employees' union activities through a number of transactions which occurred, in addition to the fact that this was a small shop.[11] The first of these transactions involves the conversation between Agosta and Grasso wherein the former, in January or February, told the latter that he was approached by the Union and where Grasso replied, "Don't worry about it." Nevertheless, despite the fact that Grasso became aware of this contact a month or two before the discharges in question, it also appears that, after this single contact between the Union and Agosta, no further organizational efforts were made until early March when Monsky and other employees came in contact with the Union. Therefore, as the Union was not engaged in organizing activities from its first approach to Agosta until March, and as no other employees had met with the Union during the intervening period, it can only be said that the Employer had knowledge of the first tentative contact between the Union and Agosta. Accordingly, it does not seem to me that the conversation between Agosta and Grasso can, of itself, be the basis for concluding that the Employer had knowledge of the subsequent organizing efforts by the Union or the later activities of Monsky, Vito, and Galano. Moreover, the response given by Agosta would appear to manifest a singular lack of concern by Grasso about the Union's contacts with his employees.

The second transaction relied on for establishing knowledge of union activities prior to March 12 was Monsky's conversation with Wachler and Mastrobuoni about March 5. As noted above, Monsky testified that he told these two men that he was interested in forming a union. He also testified that they replied that he should do as he liked and that they would "like to see the look on Joe's face because he would never go for it." The next question is whether their knowledge of Monsky's interest in the Union can be imputed to the Respondent. In this regard, although it was conceded that these two individuals had the titles of vice president and that Mastrobuoni is Grasso's nephew, they nevertheless did installation work for the Company and had no supervisory or managerial functions. Indeed, the General Counsel does not contend that either was a supervisor or agent of the Respondent. As such, I do not believe that I can impute, by virtue of agency, their knowledge of Monsky's activities to the Respondent, although it may be plausible that as both had a potential equity interest in the Company, and because Mastrobuoni was a relative, that they mentioned this conversation to Grasso.

Another element to be considered is whether, apart from the timing of the discharges, there is other evidence manifesting an intent to retaliate against employees who either joined or supported the Union. In this respect, Grasso by his own admission questioned two employees as to what they knew of the Union after receiving a demand for recognition from Gableman. Grasso also does not deny that sometime after Monsky was discharged and was seen picketing at the employer's premises, he stated to Andrew Agosta that he did not understand why Monsky would "go that route, join the Union" and that the "guys didn't come to him and . . . try to work something out before setting up this union." Nevertheless, the evidence herein does not disclose that the Respondent's management talked or communicated about the Union with employees on any other occasions and the record is devoid of any evidence disclosing that the Employer either threatened employees or promised benefits to them. In my opinion neither the questioning of employees about the Union nor the statements made to Agosta in the context made were manifestations of an intent to retaliate. In short, it is my opinion that the evidence adduced by the General Counsel to suggest union animus on the part of the Respondent is, apart from the element of timing, decidedly weak and unpersuasive.

With respect to Vito, the evidence establishes that he signed a union card on the morning of March 12 and was discharged later on that day. In this case there is no direct evidence of any knowledge on the part of the Company that he signed this card and there is no evidence that any supervisors or agents of the Respondent were in the vicinity when the card was solicited, signed, or returned to Monsky.

It established that, about a week prior to his discharge, Vito charged a pack of cigarettes on the Company's credit card when he purchased gasoline for the truck he was driving. It also was established to my satisfaction that Lawlor became aware of this on the morning of March 12 and that, when he confronted Vito with an accusation of misusing the credit card, Vito admitted it, whereupon Lawlor discharged him, stating that it was the principle of the thing with which he was concerned.

[10] It is my understanding that although the criteria set forth in Wright Line provides a frame work for analyzing these issues, it does not purport to alter the longstanding rule that the ultimate burden of proof rests with the General Counsel.

[11] In her brief, the General Counsel cites Tayko Industries, 214 NLRB 84, 87 (1974), and Wal-Mart Stores, 201 NLRB 250 (1973), for the proposition that in a small shop it is "likely that the employer had observed the activity in question." For an extensive discussion of what has been called the "small plant doctrine," see American League, 189 NLRB 541, 548–549 (1971).

Although Vito testified that he intended to immediately repay the Company, he conceded that it slipped his mind for about a week and that he did not tender the money until after being confronted by Lawlor on March 12. Whether Vito did or did not intend to repay the money is somewhat irrelevant because his failure to make timely repayment would clearly have led Lawlor to believe that Vito was making personal use of the Company's credit card.

The General Counsel argues that disparate treatment was shown in Vito's case as there was evidence that another employee who was suspected of stealing was given the option of quitting. However, it is my opinion that there is not much distinction between a forced resignation and a discharge and, to the extent that the past practice of this Employer may serve as a guide, the evidence concerning the other employee suspected of stealing tends to support the Respondent's contention that it does not retain employees who are believed to have converted company property or assets.

In the case of Vito my function is only to determine whether his discharge was motivated by his support for the Union and not whether his discharge was for "good cause." As it is my opinion that on March 12 the Respondent discovered that Vito had charged his personal effects to the Company and also because this had not been reported for about a week, the Company had a reasonable basis for believing that Vito was being less than totally honest in his dealings with the Company. It therefore is concluded that this transaction rather than Vito's execution of a union authorization card on March 12 was the sole motivating factor in the decision to discharge him. Accordingly, it is recommended that the complaint, insofar as it alleges that Vito was discharged for discriminatory reasons, be dismissed.

As in the case of Vito, there is no direct evidence that the Respondent was aware of Monsky's union activities although the circumstantial evidence supporting such an assertion is somewhat stronger. Unlike the situations of Vito and Galano, the evidence discloses that Monsky was the most active employee supporter of the Union, having contacted the Union and solicited its support among the other employees.[12]

Having demonstrated that the Respondent viewed Monsky as a poor and indifferent employee for a substantial period of time before his discharge, the General Counsel contends that the only intervening event which can explain Monsky's sudden discharge on March 13 was his union activities which commenced in early March. However, the record herein also discloses another intervening event which the Respondent asserts was the last straw and which caused it to terminate Monsky's employment.

As noted above, on the morning of March 13 Monsky had to take out of the warehouse's inventory a piece of AS–2 glass for delivery. Instead of pulling the AS–2 glass, he pulled a pane of AS–1 glass which provoked a confrontation with Grasso over this mistake. In response, Monsky explained his actions by asserting alternatively that he could not find the right glass and that the glass was wrongly marked. According to the Respondent, since Monsky was in charge of the warehouse where the glass was kept and therefore was expected to be aware of its inventory, his mistake and his explanations for the mistake indicated a lackadaisical attitude toward his job which could, in the future, lead to a serious problem because Federal regulations require the use of AS–1 glass for vehicle windshields and Monsky's lack of responsibility might result in the wrong glass being delivered and installed in violation of Federal law and thereby risk the imposition of a fine. Indeed, the testimony of Monsky that the pulling of the wrong glass was not a big thing as far as he was concerned tends to support the Respondent's view that, from his actions on March 13, it came to realize that Monsky not only was a poor employee, but that he was indifferent to his responsibilities.

Given the lack of evidence showing union animus on the part of the Respondent, together with the existence of an intervening event which plausibly could have served as a sufficient reason for discharging him, it is concluded that the evidence, on balance, is insufficient to establish that the Respondent discharged Monsky because of his activities or support for the Union. I shall therefore recommend that this allegation of the complaint be dismissed.

I also conclude that the discharge of Galano was not violative of the Act. Galano had been hired approximately 3 to 4 weeks prior to his discharge on March 18 and much of his time was spent answering telephone calls in the office. Apart from signing a union card on March 10, Galano did not participate in any other union activities. Also, although the Respondent was clearly aware of the Union's organizational efforts by March 18, there is no direct and little circumstantial evidence, aside from the timing of his discharge and the size of the shop, to show that the Respondent had knowledge that Galano had signed a union card or otherwise supported the Union. Given my opinion that there was insufficient evidence of union animus and the fact that I have credited the Respondent's reasons for discharging Vito and Monsky, I shall do the same in the case of Galano's discharge. Therefore, it is concluded that the Respondent terminated the employment of Galano because it felt that he was not sufficiently good at the job for which he was mainly hired to perform, namely, dealing with customers on the phone.

In view of my conclusion that the Respondent did not violate the Act by discharging the three employees, it is clear that the refusal-to-bargain allegation of the complaint must also be dismissed as it cannot be said that, even with two instances of interrogation, the Employer's conduct prevented the holding of a fair and free election. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 393 U.S. 575 (1969).

[12] See W. W. Grainger, Inc., 255 NLRB 1106 (1981).

Finally, although the evidence herein discloses that Grasso asked at least one, and perhaps two, employees if they knew anything about the Union, after he received the telephonic demand for recognition from Gableman, it is my opinion that this was isolated, noncoercive, and trivial in nature. Accordingly, I am of the opinion that it would not effectuate the purposes or policies of the Act to require the Respondent to remedy this allegation. Bath Electrical Systems, 233 NLRB 762 (1977).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Repco Distributing, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Glass Warehouse Workers & Paint Handlers, Local Union No. 206, International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has not engaged in any conduct in violation of the Act requiring remedial relief.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[13]

ORDER

It is ordered that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

---

[13] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 30 September 1983 Administrative Law Judge James L. Rose issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed limited cross-exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that employee Rudolph DeLeon held a bargaining unit position in his daytime job as automobile preparer and reconditioner, and treated him as an independent contractor with respect to his "after hours" contract for janitorial services at the Respondent's automobile dealership.[1] He found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by virtue of Sales Manager Glaza's termination of DeLeon's janitorial duties on 12 February 1982 because the bargaining unit majority voted that day for union representation in a Board-conducted election.[2]

We affirm the judge's finding of an 8(a)(3) violation.[3] Here, the same individual worked for his employer in a dual capacity as an employee and independent contractor. Because it is impossible to separate DeLeon's employee status from his independent contractor status in these circumstances, we disagree with our dissenting colleague that termination of the janitorial duties could not have had an impact on DeLeon and other unit employees.[4] Inasmuch as DeLeon's position as an independent contractor was related to his status as an employee, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by terminating DeLeon's services as an independent contractor in retaliation for the employees' union activities.[5]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Senftner Volkswagen, Porsche-Audi, Mazda, Sioux City, Iowa, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Terminating an independent contractor in order to penalize employees for engaging in union or concerted activities protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Rudolph DeLeon reinstatement of his janitorial contract and make him whole for any loss of contractual revenue he may have incurred as a result of his contract being terminated, in accordance with the formula set forth in the section of the judge's decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Post at its Sioux City, Iowa facility, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[1] It is unclear whether the judge actually made a finding that DeLeon's janitorial work was performed as an independent contractor. The judge, however, did analyze the case as if he had independent contractor status. Of course, if DeLeon's janitorial work was part of his employee duties, the 8(a)(1) and (3) violation is obvious.

[2] DeLeon testified that Glaza explained to him 12 February that Mrs. Senftner "didn't want anyone who was a nonmanagement employee to have keys to the place" and that "you guys voting for the union, that was the clincher." Glaza testified that he said, "Rudy, this isn't because of the election, this is just the straw that broke the camel's back." The judge concluded that both Glaza's and DeLeon's versions of their conversation reveal that the employees' vote was the determinative reason for the Respondent's decision to eliminate DeLeon's independent contractor services.

[3] In light of this finding, Member Hunter finds it unnecessary to pass on the question of whether the termination of DeLeon's janitorial work also was violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. Member Zimmerman would, however, also affirm the judge's finding of an 8(a)(1) violation because the Respondent's termination of DeLeon's contract work was in retaliation for, and designed to interfere with, the bargaining unit employees' exercise of their Sec. 7 rights to engage in union and concerted activities.

[4] Contrary to our dissenting colleague's misconception, the impact to which we refer is on employees' exercise of their Sec. 7 rights to support a labor organization, not on their terms and conditions of employment.

[5] We shall substitute a narrow cease-and-desist order for the judge's broad injunctive language. See Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

[6] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting.

I dissent from my colleagues' finding that the Respondent's termination of DeLeon's independent contractor services violated the Act.

DeLeon in his role as independent contractor is expressly excluded from the Act's definition of "employee" and consequently not entitled to the protections of Section 8(a)(1) and (3).[1] His independent contractor duties and interest are so different and far removed from those of the unit employees that I am unable to conclude that the elimination of his independent contractor status "interfered with the right of employees to exercise their Section 7 rights or that his reinstatement is necessary to convey to employees the extent to which the Act protects these rights."[2]

It is important to note that DeLeon's termination as an independent contractor is the only unfair labor practice charged to the Respondent, notwithstanding the fact that DeLeon was also employed as a unit employee. It stretches the imagination to conclude that DeLeon's termination impacted on bargaining unit employees when the evidence shows that the Respondent did not act unlawfully toward any bargaining unit employee.[3]

Accordingly, I would dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

[2] Parker Robb, above at 404.

[3] My colleagues have engaged in speculation and gross overstatement by asserting that DeLeon's employee and independent contractor status are so merged that it is impossible that the Respondent's action against him as an independent contractor could not have had an impact on his employee status or on other unit employees. In fact the contrary is shown by the record in this case. The record evidence reveals that DeLeon continued in his unit position without any changes to his employment terms or conditions for approximately 8 months after his janitorial contract services were terminated. Similarly, there is no evidence of any changes with respect to the other unit employees.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT terminate an independent contractor in order to penalize employees for engaging in union or concerted activities protected by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Rudolph DeLeon reinstatement of his janitorial contract, and WE WILL make him whole, with interest, for any loss of contractual revenue he may have incurred as a result of his contract being terminated.

SENFTNER VOLKSWAGEN, PORSCHE-AUDI, MAZDA

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES L. ROSE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried before me on August 2, 1983, at Sioux City, Iowa, on the General Counsel's complaint which alleged that on February 12, 1982, the Respondent relieved Rudolph DeLeon of certain duties that he had been performing in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.[1]

The Respondent generally denied that it committed any unfair labor practices, and affirmatively contends that the work from which DeLeon was terminated was providing janitorial services as an independent contractor. Thus, even though he also worked as an employee, and only his independent contractor status was altered, no term or condition of "employment" was affected. Hence the Respondent can not be held to have violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

On the record as a whole, including my observation of the witnesses, briefs,[2] and arguments of counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is an Iowa corporation with an office and place of business in Sioux City, Iowa, engaged in the retail sale and service of new and used automobiles. It is one of four automobile dealerships owned and managed by Gloria Senftner and her husband. In connection with this business, the Respondent derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and annually receives goods, products, and materials directly from points outside the State of Iowa valued in excess of $50,000. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[1] Certain other allegations relating to violations of Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act set forth in the complaint were, by order of the Acting Regional Director, withdrawn.

[2] The Respondent submitted a reply brief. While the Board's Rules and Regulations do not provide for reply briefs, the Respondent's has been duly considered in reaching the decision.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Local Lodge 1426, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union) is admitted to be, and I find is, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. The Undisputed Facts

Rudolph DeLeon was hired by the Respondent on July 27, 1981, to recondition cars—wash, clean, wax and the like. He was interviewed and hired by Dennis Senftner (the nephew of the owners) who at that time was the general manager and John Glaza, who was then the new-car sales manager.

About 2 months later, DeLeon was interviewed by Senftner and Glaza to see if he would be interested in doing night cleanup work in the office and showroom areas, for which he would be paid a flat rate of $50 per week. The Respondent had been using a janitorial service for this work but was dissatisfied with the cost and quality of the work being done.

Gloria Senftner testified that when she was approached concerning this, she was advised that it would be an "independent deal." Thus, the Respondent would not be liable to pay DeLeon 1-1/2 times his hourly rate should his janitorial work along with his hours as an employee exceed 40 per week.[3]

DeLeon agreed and sometime in the fall of 1981 he began doing janitorial work for the Respondent for which he was paid $50 a week. The checks were made out to "Rudy DeLeon Maintenance." The Respondent made no payroll deductions, or otherwise include DeLeon with employees when he did the janitorial work.

In December 1981 the Union began an organizational campaign among the Respondent's employees. DeLeon signed an authorization card and testified without contradiction that he discussed the Union with Tom Brooks, the parts manager, Glenn Smith, the service manager, and Glaza.

A petition for representation was filed and an election was held on February 12, 1982. The Union received five votes with four votes being cast against the Union and there were two challenged ballots. One challenge was opened pursuant to stipulation and a final tally of ballots issued showing six votes in favor of the Union and four against. The other challenge became moot and the Union was certified.

On the day of the election, after the employees voted and the preliminary results were known, Glaza called DeLeon into his office and told DeLeon that he had just finished speaking with Mrs. Senftner. DeLeon testified that Glaza told him "that she didn't want anyone who was a nonmanagement employee to have keys to the place, which I had. And that he would have to relieve me of my job because of that." DeLeon further testified that Glaza told him that "you guys voting for the union, that was the clincher."

On February 22, the Respondent sought and received an estimate from Steve Hotvedt, a partner in a cleaning service, for both a one-time cleanup and a weekly service. While Hotvedt's firm was hired for a one-time job, the daily cleaning work was assigned to employee Donald Wilmot, a retired individual who had worked for the Respondent for a number of years and who had been rehired in January 1982 also to work on car preparation. Wilmot assumed the janitorial duties in March 1982 and performs them during normal working hours. DeLeon, as well as the previous janitorial service, had done this work after normal hours.

DeLeon continued to work at his job in car preparation but in October 1982 resigned his employment for reasons not in issue here.

Gloria Senftner testified that the Respondent had been losing money throughout 1981 and was continually seeking ways to cut costs. Thus DeLeon was hired for janitor work in the first instance as a cost-saving measure. And even then, the Respondent continued to seek ways of having the work done cheaper. An estimate from a janitorial service was sought and received in December, but was never acted on.

She further testified that sometime in January she and her husband made the determination to take the janitor work away from DeLeon and give it to Wilmot. However, since the representation petition was pending, they determined to make no changes until after the election. She further testified, and brought forth documentary evidence, to the effect that employees who had ceased working for whatever reason in early 1982 were not replaced. However, she admitted that ads were placed in newspapers for replacements.

B. Analysis and Concluding Findings

Given the timing of relieving DeLeon of his janitorial duties with the vote of employees in favor of the Union, the inference is inescapable that there was a connection between these two events. In addition, DeLeon testified that, when interviewed by Glaza on the day of the election Glaza told him, among other things, "and you know the reason [for his termination], you know, you guys voting for the Union, that was the clincher." Glaza testified that he said, "Rudy, this isn't because of the election; this is just the straw that broke the camel's back."

While the precise words remembered by DeLeon and Glaza differ, the import is the same—while other factors may have been involved, the employees' vote was determinative.

DeLeon was a generally credible witness. The statements attributed by him to Glaza were not denied. Nor did the Respondent deny knowing of DeLeon's involvement with the Union (having discussed the matter with management). And whatever their differences now, on February 12 Glaza was undisputably in charge of the Respondent's Sioux City operation. His words, therefore, stated the Respondent's intent. I therefore conclude that the General Counsel did establish prima facie that the precipitating cause of the Respondent's relieving DeLeon of the janitorial duties was because of his and the other employees' union activity. Thus the burden shifted to the Respondent to prove that it would have relieved DeLeon even absent the union activity. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). I conclude the Respondent failed to meet this burden.

In defense, the Respondent relies on two factual assertions: first, that Senftner had nothing to do with notifying DeLeon on February 12 that he had been relieved of the janitorial work; second, that the decision to relieve DeLeon and replace him with Wilmot predated the election. The first assertion is in direct conflict with the testimony of Glaza. The second is self-serving, uncorroborated, and in conflict with documentary evidence.

Senftner testified that she neither called Glaza election day nor did she talk to him personally, and that was she not physically present in Sioux City on February 12. Her testimony that she was not in Sioux City was corroborated by Helga Van Huef, the Respondent's warranty manager who was in Sioux City on the day of the election.

Senftner testified that prior to the election, she and her husband made the decision to relieve DeLeon of the cleanup work, and give it to Wilmot. This testimony is, of course, self-serving and was not corroborated. To the contrary, after DeLeon had been terminated from the cleanup work the Respondent sought an estimate for this work from a maintenance service. Such action tends to show that no decision had previously been made to take the work from DeLeon and give it to Wilmot or anyone else. It may have been that the Respondent was always seeking to find cheaper cleanup but such does not disapprove the inference I draw of a casual connection between taking the work from DeLeon and the vote of employees for the Union on February 12.

The Respondent contends that Senftner had made the decision to replace DeLeon prior to the election but she had nothing to do with notifying DeLeon on the day of the election that he was being terminated from the janitor job.

While Senftner contends that she did not talk to Glaza on February 12, she did not explain how it was Glaza told DeLeon on February 12 that he no longer had the cleanup work and to turn in his keys. She accepts that DeLeon was relieved because such was the decision of her husband and her. She apparently also accepts the fact that notification came through Glaza since there was no longer a general manager at the Sioux City facility.

To believe that Senftner did not tell Glaza on February 12 to relieve DeLeon would require believing that Glaza did so on his own initiative. While Senftner testified that the decision had already been made to relieve DeLeon, she did not testify that this decision had been communicated to Glaza (or anyone else). Thus, to believe that, Senftner would have to believe that Glaza implemented a decision of the owners without knowing that such a decision had, in fact, been made. Such is incredible. It is far more believable that Senftner contacted Glaza on February 12 and told him that the election had been lost and to get the keys from DeLeon.

Such is the thrust of the testimony of both Glaza and DeLeon. In addition to finding them both generally credible, I also find that Glaza's acting as a conduit for Senftner on February 12 is more consistent with the objective facts in this matter. Thus I conclude that Senftner contacted Glaza on February 12 and told him to relieve DeLeon and that she did so because the employees had voted in favor of representation by the Union. In short, I discredit Senftner's denial that she had any communication with Glaza on February 12. (It may be that Senftner called and was not physically present in Sioux City. Glaza's testimony seems to suggest a personal contact, but it is not really definitive on this point, which, in any event, is tangential.)

I also discount the Respondent's argument that replacing DeLeon with Wilmot was solely for economic reasons. When Wilmot began doing the cleanup work, he substantially ceased doing reconditioning of detail work but he continued to run errands. The Respondent argues that it saved $200 per month by terminating DeLeon, but did not demonstrate how. Indeed, it appears that Wilmot put in 2 to 3 hours a day doing cleanup work, which, at his rate of $4 per hour, amounted to more than $50 per week. And the one-time cleaning by Hotvedt's service was $227.

The Respondent's principal defense is that DeLeon was an independent contractor as to the cleanup work. Hence, he did not have protection of the Act as to that work, and terminating this relationship did not affect his employment. Accepting that he was an independent contractor for this work,[4] he, nevertheless, suffered a loss of earnings because he and other employees voted in favor of the Union. He was undisputedly an employee. His loss of earnings necessarily interfered with his Section 7 rights and those of fellow employees just as surely as if he had been discharged from his bargaining unit job.

The mere fact that an employee also works for his employer as an independent contractor does not mean the employer may with impunity discriminate against that employee, even if the effect of the discrimination relates only to his independent contractor work. The Respondent has cited no case where the Board has permitted such discrimination. To the contrary, the Board has long held that discharge of a nonemployee may be violative of the Act if such interferes with the exercise of protected activity by employees. E.g., Firmat Mfg. Corp., 255 NLRB 1213 (1981), where the discharged individual was not an employee but where his discharge was found to be part of a plan of discrimination against employees. See also Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402 (1982), affd. 711 F.2d 383 (D.C. Cir. 1983), where the Board overruled its "pattern of conduct" standard with regard to the discharge of a supervisor but reaffirmed that such a discharge is violative of Section 8(a)(1) if it interfers with employees' Section 7 rights.

Finally, in Operating Engineers Local 400, 265 NLRB 1316 (1982), the Board found a violation of Section

[4] In the past this work had been done by nonbargaining unit employees as in this industry it often is. DeLeon was paid a flat rate, could work when he pleased, so long as the work was done outside normal business hours, could use helpers, and was not supervised as to the manner and means of doing this work. The Respondent's argument that it did not make payroll deductions is self-serving and is not particularly relevant. Not making payroll deductions proves nothing about their being required.

8(a)(1) when the employer terminated a contract for janitorial services with an individual because her employee husband had engaged in protected activity. Terminating the independent contractor relationship of an employee's wife had a coercive effect on employees. A fortiori terminating the independent contractor relationship of an employee would have a coercive effect on him and other employees.

Accordingly, I conclude that by taking from DeLeon the opportunity to work for the Respondent as a janitor because he and other employees voted for union representation, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act and an appropriate remedy should be ordered.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The effect of the unfair labor practices found above have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent unlawfully terminated DeLeon from his work as a janitor, the Respondent shall be ordered to offer DeLeon reinstatement to this work and to make him whole for any losses he may have suffered as a result of this discrimination against him with interest as provided for in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). Since the janitorial work was in addition to full-time employment, the provisions of F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), do not apply.

Although DeLeon subsequently quit his bargaining unit job, and there is no contention that such resulted from the Respondent's unfair labor practice, it does not follow that the Respondent's backpay liability has been tolled. There is no particular reason to believe that absent the Respondent's discrimination against DeLeon he would also have quit the janitor work. It is just as reasonable to conclude that absent the discrimination he would have continued in both endeavors. Thus I conclude that the Respondent has not met its burden of proving that the backpay period ended in October 1982. Accordingly, the Respondent's liability for backpay continues to run until such time as DeLeon is offered reinstatement to the janitor work. Operating Engineers Local 400, supra.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 31 August 1982 Administrative Law Judge James S. Jenson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Parties filed an answering brief to the Respondent's exceptions and a motion to strike affidavits attached to the Respondent's brief.[2]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by implementing a pulmonary function and audiometric medical screening program for the purpose of denying employment to new employees, without bargaining about the utilization of such results from the program with IBEW Local 46 and Boilermakers Local 104. The Respondent contends, however, in its Exceptions 12 and 13, that the recommended Order of the judge is overly broad, in that it would affect medical programs already in usage; and that it orders Lockheed to bargain about the implementation of medical screening programs generally, as opposed to the implementation and utilization, of such programs for the purpose of terminating new employees or refusing to hire applicants for employment. We find merit in these exceptions. It is clear that the Respondent had informed the Unions of its desire to establish such a program, but for the stated purpose of enabling the Respondent to properly place new employees in jobs within the employees' medical limitations. Thus, the understanding was that the results of such tests would not be used to "wash out," screen, or terminate employment to the tested employees, but only to establish "baseline data" for the new employees. The Unions acquiesced in the program, requesting only that a copy of the test results be furnished to each of the tested employees.

The record is also clear that the Respondent currently has in place with the Unions' approval certain testing programs, including those in "lead-bonding" and "toxic paints." There was no evidence presented, however, that these programs had been utilized to deny employment to, or terminate, any of the Respondent's employees.

While the conclusions of the judge make it clear that the Respondent's violation rests in its use of the medical screening programs for the purpose terminating new employees or refusing to hire applicants for employment, we find that his recommended Order and notice are too restrictive. Accordingly, we shall modify the Order and notice to conform with his conclusions.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Lockheed Shipbuilding and Construction Company, Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraphs 1(a) and (b).

"(a) Refusing to bargain collectively regarding the implementation and/or utilization of a medical screening program for the purpose of terminating

[1] Counsel for the General Counsel filed a motion to transfer Cases 19–CA–15002, 19–CA–15003, and 19–CA–15044, in which a consolidated complaint issued but no hearing has been held, to the Board and to consolidate those cases with Cases 19–CA–13226, 19–CA–13298, 19–CA–13741, and 19–CA–14066. The General Counsel asserts that both sets of cases involve identical factual situations. The Respondent asserts that there are different factual circumstances and different issues. We note particularly that, in its answer to the complaint in Cases 19–CA–15002, 19–CA–15003, and 19–CA–15044 the Respondent raises as an affirmative defense that the "complaint or parts thereof are barred by the statute of limitations contained in Section 10(b) of the Act." We believe that the question of whether the facts and issues are identical and the matter of the 10(b) defense can best be resolved by the administrative law judge if the cases are scheduled for hearing or by the Board on an acceptable stipulation of facts. Therefore it is ordered that the General Counsel's motion to transfer and consolidate is denied.

[2] The Charging Parties have moved to strike the affidavit attached to the Respondent's brief because it contains allegations not introduced into evidence at the hearing. We find, in agreement with the Charging Parties, that since the affidavit was not introduced at the hearing and the parties were denied the opportunity of voir dire and cross-examination, it should not be made a part of the record in this proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Charging Parties' motion to strike the affidavit from the Respondent's brief.

[3] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

new employees and/or refusing to hire applicants for employment.

"(b) Discharging or refusing to hire any person for failure to pass a unilaterally imposed pulmonary function or audiometric medical screening program."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively regarding the implementation and/or utilization of a medical screening program for the purpose of terminating new employees and/or refusing to hire applicants for employment, and other terms and conditions of employment with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 46, AFL–CIO and International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Local 104, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representatives of certain of our employees within the Pacific Coast Master Agreement.

WE WILL NOT discharge or refuse to hire any person for failing to pass a unilaterally imposed pulmonary function or audiometric medical screening program.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively and in good faith with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 46, AFL–CIO and International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Local 104, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representatives of certain of our employees encompassed within the Pacific Coast Master Agreement, with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, including the utilization of a pulmonary function or audiometric medical screening program.

WE WILL offer employment to Adolph Bukacek, Chris Boblet, Laszlo Biro, Donald Rowe, and Bayani Alvarez in the first available job openings for which each is qualified, and make each of them whole for any loss of earnings each may have suffered because of our unlawful conduct, with interest.

LOCKHEED SHIPBUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES S. JENSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Seattle, Washington, on January 21, 1982. The initial consolidated complaint issued on March 31, 1981, pursuant to charges filed in Case 19–CA–13226 and 19–CA–13298 on February 10 and 27, respectively. A second consolidated complaint issued on August 17, 1981, following the filing of the charge in Case 19–CA–13741 on July 20, 1981. The third consolidated complaint issued on December 28, 1981, following the filing of the charge in Case 19–CA–14066 on November 10, 1981. The third consolidated complaint alleges, in substance, that the Respondent unilaterally instituted a medical screening program for new employees, and refused employment to five individuals after undergoing the screening program, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The Respondent denies it violated the Act, and contends there was notice, bargaining and agreement over the implementation of the medical screening program and its effects, or that the Charging Party waived and/or acquiesced in its right to administer the tests and to terminate individuals whose pulmonary conditions could not be accommodated. The implementation of the tests, the Respondent claims, are completely consistent with applicable laws and regulations, the collective-bargaining agreement, and the past practices. All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel, the Respondent, and the Charging Parties, all of which have been carefully considered.

On the entire record, including the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the posthearing briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

It is admitted and found that the Respondent is engaged in the business of operating a shipyard in Seattle, Washington, and that it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

It is admitted and found that International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 46, AFL–CIO and International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Local 104, AFL–CIO are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Setting

The Respondent, through membership in the Pacific Coast Shipbuilders Association, and the Pacific Coast Metal Trades District Council, a bargaining group of various area metal trades councils and international unions, including IBEW Local 46 and Boilermakers Local 104, have been parties to a series of collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent agreement called Pacific Coast Master Agreement, being effective from July 1, 1980, until June 30, 1983.[1] Pertinent sections of the Pacific Coast Master Agreement are set forth below:

Article 3.4 Hiring:

> (c) The Employer retains the right to reject any job applicant referred by the Unions. The Employer may discharge any employee for just and sufficient cause . . . .

Article 14. Reporting Pay and Minimum Pay

> 14.1 Employees starting a shift or called and starting to work after the starting time of a shift shall receive not less than four (4) hours pay for the first period of the shift; and if required to continue on second period of the shift, they shall receive pay for a full shift.
> 14.3 Employees required to report for work and not used shall receive four (4) hours straight time pay.

Article 16. Safety, Sanitation, Ventilation and Physical Examination

> 16.1 The Employer will exert every reasonable effort to provide and maintain safe working conditions and shall comply with all federal and state Safety and Health Laws and Regulations. The Unions will cooperate to that end and encourage their members to work in a safe manner . . . .
> 16.10 Physical Examination: There shall be no Doctor's physical examination nor age limit, except as required by law. Unless required by law, no employee shall be compelled to pay hospital or examination fees in the course of employment or as a condition to secure employment.
> 16.11 Where employees are assigned to work in confined spaces as described by OSHA for shipbuilding, ship repairing and ship scrapping. . . frequent checks for the employees' safety shall be made. . . .
> 16.12. . . Where conditions of work are such as to require special protective devices and equipment in order to protect employees from injury, such devices and equipment will be supplied by the Employer at its expense. . . .

Article 31. Effective Date and Duration of Agreement

> 31.3 All existing practices, customs, understandings or local agreements of interpretation or other local agreements of any nature whatsoever, whether expressly covered by the Master Agreement or otherwise, will continue in effect unchanged until June 30, 1983, except as specifically modified as provided herein or by mutual agreement between the parties.

The complaint alleges that on January 5, 1981, the Respondent, without prior notice to the Unions, "instituted a medical screening program for new employees," and thereafter refused to employ five individuals after they had undergone the screening program. At the conclusion of the hearing, the General Counsel stated its position to be that the Respondent could continue administering the pulmonary function and hearing testing programs involved for the purpose of determining "baseline data," but that the test scores or results could not be used to terminate or refuse to employ anyone. The Charging Parties appear to concur in this position.[2]

The record shows that in the 1974 negotiations, management proposed adding a physical examination provision to the Pacific Coast Master Agreement. That proposal was withdrawn. During the 1980 negotiations, management proposed to change the no physical examination clause in the old contract to permit physicals. The proposal read as follows:

> (a) Applicants for employment may be required to be examined by a physician selected by the Company. The expense of such examination will be borne by the Company. The purpose of such examination shall be to determine the physical fitness of the applicant to safely and efficiently perform the work of the classification for which the applicant is applying.
> (b) The employer shall have the right to require a doctor's medical examination of an employee when, in the employer's opinion, the nature of the work assignment could jeopardize the safety and health of the employee or the employee's co-workers. Failure of the employee to pass the medical examination based on the doctor's evaluation of the employee's condition as related to the work assignment shall result in reassignment of duties (if possible), sick leave (if a temporary condition) or termination. The cost of such medical examinations will be paid by the Employer.

The Unions objected to the proposal which was thereafter withdrawn.

The record shows that in the fall of 1980 the Respondent made arrangements to commence giving pulmonary function and hearing tests to all employees hired or recalled to work on the major overhaul of the ships SS Sacramento in early 1981. Paul Schell, the Respondent's manager of industrial relations, testified that in late November or early December he met with Jack Tinker, then secretary-treasurer of the Seattle Metal Trades Council, and discussed implementation of a "medical screening program." Schell testified that Tinker was concerned that the program would be used "to wash out people and to use it just for an excuse to not hire somebody and I assured him that this was not the procedure that we were going to do, that it's used basically for placement of the person within his medical limitations, if there was a medical limitation." Schell went to assure Tinker that this was not a preemployment physical, and if there was any concern of anybody that they were not employed, they would be paid showup time, as required in the contract."[3] Schell asked Tinker to bring up the matter at the next Metal Trades Council meeting.[4] David Stoner, the Respondent's manager of personnel systems, testified that during the week of November 26, 1980, he informed Carpine that the Respondent was planning to do pulmonary and audiometric testing of employees after they were hired and put on the payroll. Carpine expressed his concern that the procedure constituted a preemployment physical, which Stoner assured him it did not. Stoner also discussed the new pulmonary and audiometric testing procedures with Nathan S. Ford Jr., assistant business manager for the Boilermakers. Ford asked what would happen if someone refused to take, or did not pass, the test. Stoner stated that the test was not intended to screen people for employment, but rather to determine what their lung function was so that the company would have a "handle" on its liabilities with respect to the Longshoremen and Harbor Workers Act. He did not know what would happen if someone refused to be tested. Ford responded that he "understood the company's need to find out what their liabilities were, and I told him that if one of our people did refuse, and if there was any disciplinary action or refusal to employ, then we were going to run into problems at that time, that I would definitely have to challenge that." Ford also discussed the testing procedure in December with John Lane, the Respondent's manager of industrial safety, who explained the purpose of the testing procedures. Ford asked what would happen if someone did not pass the test, and was told "that there was no real passing of the test, that the test merely told what the lung function in approximately four or five different areas was . . . ." Asked what would happen if someone refused to submit to the test, Lane replied, "There were no definite plans . . . they would basically have to wait and see." Ford testified that during several later discussions he was advised that the company was trying to bring people back to work and the test was not for the purpose of eliminating people from work.

Carpine reported the substance of his conversation with Schell to the Seattle Metal Trades Council Executive Board at its next meeting. The board minutes contain the following notation:

> W. D. Carpine handed out letter from Lockheed Shipbuilding re man power needed for U.S.N.S. Sacramento. He also explained that rehires or new employees will be required to take hearing and breath test. Will be on employer's payroll during this period. This test will not be used to deny employment per company.
> Discussion prevailed re testing by company doctor. The Seattle Metal Trades will write a letter stating employees be given written test results.

In accordance with the minutes, Tinker wrote Schell the following letter dated December 10:

> Dear Mr. Schell:
> Mr. Bill Carpine has advised us that effective January 1, 1981 you will be requesting additional manpower from all crafts. Also, we have been advised that it is the intention of the company that certain tests be given, specifically hearing and pulmonary.
> We understand it is the company's intention that each employee given this test will be on the existing payroll and will be paid according to the report pay provision in the Agreement during the time of testing.
> The one area of our concern at this point in time is in regard to test results. We are, therefore, requesting that any results obtained in this test be given to the individual employee for his own personal records. Also, it is our intention that we do not consider this a preemployment physical and hopefully that the employer concurs with our thinking in this matter.
> If you have any questions, feel free to give me a call.

Carpine testified the Unions had experienced problems in the past which resulted in the filing of grievances for showup pay, where people had spent considerable time in interviews and waiting around and were denied employment.

Arrangements were made for the test results to be given to each employee.[5] In addition, Schell invited the representatives of several unions, including Tinker and Carpine, to review the working of the pulmonary function testing facility on December 19. Arrangements were made for the consulting physician to be present to answer questions and explain the procedure. No union representatives showed up.

B. Implementation of the Testing Procedures

The testing program was implemented on January 5, 1981, with the commencement of hiring of people to work on the Sacramento project. The procedure followed was for individuals dispatched by the Unions to report to the personnel office where they completed an application, and were interviewed or screened for qualifications and medical limitations. Those who qualified were then placed on the payroll, assigned a badge number, given a timecard, and directed to the medical facility where a medical specialist administered the hearing and pulmonary function tests. Indoctrination and job placement followed. Those individuals receiving an unacceptable lung function score were referred to Respondent's physician, a pulmonary specialist, who reviewed all available information and established work restrictions or exposure limitations, which could require use of a respirator or assignment in an area free of respiratory irritants. A determination was then made as to whether a work assignment consistent with the doctor's recommendation could be made. Of approximately 1800 people who took the pulmonary test in 1981, approximately 16 failed to pass it but where put to work with restrictions imposed by the doctor. The five individuals involved failed to receive an acceptable test score and, consequently, medical restrictions were imposed on each.

[3] Art. 14 of Pacific Coast Master Agreement.

[4] Tinker did not testify. However, William D. Carpine, business representative for the IBEW and also president of the Seattle Metal Trades Council, testified that he had a conversation with Schell around the end of November. The substance of the Schell–Tinker and Carpine–Schell conversations is substantially the same.

[5] When in January 1981 it was learned that only those who failed the pulmonary function test received copies of the results, an immediate correction was made.

A week or two after Respondent implemented the test, Ford received complaints that Respondent was asking employees to sign a form for release of all personal medical information. On January 20, 1981, a meeting was held between representatives of both the Respondent and the Seattle Metal Trades Council at which the Unions objected to the use of several new forms. Carpine took the position that the medical release forms, together with the new pulmonary function and hearing tests, constituted a physical examination which was prohibited under the Pacific Coast Master Agreement.[6] The question was asked as to what would happen if an individual refused to sign the medical release form, and the response was that the Company was not requiring people to sign the forms, that several had declined to sign and nothing had been done about it, but the Company would review the forms and see if they could make them less objectionable. According to Schell, the question was asked as to what would happen to an individual who failed the screening test and the Company responded that it would make an effort to place the individual within the doctor's work restrictions. According to both Carpine and Ford, at the end of the meeting Carpine objected to the testing program on the ground it constituted a prejob physical examination.

On January 29, 1981, Tinker wrote Schell the following letter:

> Dear Mr. Schell:
> This letter is in regard to our meeting with you on January 20, 1981. Specifically, during that meeting we discussed the company's request that new employees complete various forms pertaining to and entitled as follows: Medical History, Supplemental Questionnaire, Lung Fungus [sic] History, and Absence of Tool Clearance Policy.
> Also, during the course of that meeting, we informed you that in recognizing that the company had previously approached the Seattle Metal Trades Council in regard to implementing two items, which were basically pulmonary and hearing tests, we are again reiterating that we object to these additional forms mentioned above.
> You stated (at the meeting on January 20th) that management would review the matter and respond. To date, we have not heard from you, and we would appreciate your response as soon as possible.

On February 9, Schell responded as follows:

> Dear Mr. Tinker:
> In response to your letter dated January 29, 1981 and our meeting of January 20, 1981, the Company has reviewed this matter and feels that these forms, medical history and lung function, are necessary in the placing of an employee should he have medical disability.
> The supplemental questionnaire is not a form that is completed by the employees, but one that is filled out if required by the personnel interviewer.
> Your letter made mention of a form that employees complete regarding absence of tool clearance policy. I feel this was clarified in our meeting of January 20, 1981. There is no form for this other than a statement in our employee information sheet. This statement has been extracted from Article 18.2 of the Pacific Coast Master Agreement.
> Should you or any member of the Council have any question regarding this matter, please contact me.

C. The Terminations

Adolph Bukacek, who had never before been employed by the Respondent, was dispatched by IBEW Local 46 on January 16, 1981. After failing the pulmonary function test, he was reviewed by the Respondent's physician who restricted his work to areas free of fumes and dust and that did not involve exertion. An attempt to place him in a job within those restrictions was unsuccessful. He was therefore paid "showup" pay in accordance with the contract and released.

Chris Boblet, a former employee, was dispatched by Boilermakers Local 104 on February 13, 1981. Having failed to pass the pulmonary function test, he was reviewed by the company physician who placed similar restrictions on the work he could perform. An attempt to place him in a job within those restrictions was unsuccessful that day and he was therefore paid "showup" pay and released without having performed any work tasks.

Laszlo Biro, a former employee, was dispatched by Boilermakers Local 104 on July 1, 1981, and failed the pulmonary function test. He was dispatched that afternoon to a swing shift job and asked to return the following day for an evaluation by Respondent's physician. He did not return. He was, however, dispatched again by the Union on October 14, 1981, again failed the pulmonary function test, restrictions against work involving "excessive smoke, fumes, toxic chemicals" were imposed, and he was released with "showup" pay after it was determined no work was available within the restrictions.

[6] Art. 16.10.

Donald Rowe was dispatched by Boilermakers Local 104 on August 19, 1981. Schell, whose testimony was based on personnel files, testified that Rowe had a low pulmonary function test score, that as a consequence he was restricted to working with a respirator, that work was available to Rowe if he wore a respirator, but that Rowe declined to do so. Rowe, whom I credit, testified that he had worked as a "fitter" at Todd Shipyard until he was laid off in June 1981, and that he wore a respirator while working at Todd about 50 percent of the time. After he was dispatched by the Union to the Respondent, he was given the pulmonary function test and told he had a low rating. He was asked, and consented, to take an x-ray. Rowe testified the Respondent's physician said he recommended he be hired. He was sent back to the individual who had given him the pulmonary function test originally and was asked if he would take it again. He did and was informed his rating was too low, that the work required that he wear a respirator, which he would not be able to do, and that he could not be hired. He was taken back to the personnel office where he turned in the timecard that had been issued to him, and was released with "showup" pay. On August 25 he was dispatched back to Todd Shipyard where he was working at the time of the hearing. He wears a respirator about 7 out of every 8 hours or work.

Bayani Alvarez was dispatched by Boilermakers Local 104 on August 27, 1981, failed the pulmonary function test, was seen by the doctor who placed restrictions on the work he could perform, an attempt to find work within the restrictions was unsuccessful, and he was paid for "showup" time and released.

Unsuccessful attempts to resolve the issue raised by the unfair labor practice charges involving Bukacek and Boblet were made in April 1981. A further unsuccessful effort was made to resolve the issue through the "contract interpretation committee," who recommended the issue be resubmitted under article 16.10 of the Pacific Coast Master Agreement instead of article 3.4(c). No further action has been taken by either side in this respect.

Lane testified that in January 1981, when the Respondent commenced administering the pulmonary function test, the Respondent "had seven projects—ships—where" employees could have worked, three of which "could have had some lead exposure . . . . We did not do pulmonary functions on existing work force . . . . Just the returning members, either with seniority or without . . . . We screened them without regard to assignment, because the probability of exposure to any person working in ship repair is fairly great during his employment with us."

Conclusions

The Respondent argues it did not violate the Act by implementing the medical testing program or by terminating individuals whose pulmonary conditions could not be accommodated because (1) there was notice, bargaining, and agreement over the implementation of the testing program and its effects; (2) the Charging Parties waived and/or acquiesced in its right to administer the tests and to terminate employees; and (3) the implementation of the program was in accordance with applicable laws and regulations, the Master Agreement, and past practices.

The evidence, in my view, does not support the Respondent's contention that the charging Unions agreed that the testing programs could be utilized to reject or terminate employees, or that they waived or acquiesced in the Respondent's use of the testing programs to terminate employees. A recap of the evidence makes this abundantly clear.

In late November or early December 1980, Schell discussed implementation of the testing program with Tinker, who expressed concern that it would be used "to wash out people" and as an excuse "not to hire somebody." Schell assured Tinker his fear was unfounded and that it would be used "basically for placement of the persons within his medical limitation." About the same time Stoner discussed the matter with Carpine who expressed concern that the testing procedure constituted a preemployment physical, which Stoner assured him it did not. Stoner also discussed the new procedure with Ford. Ford asked what would happen if someone did not pass the test, and Stoner assured him the tests were not intended to screen people for employment, but rather to determine their lung function so that the Company could establish its liabilities under the Longshoremen and Harbor Workers Act. Ford recognized the Respondent's need to establish its liabilities under that Act, but went on to state that if the testing procedure resulted in disciplinary action or refusal to employ, he was opposed to it. Lane also told Ford that there was "no real passing of the test, that the test merely told what the lung function in approximately four to five different areas was . . . ." Ford was told on several occasions that the Company was trying to bring people back to work and that the test was not for the purpose of eliminating people from work. The minutes of the Seattle Metal Trades Council executive board reveal the Unions' understanding that "This test will not be used to deny employment per company." This same theme is reiterated in Tinker's December 10 letter to Schell, where it is stated "Also, it is our intention that we do not consider this a preemployment physical and hopefully that the employer concurs with our thinking in this matter." As late as January 20, 1981, prior to any knowledge on the part of the Unions that Bukacek had been refused employment after undergoing the pulmonary screening program, Carpine opposed the testing program on the ground it constituted a physical examination which was prohibited by article 16.10 of the Pacific Coast Master Agreement. Moreover, in his February 9, 1981 letter, Schell informed Tinker that the medical forms, medical history, and pulmonary test were "necessary in the placing of an employee should he have a medical disability." (Emphasis added.) Thus, while the Unions were indeed notified of Respondent's proposed screening program and did not oppose implementation of the testing procedures for the purposes of determining the Respondent's liabilities under the Longshoremen and Harbor Workers Act, it is clear the Unions did not agree that the pulmonary and audiometric tests could be used to screen out, reject, terminate, or deny employment as claimed by the Respondent. To the contrary, the foregoing facts show the Unions steadfastly opposed their use for those purposes, and were lead by the Respondent to believe that they would not be so used. Therefore, the Respondent's contention that the Unions waived or acquiesced in the use of the tests to terminate employees is without merit.

Article 16.10 provides explicitly that "There shall be no Doctor's physical examination . . . except as required by law . . . ." The Respondent argues that article 16 does not in any way preclude medical testing, review of medical test results by the company physicians, or the imposition of medical restrictions by the company physician. It is argued that articles 16.11 and 16.12 require that "frequent checks for the employee's safety shall be made," and that the employer shall provide special protective devices where conditions of work require employees to be protected from injury. In this regard, it is noted that in 1975, pursuant to Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA) regulations, the Respondent administered a "pre-placement physical" to long-term employees who were assigned to a new trade called "lead-bonder." There was no showing any employees were terminated as a result of failing to pass that examination. Beginning in 1977, a similar type examination was instituted for painters working in "tanks" and "bottoms" and other areas where toxic paints were used. The painters' physical examinations were not required by law or regulation but were administered pursuant to an agreement with the painters' collective-bargaining representative. Again, there is no evidence the tests were used to reject employees or terminate employment. Other instances where physical examinations are performed on employees are: (1) when a newly hired worker indicates on a medical questionnaire that there is a preexisting disability, in which case he is examined so that he can be assigned to a job consistent with his physical abilities; (2) all workers who are injured or become ill on the job are examined by the doctor; and (3) workers who have been off work because of an injury or illness are examined by the company doctor before returning to work. In short, there is no evidence that any physical examination heretofore performed by the Respondent, whether required by law or regulation or past practice, has even been used to disqualify workers from employment. Further, the Respondent's argument that the pulmonary and audiometric tests administered here were conducted pursuant to OSHA regulations has a hollow ring, when it is remembered that only new or returning employees were required to undergo the tests—the existing workforce was not required to undergo the tests.

The history of bargaining between the parties makes it obvious that physical examinations have been a point of bargaining contention on several occasions, in 1974, and as late as 1980, when the Respondent proposed a provision granting it the right, inter alia, to terminate an employee for failure to pass a medical examination based on a doctors' evaluation of the employee's condition as related to the work assignment. Upon objection by the Unions, the proposal was withdrawn. It seems obvious to me that what the Respondent could not obtain through collective bargaining, it decided to implement unilaterally. It terminated five employees for their "failure . . . to pass the medical examination based on the doctor's evaluation of the employee's condition as related to the work assignment."[7] Physical examinations being a mandatory subject of bargaining,[8] and the Respondent having failed to show that the Unions either agreed to or waived and/or acquiesced in the Respondent's use of the pulmonary and audiometric testing program for the purpose of terminating or refusing to employ employees, or that the testing program was in accordance with applicable laws and regulations, the Master Agreement or past practices, it is found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by implementing the pulmonary and auditory tests for the purpose of screening out, or disqualifying employees from employment. See, e.g., Hanes Corp., 260 NLRB 557 (1982). In these circumstances, the refusal to employ Bukacek on January 16, 1981; Boblet on February 13, 1981; Biro on October 14, 1981;[9] Rowe on August 19, 1981; and Alvarez on August 1981, because they failed to pass the pulmonary test, also violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Conclusions of Law

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. IBEW Local 46 and Boilermakers Local 104 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, and at all times material, each union has been and is now the exclusive bargaining representative of certain of the Respondent's employees.

3. By unilaterally implementing and enforcing a medical screening program for the purpose of denying employment to new employees, and by denying employment to Adolph Bukacek, Chris Boblet, Laszlo Biro, Donald Rowe, and Bayani Alvarez, the Respondent has refused to bargain with IBEW Local 46 and Boilermakers Local 104 in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Remedy

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. It having been found that the Respondent has unlawfully refused to bargain with the two Unions by unilaterally implementing and utilizing a medical screening program for the purpose of denying employment to new employees, it is recommended that the Respondent cease such unlawful conduct and offer employment to Adolph Bukacek, Chris Boblet, Laszlo Biro, Donald Rowe, and Bayani Alvarez in the first available job openings for which each is qualified and make each of them whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of the Respondent's discrimination against them. Loss of earnings for all individuals shall be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[7] See the Respondent's 1980 contract proposal, supra.

[8] See, e.g., LeRoy Machine Co., 147 NLRB 1431 (1964).

[9] The record does not support the allegation that Biro was refused employment on July 1, 1981, after undergoing the screening program. It is undisputed that on that date he was asked to return the following day for an evaluation by the Respondent's physician, which he failed to do. The testimony shows, however, that other individuals were in fact placed in jobs within the physicians's restrictions. Thus, the record fails to show Biro would not have been employed, or was refused employment, in July because of his failure to pass the pulmonary test.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

The Respondent, Lockheed Shipbuilding and Construction Company, Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively regarding the implementation and utilization of a medical screening program for new employees and/or applicants for employment.

(b) Discharging or refusing to hire any person for failure to pass a unilaterally imposed pulmonary function, audiometric or other type of physical examination or medical screening program.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which will effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively and in good faith with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 46, AFL–CIO and International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Local 104, AFL–CIO concerning wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of its employees and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a written agreement.

(b) Offer employment to Adolph Bukacek, Chris Boblet, Laszlo Biro, Donald Rowe, and Bayani Alvarez in the first available job openings for which each is qualified, and make each of them whole for any loss of earnings each may have suffered by reason of the Respondent's unlawful conduct herein in the manner set forth in the section entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Post at its shipyard in Seattle, Washington, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees and applicants for employment are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by theRespondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[10] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Atlas Glass & Mirror Company and Glaziers Local Union #1776. Case 16–CA–11309

10 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 24 February 1984 Administrative Law Judge Leonard N. Cohen issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a motion to strike the Respondent's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Atlas Glass & Mirror Company, Dale City, Oklahoma, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Substitute the following as paragraph 2(c).

"(c) Resume making contributions to the pension program as it existed prior to the unilateral discontinuance of such contributions on 19 September 1983 for the employees in the above-described unit, make them whole for any losses or expenses they may have suffered as a result of this unilateral change, and pay into the appropriate fund all contributions it has failed to pay by reason of the unilateral change, in the manner described in 'The Remedy,' as modified by this decision."

[1] We grant the General Counsel's motion to strike the Respondent's exceptions to the extent that the exceptions attempt to introduce evidence that is neither in the record nor claimed to be newly discovered.

[2] We modify the remedy recommended by the judge to provide that the question of whether the Respondent must pay any additional amounts to the pension fund to satisfy our "make whole" remedy will be left to the compliance stage as set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

LEONARD N. COHEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me on January 9, 1984, in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. The complaint which was based on unfair labor practice charges filed on September 26, 1983,[1] issued on November 14 and alleges that Respondent Atlas Glass & Mirror Company violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by unilaterally repudiating a collective-bargaining agreement in effect between it and Glaziers Local Union #1776. Respondent timely filed an answer in which it denied the commission of any violation of the Act.

All parties have been afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. The General Counsel filed a brief which has been carefully considered.

On the entire record of this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a sole proprietorship with an office and principal place of business in Del City, Oklahoma, where it is engaged in the construction industry as a glazing contractor. During the past 12 months, a representative period, Respondent in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received at its Del City, Oklahoma facility products, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Oklahoma. Accordingly, Respondent admits and I find and conclude that Respondent is now and has been at all times material herein an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

Although Respondent did not admit that the Union was a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, it did not challenge the stipulated testimony of Business Manager George Hite that he negotiates on the Union's behalf collective-bargaining agreements with area employers and that the Union admits to membership employees engaged in the glazing craft and processes their grievances. Clearly, the Union meets the statutory definition and I, therefore, find and conclude that it is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The facts are not in dispute. On July 29, 1981, Respondent by its owner Johnny Gwin and the Union by its business manager Hite entered into a collective-bargaining agreement covering Respondent's outside glaziers.[2] This agreement which has a term of July 30, 1981

[1] Unless otherwise indicated, all dates refer to 1983.

[2] During the term of the contract, Respondent employed four regular full-time journeymen glaziers; Junior Logan, Calvin Gwin, the son of owner Johnny Gwin, Allen Bohanon, the son-in-law of Johnny Gwin, and Harold Cox, the working foreman. Respondent also employed Brent Cox, Harold Cox's son, as a full-time apprentice glazier. On occasion over the last several years, Respondent has employed as many as eight to August 12, 1984, provides, inter alia, for a wage scale, a union shop, a checkoff of union dues, and monthly employer payments to the Union's pension fund.

The first hint of a problem occurred in February when Gwin and Hite discussed the Union's plan to attempt to recover some of the work that the Union had lost over the years to nonunion employers. During this discussion, Gwin commented that he hoped that the Union's plan would be successful, for if it were not, Respondent might have to go nonunion.

In June, Gwin informed Foreman Harold Cox that Respondent was in a money bind and could not continue to meet its payroll. As a consequence, Gwin stated that Respondent was going to have to lay off everyone for 2 to 3 weeks. While Cox was never recalled, it appears that Respondent recalled its other employees within a few weeks of their initial layoff.

On Friday, September 16, Hite happened to visit Respondent's shop at Del City. During a brief discussion with Gwin, Hite was told that since the Union's recovery program had failed, he could no longer compete with nonunion shops and pay the type of wages called for by the collective-bargaining agreement. Gwin announced, therefore, that commencing the following Monday, September 19, he would open up as a nonunion operation. Hite suggested they take the matter before the Union's executive board in an effort to see if they could not satisfactorily resolve it. Gwin did not respond to Hite's suggestion.

On Monday, September 19, Hite again visited Respondent's shop and spoke to Gwin. Gwin informed Hite that he was henceforth operating as a nonunion company and then added that Hite had just missed seeing one of his employees who had picked up his tools and quit over this decision. Hite discussed the situation with Gwin for a few minutes longer but, when he was unable to get Gwin to change his mind, he then left the premises. Since that time Respondent has ceased making any payments to the Union as required by the collective-bargaining agreement and has operated without reference to any of its other terms and conditions.

In its amended answer, Respondent raises two items as affirmative defenses. First, Respondent asserts that the collective-bargaining agreement was in fact breached not by it but by the Union "by means of [the Union's] negligently and carelessly furnishing labor and workmen that were unskilled and unwilling to perform the duties by which they were represented that they would furnish by contract to perform glazing work. By reason thereof, Respondent has been damaged several thousand dollars in replacement, materials, rework jobs, loss of business reputation, and diminishing business relationship." Second, Respondent asserts that the current economic market permitted Respondent's competitors to pay less wages while at the same time providing a better quality and quantity of service, and that as a result thereof, Respondent could no longer continue in business operating under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement.

Respondent called no witnesses nor offered any documentary evidence in support of these or any other defenses that it wished to assert before the Board. The evidence as developed through the questioning of the General Counsel's witnesses indicates, as to Respondent's first above-cited affirmative defense, that the Union did not refer or otherwise furnish any workmen to Respondent. While the collective-bargaining agreement neither contains provisions for an exclusive hiring hall or a referral system, the Union does provide as a service to both individuals and employers an informal referral service. On one unspecified occasion sometime during the life of the contract, Gwin called Hite and asked him for the names of glaziers who were then currently out of work. Hite supplied Gwin with the names of the only three individuals he was then aware were unemployed. Gwin subsequently hired two of the three for an indeterminate period of employment.

At no time during the entire term of the contract did Gwin ever complain to Hite about the quality or quantity of work performed by any employee of Respondent. Hite was told on one occasion by employee Junior Logan that Gwin was having some trouble with the work that some of the people were doing. However, Logan neither identified by name nor specified by job duties (inside/outside) who was causing these problems. Harold Cox, the outside working foreman until June of this year, testified that in late 1982 one employee had left a job in such bad shape that Cox had to go back to the jobsite and redo the work.[3] Cox further testified that, other than this situation, Gwin had only complained to him about the work of one other employee, that being Junior Logan. Cox stated that on several occasions Gwin indicated to him that he felt Logan was taking too long on certain jobs. Logan is still employed by Respondent.

With regard to Respondent's second above-mentioned affirmative defense, there is no showing on this record that paying the union wages as called for in the collective-bargaining agreement placed Respondent in a position where it could no longer compete with nonunion operations. Gwin's self-serving statements to Cox and Hite to this effect are simply not appropriate substitutes for provable facts.

Section 8(d) of the Act provides in pertinent part that where a collective-bargaining contract is in effect, no party shall terminate or modify it unless he or she offers to meet and confer with the other party for the purpose of negotiating a new contract or a contract containing the proposed modifications. Gwin's action in simply informing the Union on a Friday that it intended to open "non-union" on the following Monday hardly meets this standard. Even if Gwin's naked assertion that economic exigencies forced him to take drastic action to get out from under the suffocating provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement could be proved, it would not excuse Respondent's total and sudden repudiation of its additional journeymen and/or apprentice glaziers on a temporary basis as required to perform the outside work on a particular jobsite.

The two full-time shop employees were not covered by this contract and are not part of the appropriate unit.

[3] The record does not disclose how this individual came to be hired by Respondent. His name was not one of the three supplied by the Union to Respondent.

collective-bargaining agreement.[4] By this conduct Respondent has unilaterally effectuated changes in the terms and conditions of employment by reducing wages and other fringe benefits, by failing to make deductions for union dues from employees' pay pursuant to the checkoff provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement and by its subsequent failure to tender such payments to the Union and by discontinuing Respondent's contributions to the employee pension program. Accordingly, I find that Respondent has since September 19, 1983, and at all times thereafter, failed and refused to bargain collectively and in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees and that by such refusal Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) of the Act.[5]

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act. Accordingly, having found that Respondent about September 19, 1983, unilaterally reduced wages and other fringe benefits, I shall recommend that it be ordered to restore these benefits as they existed prior to the unilateral changes and to make unit employees whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered as a result of the unilateral changes, with interest. Having found further that Respondent about September 19, 1983, unilaterally failed to make deductions for union dues from employees' wages pursuant to the checkoff provisions of the contract and subsequently failed to tender such payments to the Union, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to restore making such deductions and payments and that it further be ordered to make the Union whole for any loss of payments due to its unilateral action. Finally, having found that Respondent about September 19, 1983, unilaterally discontinued making contributions to the employee pension program, I shall recommend that it be ordered to restore making such payments and to make whole the unit employees for any losses or expenses they may have suffered as a result of the unilateral change and to pay into the appropriate fund all those contributions it has failed to pay as a result of the unilateral change, with interest. Backpay and interest thereon shall be computed in the manner prescribed by Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. All journeymen and apprentice glaziers employed by Respondent at its Del City, Oklahoma location, excluding all other employees, including guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(d) of the Act.
4. Since about July 29, 1981, the above-named labor organization has been, and is now, the recognized and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the act.
5. By refusing about September 19, 1983, to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the aforesaid unit by unilaterally reducing wages and fringe benefits, by failing to make deductions for union dues from employees' wages pursuant to the checkoff provisions of the contract and by failing to tender such payments to the Union, and by discontinuing its contributions to the employee pension program, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(d) of the Act.
6. By the aforesaid refusal to bargain, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced, and is interfering with, restraining, and coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act and thereby has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.
7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

The Respondent, Atlas Glass & Mirror Company, Del City, Oklahoma, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with employees of Atlas Glass & Mirror Company as the exclusive representative of its employees in the unit described below by unilaterally reducing wages and other fringe benefits, by failing to make deductions for union dues from employees' wages pursuant to the checkoff provisions of the agreement and by failing to tender such payments to the Union, and by discontinuing its contributions to the employee pension program. The appropriate unit is all journeymen and apprentice glaziers employed by Respondent at its Del City, Oklahoma location, excluding all other employees, including guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is designed to effectuate the policies and purposes of the Act.

(a) Restore the wage rates and other fringe benefits as they existed prior to the unilateral changes on September 19, 1983, to the employees in the aforesaid unit and make them whole for any losses or expenses they may have suffered by reason of the unilateral changes in the manner described in "The Remedy."

(b) Restore making deductions for union dues from employees' wages pursuant to the checkoff provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement, forward such payments to the Union, and make the Union whole for any loss of payments in the manner described in "The Remedy."

(c) Restore making contributions to the pension program as it existed prior to the unilateral discontinuance of such contributions on September 19, 1983, for the employees in the aforesaid unit, make them whole for any losses or expenses they may have suffered as a result of this unilateral change, and pay into the appropriate fund all contributions it has failed to pay by reason of the unilateral change in the manner described in "The Remedy."

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examining and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its Del City, Oklahoma facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 16, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days of the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to present evidence and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board has found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with Glaziers Local Union #1776 as the exclusive representative of the employees in the unit described below by unilaterally reducing wages and other fringe benefits, by failing to make deductions for union dues from employees' wages pursuant to the checkoff provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement, and by discontinuing contributions to the employee pension program.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

We will restore the wage rate and other fringe benefits as they existed prior to our unilateral changes thereof and make our employees in the unit described below whole for any losses or expenses they may have suffered by reason of our unilateral changes, with interest.

WE WILL resume making deductions from employees' wages for union dues pursuant to the checkoff provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement, and WE WILL in the future tender such payments to the Union and WE WILL tender to the Union all payments we have failed to make.

WE WILL resume making contributions to the pension program as they existed prior to our discontinuance thereof and make our employees in the unit described below whole for any losses or expenses they may have suffered as a result of such discontinuance, with interest, and WE WILL pay into the appropriate fund all contributions we have failed to make. The appropriate unit is:

> All journeymen and apprentice glaziers employed by Respondent at its Del City, Oklahoma, location, excluding all other employees, including guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

This case[1] raises the issue of whether a union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by attempting to cause the discharge of 11 employees hired after the commencement of an economic strike. The administrative law judge found that the Respondent violated those sections of the Act by attempting to cause the discharge of nine of these employees. Our review of the record and of relevant precedent leads us to conclude that the General Counsel has failed to meet its burden of proving that the Respondent unlawfully attempted to cause the discharge of any employee. We, accordingly, shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

According to the credited testimony,[2] the pertinent facts are as follows. From 12 June 1981 until 21 July 1981, the Respondent was involved in an economic strike against the Employer. In order to continue its operations, the Employer advertised and hired 11 employees before the end of July, including the Charging Parties, John Kelley and Albert Kelley, hired 31 July. The record does not provide the identity or date of hire of any of the other nine employees. In the meantime, on 21 July, the strike ended and all striking employees soon returned to work.

It is undisputed that the National Electrical Contractors Association (NECA), the employer-association of which the Employer had been a member since 1977,[3] and the Respondent executed a "Return-to-Work Agreement" bearing an "Approved" date of 21 July 1981. This agreement provides in pertinent part:

> Upon ratification of a new collective-bargaining agreement between I.B.E.W. Local Union No. 11 and Contractors represented by the Los Angeles Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association, the following procedures shall govern the return to work of employees of the employer-contractor on the conclusion of the work stoppage.
> 1. Contractors shall first recall to employment those employees who were dispatched by Local 11 to that contractor, and were employed on the job on the date of work stoppage;
> 2. If such employees choose not to return, or are unavailable, or are not sufficient to meet the contractors' [sic] need, the contractor shall resort to the appropriate Local Union hiring hall to request additional employees in accord with the contractual dispatch rules;
> 3. Employees hired by contractors during the work stoppage may report to the appropriate Local Union hiring hall and may, if qualified under the regular procedures of the contractual dispatch procedure, register for dispatch from Local Union 11.

It is also undisputed that NECA and the Respondent entered a new collective-bargaining agreement which provides in pertinent part:

> Sec. 4.05(a). The Union shall maintain a register of applicants for employment . . . .
> Sec. 4.06. If the registration list is exhausted and the Local Union is unable to refer applicants for employment . . . the Employer shall be free to secure applicants without using the Referral Procedure but, such applicants, if hired, shall have the status of "temporary employees." . . .
> Sec. 4.07. The Employer shall notify the Business Manager promptly . . . of such "temporary employees" and shall replace such "temporary employees" as soon as registered applicants for employment are available under the Referral Procedure.

Beginning in mid-August and continuing until the end of December 1981, the Respondent attempted to cause the Employer to discharge the employees hired after the commencement of the strike, contending that because they were not referred by the hiring hall, they were temporary em-

[1] On 16 December 1983, Administrative Law Judge Jesse Kleiman issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the Charging Parties filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

[2] The Respondent and the Charging Parties have each excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] According to the uncontradicted testimony of the Employer's president Timothy Anderson, the Employer has a letter of assent with NECA by which it is bound to agreements negotiated on its behalf.

ployees and subject to discharge pursuant to the above provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement. (Pursuant to these demands, the Respondent also dispatched unsolicited referrals to the Employer's jobsites.) The Employer responded that these employees were not temporary within the meaning of the contract, but were instead permanent replacements hired during the strike and covered by the return-to-work agreement.

The judge properly found that the lawfulness of the Respondent's actions depends on whether the employees it sought to discharge are permanent replacements hired during the strike or employees hired after the strike at a time when the new collective-bargaining agreement was in effect. If the employees are permanent replacements, then the Respondent's attempt to discharge them is, for the reasons as stated by the judge, a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2). Alternatively, if the employees were hired after the strike at a time when the collective-bargaining agreement was in effect, the Respondent's attempt to discharge them is a lawful exercise of its contractual right to replace temporary employees with employees referred through the Respondent's hiring hall.

Based on the credited testimony, the judge found that the strike ended 21 July. He further found that the collective-bargaining agreement was effective 22 July 1981.[4] He found, therefore, that John and Albert Kelley, who were hired 31 July, were hired after the strike had ended and at a time when the collective-bargaining agreement was in effect. He, accordingly, reasoned that they were temporary employees under the collective-bargaining agreement and thus lawfully subject to replacement under the hiring hall terms of the agreement. On this basis, he recommended dismissal of the allegations that the Respondent violated the Act by demanding that John and Albert Kelley be discharged and by dispatching referrals to the Employer's jobsites for this purpose.[5] We agree.

With respect to the nine other employees, however, the judge found that it is reasonable to assume that some if not all were hired before the strike ended on 21 July. He based this assumption on President Anderson's testimony that the Employer's operations had "virtually ceased" at the start of the strike on 12 June and that from that date forward it was compelled to hire employees to replace the strikers in order to maintain its business. Relying on this assumption, he concluded that the nine employees were permanent replacements for economic strikers and that, therefore, the Respondent could not lawfully demand their discharge as temporary employees under the hiring hall provisions of its collective-bargaining agreement. The judge, accordingly, concluded that the Respondent unlawfully attempted to cause the discharge of these employees, including by the dispatching of unsolicited referrals to the Employer's jobsites. We do not agree.

There is no evidence of the dates of hire of any of the nine employees. Anderson testified that the Employer began advertising positions after the strike began on 12 June and that the nine employees were hired by 31 July. There is no evidence that these employees were any different from the Kelleys, who were hired after the strike ended. The judge's assumption that these employees were hired while the strike was in progress is unsubstantiated conjecture. Consequently, his finding that the nine employees were not subject to a lawful demand for discharge under either the return-to-work agreement or the collective-bargaining agreement is also unsubstantiated conjecture and not properly a basis for a finding of a violation of the Act.

It is well settled that when a union attempts to cause the discharge of an employee it has the burden of proving that this action was necessary to the effective performance of its function of representing its constituency.[6] Here, the Respondent showed that it executed a valid "Return-to-Work Agreement" with the Association of which the Employer is a member on 21 July 1981 and no party to this proceeding challenges the fact that this agreement was legally binding on the parties signatory thereto. The Respondent also showed that it had a hiring hall arrangement in effect with the Employer on 22 July. By demonstrating that it was making the discharge demands pursuant to hiring hall provisions, the Respondent met its burden.[7] The General Counsel's burden is to substantiate that any of the employees whom the Respondent attempted to have discharged were hired at a time when the hiring hall provisions were not in effect or under conditions by which they were exempt. As noted above, the General Counsel presented no evidence of the dates of hire of any of the nine employees. He made no affirmative showing that any of these employees were hired before the strike ended. He, consequently, has failed to establish by a preponderance of evidence that the Respondent's attempt to discharge employees was unlawful. We, therefore, reverse the judge on this issue and shall dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

[4] He noted there was no evidence that the collective-bargaining agreement was backdated or not signed on its effective date. The Charging Parties contend that the agreement was not in effect on the date they were hired. However, the record substantiates that the Respondent and the Employer were bound by a collective-bargaining agreement, with hiring hall provisions whose validity has not been challenged, with an effective date of 22 July 1981. This agreement, which by its own terms is effective as of 22 July 1981, was presented into evidence as a joint exhibit of the Respondent and the General Counsel. The Charging Parties did not object to its acceptance into the record. They did not then, nor do they now, offer any evidence to show that the agreement was backdated or not in effect on its stated effective date.

[5] No contention was made that the content or operation of the hiring hall provisions with regard to any of the 11 employees was unlawful.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JESSE KLEIMAN, Administrative Law Judge. On the basis of charges filed by John G. Kelley, an individual,[1] and Albert E. Kelley, an individual,[2] on October 22, 1981,[3] the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 31, Los Angeles, California, issued an order consolidating these cases, a consolidated complaint and notice of hearing on December 30, 1981, against the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 11, AFL–CIO, the Respondent, alleging that the Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act, the Act. On February 10, 1982, the Respondent filed its answer denying the material allegations in the consolidated complaint.

A hearing was duly held before me in Los Angeles, California, on September 14, 1982. All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally on the record, and to file briefs. At the commencement of the hearing the Respondent moved "that the charges were not served on the charged parties until past 6 months from the date of the alleged conduct, and therefore, they are time-barred under Section 10(b)."[4] I reserved decision on the motion. The Respondent also moved "to strike paragraph 14 of the Complaint," for the reason that "The basis for the motion is that I do not believe the statute prohibits attempts at violations. It is a strict liability statute. It describes Section 8(a) and (b) specific unfair labor practices. It does not proscribe attempts." I denied this motion. At the conclusion of the General Counsel's case the Respondent moved to dismiss the consolidated complaint for failure of proof. I also denied this motion. At the close of the hearing the Respondent renewed all its previous motions made during the course of the hearing. I reserved decision thereon. Thereafter both the General Counsel and the Respondent filed briefs. For the reasons hereinafter set forth, I deny the Respondent's motion to dismiss the allegations in the consolidated complaint as being "time-barred" under Section 10(b) of the Act; its motion "to strike paragraph 14 of the complaint;"[5] and its motion to dismiss the consolidated complaint in its entirety for failure of proof. However, I grant the Respondent's motion to dismiss the unfair labor practices allegations in the consolidated complaint concerning John and Albert Kelley.

On the entire record and the briefs of the parties, and on my observations of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER

Anco Electrical Contractors, Inc., the Employer, at all times material herein has been, and is now, a corporation organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the State of California, with an office and principal place of business located in Glendora, California, where it is engaged in the electrical construction of commercial, industrial, and institutional structures in the construction industry. In the course and conduct of its business operations the Employer annually sells goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 to customers or business enterprises within the State of California, which customers or business enterprises themselves meet one of the Board's jurisdictional standards, other than the indirect inflow or indirect outflow standard and, additionally, the Employer annually derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000. The consolidated complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that the Employer is now, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The consolidated complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that the Respondent, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 11,

[1] Case 31–CB–4422–1.

[3] The dates of the service of the charges on the Respondent are in dispute as set forth hereinafter.

[4] In response to this motion counsel for the General Counsel asserted that "while the charges were served at a later date, the Respondent furnished a witness to these—to supply evidence during the investigation of both these charges in November, 1981, subsequent to the filing of the charges and was certainly aware of the charges and certainly cannot argue that they were prejudiced by the late service, which General Counsel will contend was within the 10(b) period." John G. Kelley, representing himself at the hearing, and with regard to this motion, stated that he had mailed copies of the charges to the Respondent at the same time that he also, by mail, filed the charges with the Board. Additionally Kelley alleged that he had served a copy of the charges on Richard J. Davis Jr., counsel for the Respondent, at his office "prior to the expiration of the time limit." Davis' response to this was, "I am afraid not, your Honor."

[5] With regard to the Respondent's motion to strike par. 14 of the consolidated complaint, the Act specifically provides in Sec. 8(b)(2) that it is an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents "to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection 8(a)(3). . . ." (Emphasis added.) The Board has held that a union's demand for the discharge of permanent replacements hired during an economic strike constitutes an "attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection 8(a)(3)" and is a violation of Sec. 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act where such demand was without legal or contractual justification. See Wismer & Becker, Contracting Engineers, 228 NLRB 779 (1977), remanded 603 F.2d 1383 (9th Cir. 1979), Board's decision on remand 251 NLRB 687 (1980); United Rubber Workers Local 457 (Kentile, Inc.), 147 NLRB 980 (1964).

AFL–CIO, is, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

Furthermore, the consolidated complaint alleges that, at all times material herein, the Respondent's business representatives Douglas R. Cooley and Don Skol have been, and are now, agents of the Respondent, acting on its behalf, within the meaning of "Section 2(11) of the Act." The Respondent denied this. The evidence herein shows that Cooley represented the Respondent and acted on its behalf in almost all of the Respondent's dealings with the Employer and the Charging Parties herein which gave rise to the allegations of unfair labor practices against it in the consolidated complaint. Moreover, Don Skol represented the Respondent in grievance hearings between it and the Employer. I therefore find that, at all times material herein, Cooley and Skol have been, and are now, agents of the Respondent, acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2(13) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The consolidated complaint alleges that the Respondent sent referrals to the Employer in an attempt to replace John Kelley and Albert Kelley and other permanent replacements hired by the Employer during the economic strike and, through its agents, requested or demanded that the Employer discharge John Kelley and Albert Kelley because they had been hired as permanent replacements for economic strikers following expiration of a previous collective-bargaining agreement between NECA and the Respondent and for reasons other than their failure or refusal to tender the periodic dues and initiation fees uniformly required by the Respondent as a condition of acquiring or retaining union membership. The consolidated complaint further alleges that, by these acts and conduct, the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(2) of the Act by attempting to cause the Employer to discriminate in regard to the hire or tenure, or terms or conditions of employment of employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act; and violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by restraining and coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act. The Respondent denies these allegations and asserts that its actions in demanding replacement of the employees hired during and after the economic strike ended, and the sending of union referrals from its hiring hall to the Employer's jobsites to accomplish this, was a valid and lawful exercise of the hiring and referral clause in the collective-bargaining agreement between it and the Employer and therefore did not violate the Act.

A. The Evidence

1. The service of the charge

The consolidated complaint alleges that the charges in Cases 31–CB–4422–1 and 31–CB–4422–2 were served on the Respondent by certified mail about October 22, 1981. The Respondent denied these allegations in its answer. However, the affidavits of service of a copy of the charges in the formal papers in evidence show that copies of the charges were served by certified mail on October 26, 1981 (Case 31–CB–4422–1), and October 23, 1981 (Case 31–CB–4422–2). Moreover, there are no return receipts in evidence for such service by certified mail on the Respondent and both affidavits of service seem to be copies of the originals, since in lieu of the actual signatures of the persons executing these affidavits there appears typed-in signatures.[6]

A consolidated complaint was served on the Respondent by certified mail on December 30, 1981, and the Respondent's answer was served on February 8, 1982.[7] Subsequently, the Regional Director for Region 31 served second copies of the charges on the Respondent on March 3, 1982, and affidavits of the service and return receipts thereof are in evidence as part of the formal papers. At the hearing, counsel for the Respondent alleged that the Respondent "was served with the complaint and filed his answer to complaint approximately one month before it was served with the charges . . . March 8 and March 9, 1982." In response counsel for the General Counsel noted that the Respondent had "furnished a witness . . . to supply evidence in November, 1981, subsequent to the filing of the charges." The General Counsel offered no other evidence with regard to service of the charges in this matter and the Respondent did not call any witness or produce any evidence concerning this issue. In fact the Respondent chose not to call any witnesses at all on its own behalf in this proceeding.

2. The hiring of John and Albert Kelley

Timothy Anderson, president of the Employer, Anco Electrical Contractors, Inc., testified[8] that the Employer has been a member of the National Electrical Contractors Association, Los Angeles County Chapter, herein NECA, since 1977. NECA is an employer association which admits to membership employers in the building and construction industry, and which exists, in part, for the purpose of negotiating, executing, and administering multiemployer collective-bargaining agreements on behalf of its employer-members with the collective-bargaining representatives of their employees, including the Respondent Union. Anderson stated that employer-members of NECA are bound by the terms and conditions of a collective-bargaining agreement negotiated between NECA and the Respondent, where such an employer has executed a "letter of assent A" agreeing to this.[9] The evidence shows that about June 12, 1981[10] until sometime in the latter part of July 1981,[11] the Respondent engaged in an economic strike against the employer-members of NECA including Anco Electrical Contractors, Inc., the Employer herein. Anderson stated that his employees, who were members of the Respondent, participated in the strike and, as a result thereof, the Employer virtually ceased its operations and in order to continue in business he proceeded to hire permanent replacements for the striking employees through advertisements in newspapers. Anderson added that from June 12, 1981, through July 31, 1981, the Employer hired 11 employees including John and Albert Kelley.[12]

[6] Interestingly, an affidavit of second service of the charge in Case 31–CB–4422–2 is signed by the affiant "C. S. Cartwright" and by "Raquel Garcia" (Designated Agent), the same persons whose names appeared typed in on the initial affidavit of service of the charge, and the original typed date thereon, October 23, 1981, is crossed out and the date March 3, 1982, substituted. (See G.C. Exh. 1(e) and (f).) The Respondent raised no objection to the receipt in evidence of these documents as part of the formal papers herein. Additionally it should be noted that internal office code letter designations of the various types of charges against labor organizations and/or employers filed with the Board appear on these affidavits, "CB–CC–CE–CG–CP," which might indicate that various types of charges were also filed by or against this Respondent and/or this Employer in other cases.

Anderson testified that when he interviewed and hired the 11 employee replacements, it was his understanding that the strike was still in progress. He continued,

> I told them that there was a strike and that the strike would obviously be settled at some time in the future and that when the strike was settled that we would retain them as employees, and when we signed the new agreement, that we would make sure that the Union accepted them as members at some time in the future. . . . I told them that it may be a very long process, but in the end, that they would be accepted into the Union as members, if they would just abide by the rules and regulations that we all would have to live by under the new agreement.

Anderson added that he also told these employees that after the strike ended they would be required to become union members in order to continue working for the Employer "because we would again be signatory to the agreement. . . . That was one of the stipulations when they were hired."

John Kelley[13] testified that on July 20, 1981, he telephoned the Employer in response to its advertisement in the Los Angeles Times for electricians and was advised that the Employer was seeking "permanent replacements for employees currently engaged in a strike." The next day, July 21, 1981, Kelley and his brother Albert, also a journeyman electrician, visited the Employer's premises to be interviewed for possible employment by Tim Anderson, the Employer's president. Kelley related that Anderson advised them that, if hired, they would receive "lower than Union scale" until they could be evaluated as qualified journeyman electricians after which their pay would be increased to union scale. He stated that Anderson told them, in response to Kelley's question regarding their continued employment after the strike ended, that,

> [T]hey were looking for permanent replacements, and that they were not even sure if they were going to sign an agreement with the Union even if the other employers did sign one, and that we would be considered permanent employees and not subject to replacement.[14]

Kelley continued that they were not actually hired by Anderson that day but that on July 30, 1981, they "received word from Anco" by telephone that the Employer was interested in employing them. Kelley added that he called Anderson the next day, July 31, 1981, whereupon Anderson hired both him and his brother Albert Kelley and they commenced work on August 4, 1981, at the Employer's Northrop Aviation jobsite in Hawthorne, California. Kelley recounted that when Anderson hired them on July 31, 1981, and since he "understood that the strike was over and Local 11 electricians had gone back to work," he again asked Anderson, how this would affect their status as employees and Anderson responded, "[I]t would not, that they had not signed an agreement with the Local, and he did not even know if he was going to sign such an agreement."

The testimony of Albert Kelley, concerning what Anderson had told the Kelleys when they were hired, was similar to that given by his brother John Kelley, above. Albert Kelley stated that during their conversation on July 21, 1981, Anderson had told them that, > [I]f we were hired, we would be permanent employees for Anco. . . . My brother asked about the strike and everything, if we would be replaced by union members. And he said, no, if he hires us, he is hiring us as permanent employees. . . . Well, he said that they had no agreement with them, that they were on strike. There was no agreement with Local 11.

3. The economic strike ends

John Kelley testified that "It was my understanding that the strike ended in July, sometime shortly after the 21st of July, but I am not sure of the exact date."[15] An-

[10] It appears that the previous collective-bargaining agreement between NECA and the Respondent had expired.

[11] The record evidences some witness confusion as to just exactly when the strike ended. This will be discussed in detail hereinafter.

[12] Anderson maintained throughout his testimony that he had hired John and Albert Kelley prior to the end of the strike and at a time when he believed the Employer was not bound by any collective-bargaining agreement in force between it and the Respondent. Moreover, Anderson testified that when he had interviewed the prospective employees during the strike period and found them qualified, that this, in his own mind, constituted a "commitment" and it was his understanding that he had in fact hired such employees as of the interview date although he may have notified them of such hire at a later date.

[13] Kelley is a journeyman electrician and he testified that, although he had previously been a member of other locals of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (IBEW), at the time of the hearing he was not a member of the Respondent Union local. Also see Electrical Workers IBEW Local 441, 221 NLRB 214 (1975).

[14] On cross-examination and in an affidavit given to a Board agent during the investigatory stage of these proceedings, Kelley stated that Anderson had also told them that "anyone referred to Anco during any period when Anco is not a signatory to a collective bargaining agreement with the IBEW would not be replaced. . . . [T]he Company would not be obligated to replace us because we were referred during the time when Anco was not signatory to any collective bargaining agreement with the Union."

[15] On cross-examination, Kelley testified as follows:

> Q. Do you know the date of the conclusion of the strike?
> A. I believe the strike—the IBEW workers went back to work sometime the last part of July, but the exact date I do not know.
> Q. Does the date July 21, 1981, refresh your recollection?
> A. I recall July 21st.

Kelley also testified, "I had been listening to news service with respect to the strike at that time, and I had not—that is why I knew on July 31st that the Union had gone back to work because I heard it over the news."

derson testified that the strike ended "approximately the last day of July or first day of August, somewhere in that area." Anderson stated that the striking employees returned to work on a Thursday, but was unsure whether the date was July 23 or July 30, 1981, both these dates falling on Thursday of their respective weeks.

The 1981–1983 collective-bargaining agreement signed by NECA and the Respondent, which ended the strike, has an effective date thereon of July 22, 1981.[16] While Anderson was unsure as to the exact date this agreement was signed, he testified, "It would have been the day before the strike ended, I believe . . . we were informed there was an agreement reached and that we could go back to work." Concerning this, John Kelley testified as follows:

> Q. You now know, do you not, that a collective-bargaining agreement was signed effective July 22, 1981?
> A. I do not know what you mean by "signed effective July [22], 1981." I am not sure if that means it was signed on July [22] or it was signed at some subsequent date and backdated to July [22]. It is my understanding that that is the case.[17]

Moreover, while Kelley at first testified that he had heard rumors to the effect that the Union's membership had ratified the collective-bargaining agreement on July 31, 1981, "but that the contractors had not signed it . . . into effect," he did admit uncertainty as to the actual date the agreement was ratified or when he had heard the rumor of its ratification.

The collective-bargaining agreement provides in pertinent part,

> Sec. 4.05(a). The Union shall maintain a register of applicants for employment . . . .
> Sec. 4.06. If the registration list is exhausted and the Local Union is unable to refer applicants for employment . . . the Employer shall be free to secure applicants without using the Referral Procedure but, such applicants, if hired, shall have the status of "temporary employees.". . .
> Sec. 4.07. The Employer shall notify the Business Manager promptly . . . of such "temporary employees" and shall replace such "temporary employees" as soon as registered applicants for employment are available under the Referral Procedure.

Additionally, NECA and the Respondent executed a "Return-To-Work Agreement," bearing an "Approved" date of July 21, 1981, which states:

> Upon ratification of a new collective-bargaining agreement between I.B.E.W. Local Union No. 11 and Contractors represented by the Los Angeles Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association, the following procedures shall govern the return to work of employees of the employer-contractor on the conclusion of the work stoppage.
> 1. Contractors shall first recall to employment those employees who were dispatched by Local 11 to that contractor, and were employed on the job on the date of the work stoppage.
> 2. If such employees choose not to return, or are unavailable, or are not sufficient to meet the contractors' need, the contractor shall resort to the appropriate Local Union hiring hall to request additional employees in accord with the contractual dispatch rules.
> 3. Employees hired by contractors during the work stoppage may report to the appropriate Local Union hiring hall and may, if qualified under the regular procedures of the contractual dispatch procedure, register for dispatch from Local Union 11.[18]

4. What occurred thereafter

The evidence herein shows that John and Albert Kelley were employed by the Employer on its Northrop Aviation jobsite from August 4 through 6, 1981, and then were transferred to its Biltmore Hotel jobsite in downtown Los Angeles, California, where they worked from August 7 until August 31, 1981. John and Albert Kelley were terminated by the Employer on September 9, 1981, because of a "Reduction in Force."[19]

Anderson testified that sometime in mid-August, August 15, 16, or 17, 1981, the Respondent's business representative Douglas Cooley telephoned him and advised that the Employer was "signatory" to the collective-bargaining agreement between NECA and the Respondent and would therefore "have to comply with Section 4.07 in the agreement." He related that Cooley said that the employees who had been hired during the strike period "were temporary employees and that they would fall under the conditions of Section 4.07."[20] Anderson stated,

[17] While Kelley admitted that he did not have "any evidence that the effective date indicated on [the collective-bargaining agreement, July 22, 1981] is not the date of signature" he testified in explanation of his above testimony,

> I have experience with other Local Unions of the IBEW. I have been a member of the Local Union. And I am aware that contracts are often continued to be negotiated after a strike is over, and that sometimes several weeks or several months pass before the contract is finally signed and ratified by both parties, and whenever that happens, it in every case occurs that the contract itself is dated as for the effective date at the end of the strike or at the end of the time the past agreement lapsed . . . . There is a further basis . . . .
> When I spoke to Mr. Anderson on the 31st, I asked him about the fact that since the strike—since I understood that the strike was over and Local 11 electricians had gone back to work, I asked him if that would—how that would affect our status as employees. And he said that it would not, that they had not signed an agreement with the local, and he did not even know if he was going to sign such an agreement.

[18] R. Exh. D. Anderson testified that he was unsure as to the date this agreement was actually signed.

[19] The General Counsel does not allege that the actual termination of John and Albert Kelley by the Employer constituted an unfair labor practice in violation of the Act on the part of either the Employer or the Respondent.

[20] Anderson testified that Cooley had "[A]dvised me to abide by Section 4.07, which was replace the temporary employees with applicants for employment which were available under the referral procedure, as it states here."

> To the best of my knowledge of recollection, I stated something to the effect that these people were hired as permanent replacement help and that to the best of my knowledge, there was an agreement between the contractor's association and Local 11, that these people would be taken into the Union provided they follow all the criteria that was set forth for them to do so, and that he should probably talk with his Business Manager, and I would talk to my representative from NECA and find out how we should approach this, because they were not going to be replaced.

Anderson continued that thereafter, in August and September 1981, he received several calls from Cooley "regarding this particular matter," with Cooley insisting that the Employer abide by Section 4.07 of the agreement and replace the "temporary employees" with referrals dispatched from the Union's hiring hall, and Anderson maintaining that the so-called temporary employees were permanent replacements for striking employees and the Employer would not replace them.[21] He stated that the Respondent continued to seek the replacement of employees, hired during the period of the economic strike, with referrals from the Union's hiring hall for several months, until the end of December 1981.[22] Anderson testified that "within a week" after the strike ended and the striking employees returned to work, he requested referrals from the Respondent because "there was a considerable amount of work and we had to catch up for the month and a half that we had lost." He related that the Respondent could fill only "a very small portion" of the Employer's requests for additional employees. Anderson added that the Respondent continued to refer people from its hiring hall to the Employer's jobsites "periodically on and off" until sometime in December 1981, apparently in an attempt to replace the employees hired during the strike.[23] He recounted that, during this period, the Respondent also dispatched its business representatives to the Employer's various jobsites to find out the status of employees working there.

John Kelley testified that on August 13, 1981, after he had been advised by Anderson that the Respondent was "pressuring" the Employer to replace him on the jobsite with union-referred employees, and Anderson had suggested that they "clear through the Hiring Hall," he and his brother, Albert Kelley, went to the "Union Hiring Hall" at approximately 3 p.m. that day. Kelley stated that he spoke to Douglas Cooley, a union business agent, telling Cooley that they currently were employed by the Employer at its Biltmore Hotel jobsite and were there at the hiring hall to pay "any applicable union security fees." He related that Cooley said that the Respondent would "not have any dealings" with the Kelleys, or "recognize" their employment until they brought letters from their Employer evidencing their hire. According to Kelley, Cooley told them that thereafter, if qualified, they would be required to register as "out of work" and be dispatched to a job whereupon they would then be required to pay the hiring hall fees.[24] Kelley recounted that Cooley explained that by "registering on the out-of-work book they would in effect be terminating their employment with Anco Electrical Contractors, Inc., and would then be eligible for dispatch to other jobs, but up until that time they would be subject to replacement by union-referred workers." Kelley continued that after he told Cooley that he would not sign the "out-of-work book," and that he did not care whether or not the Respondent "recognized" their employment and accepted the proffered fees, Cooley became "belligerent" and threatened to cause them "more trouble than we ever knew."

The testimony of Albert Kelley regarding what had transpired at the union hiring hall on August 13, 1981, was similar in most respects to that given by his brother, John Kelley, as set forth above. He stated that Cooley had told his brother that the Respondent would not "recognize" them nor accept any payments unless they obtained a letter from the Employer stating that "[w]e were temporary employees of Anco."[25] Kelley related that, after his brother had finished speaking to Cooley, he told Cooley that he was there for the very same reason, to pay the security fees, and that Cooley responded, in substance, that what Cooley had told his brother, John, previously also applied to him as well. Kelley added that they then left the hiring hall. John Kelley testified that he telephoned Anderson later that day to apprise him of what had happened at the union hiring hall and that Anderson said, "I should not worry about it, that he would deal with the Union and that I should just go back to work and then not worry about it any further."

Anderson testified that after the strike had settled he wrote letters to the Respondent indicating that John and Albert Kelley had been hired by Anco Electrical Contractors as "temporary employees."[26] Anderson stated that he characterized the Kelleys as "temporary employees" because, "It is what we were told to do by both the Union and our association NECA. In other words, we [21] Anderson testified that, during a telephone conversation he had with Cooley in mid-September 1981, he asked Cooley for a list of the names of the employees the Respondent wanted replaced and the reasons for such replacements signed by the Respondent's business manager, but that this had never been forthcoming.

[22] Although unsure, Anderson believed that the Respondent had sent approximately 23–30 referrals to the Employer's various jobsites during this period. Moreover, John Kelley testified that about August 15 or 16, 1981, he observed that the Employer had hired four new employees at least three of whom, he was informed, had been referred by the Respondent through its hiring hall to the Biltmore Hotel jobsite.

[23] There is evidence in the record of at least two grievances filed by the Respondent against the Employer for the latter's failure to discharge an employee hired during the strike and to hire a referral to the jobsite, albeit these "temporary employees," as defined by the Respondent, were working on the construction project.

[24] In his affidavit, given to a Board agent, Kelley also stated,

> When we offered to pay any union security fees that might be due, Mr. Cooley refused to accept our offer and said that the Union would not deal with us in any way until I had received a letter from Anco informing them that we had been hired as temporary employees. He went on to say that we would be subject to replacement by Union-referred personnel.

[25] However, on cross-examination Kelley was unsure as to whether Cooley told them that they needed "a letter" from the Employer, or "a letter stating that they were temporary employees."

[26] These letters are dated August 17, 1981. See G.C. Exhs. 2 and 4.

had to follow a particular format to bring these people into the Union . . . per the agreement stating how we were to go about bringing these permanent replacement help into the Union, so that we may keep them as a Union employee." He added that the letters, as worded, were part of the format he was instructed and required to follow "by NECA and the IBEW."

John Kelley testified that on August 31, 1981, he, his brother Albert Kelley, and two other employees[27] of the Employer appeared at the union hiring hall "to offer to pay union security fees" to the Union in order to cover themselves concerning their employment at Anco Electrical.[28] Kelley related that he spoke to someone behind a "teller's window" who was not Cooley, advising him that they were there to pay the union security fees. Kelley stated that he was asked if a letter had been sent from the Employer to the Respondent to which Kelley replied that he had been informed by the Employer that this had been done. Kelley added, "As the conversation progressed, I had refused to sign an application [for formal] union membership. And I had also refused to sign an authorization for dues check-off. And the man told me that if I did not sign those documents, that he would not clear me through the Hall."

Kelley continued that Cooley now appeared on the scene and entered the conversation advising Kelley that the Respondent had received the required letters from the Employer and agreeing to allow Kelley "to pay the Hiring Hall fees and to receive a receipt without signing the dues check-off or the membership application form."[29] Kelley testified that when he discovered that the "dues receipt indicated that I was a temporary employee, I immediately pointed out to Mr. Cooley that I was not a temporary employee, but Anco had hired me as a [permanent] replacement." He stated that Cooley then brought out the letter from the Employer and exhibited it to Kelley. This letter dated August 17, 1981, characterizes Kelley as a "temporary employee." Kelley related that after his brother Albert also paid the hiring hall fees and was given a receipt therefor, he advised Cooley that the other two employees were there to also pay "any fees that the Union required and to clear through the Hiring Hall." Kelley continued that Cooley asked these employees if they had "a letter from the Employer" and when they responded that they did not, he showed them a copy of the "back-to-work agreement" and explained, > [T]he way the back-to-work agreement would affect them would be that they would have to bring in a letter from the Employer, that after they brought the letter in, they would then be permitted to come in and register as out of work on the union's referral list if they were qualified to register. And that would mean that . . . their job at Anco Electric would be terminated and that they would then be dispatched by the Union when their turn came up to a job . . . and then at that time they would be eligible for . . . union fringe benefits and union pay scale and all the benefits of . . . the collective bargaining agreement.

Albert Kelley testified that his brother John had told him that Anderson had now, for a second time, requested that they "try to get cleared again with the Union," and therefore they went to the union hiring hall on August 31, 1981, to accomplish this, accompanied by two other employees. The rest of his testimony concerning what happened at the union hiring hall on August 31 is similar to that given by John Kelley as recounted above.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The 10(b) period

Section 10(b) of the Act provides "That no complaint shall issue based upon any unfair labor practice occurring more than six months prior to the filing of the charge with the Board and the service of a copy thereof upon the person against whom such charge is made . . . ."

Section 102.14 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides:

> Upon the filing of a charge, the charging party shall be responsible for the timely and proper service of a copy thereof upon the person against whom such charge is made. The regional director will, as a matter of course, cause a copy of such charge to be served on the person against whom the charge is made, but he shall not be deemed to assume responsibility for such service.[30]

Section 102.111 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides:

> Charges . . . may be served personally or by registered or certified mail or by telegraph or by leaving a copy thereof at the principal office or place of business of the person required to be served. The verified return by the individual so serving the same, setting forth the manner of such service, shall be proof of the same, and the return post office receipt or telegraph receipt therefor when registered or certified and mailed or when telegraphed as aforesaid shall be proof of service of the same.[31]

[27] These employees were John Davis and Greg (last name unknown).

[28] However, on cross-examination Kelley also testified that he had advised these employees that they would be eligible for benefits under the collective-bargaining agreement and therefore they should all go to the union hiring hall to offer to pay the union security fees, at which time Kelley would speak on their behalf. A somewhat similar statement is also contained in Kelley's Board affidavit. Kelley also testified that he assumed that a collective-bargaining agreement had been signed between NECA and the Respondent prior to August 31, 1981, because the strike had ended and Anderson "was suggesting on two separate occasions that I clear through the Hiring Hall."

[29] See G.C. Exh. 3 (Receipt for Hiring Hall Operating Expenses).

[30] Also see Sec. 101.4 of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

[31] Sec. 102.113(a) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, provides: "The date of service shall be the day when the matter served is deposited in the United States mail or is delivered in person, as the case may be." Also see Laborers Local 264 (D & G Construction Co.), 216 NLRB 40 (1975); Dow Chemical Co., 215 NLRB 910 (1974).

Section 102.113(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides:

> The person or party serving the papers or process on other parties in conformance with sections 102.111 and 102.112 shall submit a written statement of service thereof to the Board stating the names of the parties served and the date and manner of service. Proof of service as defined in section 102.112 shall be required by the Board only if subsequent to the receipt of the statement of service a question is raised with respect to proper service. Failure to make proof of service does not affect the validity of the service.

Moreover, Section 10(b) is a statute of limitations and is not jurisdictional in nature. It is an affirmative defense and, if not timely raised, is waived.[32]

The consolidated complaint alleges that the charges in Cases 31–CB–4422–1 and 31–CB–4422–2 were served on the Respondent by certified mail about October 22, 1981. The Respondent denied this in its answer. The burden of proving the allegations in a complaint is on the General Counsel including the above allegation regarding service. In support thereof the General Counsel offered affidavits of service by Board agents certifying that they had served the Respondent with copies of the charges in the above cases on October 26 and 23, 1981, respectively, by "postpaid certified mail." However, there was no return receipt for the charges and the signatures on both affidavits of service as well as the notary public's signature thereon were typed in, rather than being the actual written signatures. While there is no explanation therefor in the record, I find and conclude that these affidavits are nonetheless sufficient in themselves to sustain the finding that the General Counsel has met such burden of proof.[33]

The affidavits of service are sworn to and notarized, and there is no evidence in the record which validly disputes their authenticity.[34] Further, the above finding and conclusion receives additional support from the fact that the Respondent cooperated in the investigation of these charges shortly after they were filed with the Board, and from the fact that aside from the remarks made by counsel for the Respondent in connection with his opening motion for dismissal of the consolidated complaint on the grounds that the Respondent's "alleged conduct . . . [is] time-barred under Section 10(b)," and statements in the Respondent's brief that timely service of the charges was not made, the Respondent offered no evidence to support this. No officer, official, representative, or agent of the Respondent was called as a witness to testify under oath that the Respondent had failed to receive a copy of the charges filed in this matter until after the complaint was issued, and the second copies of the charges were served on it in March 1982.

Moreover, since Section 10(b) of the Act is a statute of limitations and an affirmative defense which must be pleaded, as was in effect done so herein by the Respondent, the burden of proving such an affirmative defense rests squarely on the Respondent. As stated before, the Respondent failed to offer any evidence whatsoever on its behalf to support and sustain its burden of showing that Section 10(b) of the Act bars consideration of the charges herein alleging unlawful conduct on its part in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

In view of all of the above, I find and conclude that timely service of a copy of the charges filed herein was served within the meaning of Section 10(b) of the Act and the Board's Rules and Regulations and, therefore, I deny the Respondent's motion to dismiss the consolidated complaint as being "time-barred by Section 10(b) of the Act."[35]

2. The violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act

Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to "restrain or coerce" employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, "Provided, That this paragraph shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein."[36] Section 7 of the Act protects the rights of employees to engage in union or other concerted activities or to refrain from such activities. The rights protected by Section 7, however, are limited by the principle of exclusive representation set forth in Section 9(a) of the Act.[37] In view of the restraints im-

[33] Albeit Secs. 102.111 and 102.112 specifically provide that "the return post office receipt shall be proof of service" when service is made by certified mail, it does not specifically exclude other types of proof of service, such as an affidavit of service.

[34] The fact that no post office receipts for certified mail service of the charges were produced at the hearing might well give rise to various inferences both in favor of and against the respective positions of the parties herein; i.e., either that service was never effectuated, or that service was made and the receipts were lost or misplaced in other files since the evidence appears to indicate that there were various charges filed in various types of cases affecting this Respondent. (See the case code designations on G.C. Exhs. 1 (b, c, e, and f).) This might also account for the typed-in signatures on the affidavits of service since additional copies of the notice of filing of the charges and the charges themselves may have been required for placement in the other case files. (See G.C. Exh. 1(f) with the October 23, 1981 date thereon having been crossed out and a new date of March 3, 1982, inserted therein.) Be that as it may, I am convinced that the affidavits of service of the charges dated October 26 and 23, 1981, respectively, are valid and authentic and constitute proper and sufficient proof of service as required by the Board's Rules and Regulations.

[35] See General Marine Transport Corp., 238 NLRB 1372 (1978), enf. denied 619 F.2d 180 (2d Cir. 1980). Moreover, whether or not John Kelley is found to be a credible witness, as will be determined later, and particularly regarding his unsworn and unsupported assertion that he mailed a copy of his charge to the Respondent, such a finding would have no bearing one way or the other on my above finding and conclusion concerning Sec. 10(b) of the Act.

[36] The purpose of and policy behind Sec. 8(b)(1)(A), as set forth in Sec. 10(b) of the Act, is "to protect the rights of individual employees in their relations with labor organizations."

[37] Sec. 9(a) of the Act provides:

> Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the em-posed on individual employee rights by the principle of exclusive representation, the courts and the Board have imposed on labor organizations a reciprocal obligation of the Act to fully and fairly represent all of the employees.[38] As the United States Supreme Court stated in Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 177, 190 (1967):

> It is now well established that, as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees . . . the Union [has] a statutory duty fairly to represent all of those employees . . . [and that this duty] includes a statutory obligation to serve the interests of all members without hostility or discrimination toward any, to exercise its discretion with complete good faith and honesty, and to avoid arbitrary conduct.
> . . . .
> A breach of the statutory duty of fair representation occurs only when a union's conduct toward a member of the collective bargaining unit is arbitrary, discriminatory, or in bad faith.[39]

A labor organization which fails to live up to this obligation unjustifiably restrains employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights and thereby violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. The duty of fair representation gives employees a correlative right under Section 7 to be represented without arbitrary, irrelevant, or invidious discrimination by their exclusive representative.[40] In its landmark decision in Miranda Fuel Co., 140 NLRB 181 (1962), the Board held at 185:

> Viewing these mentioned obligations of a statutory representative in the context of the "right" guaranteed employees by Section 7 of the Act "to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing," we are of the opinion that Section 7 thus gives employees the right to be free from unfair or irrelevant or invidious treatment by their exclusive bargaining agent in matters affecting their employment. This right of employees is a statutory limitation on statutory bargaining representatives, and we conclude that Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act accordingly prohibits labor organizations, when acting in a statutory representative capacity, from taking action against any employee upon considerations or classifications which are irrelevant, invidious, or unfair.[41]

"Irrelevant considerations" include nonmembership in the union.[42]

A labor organization's arbitrary conduct alone may suffice to establish a violation of the duty of fair representation.[43] Without any hostile motive of discrimination and in complete good faith, a labor organization may pursue a course of action that is so unreasonable and arbitrary as to constitute a violation of its duty of fair representation. However, in evaluating whether such conduct is so arbitrary as to breach the duty of fair representation, so long as a labor organization exercises its discretion in good faith and with honesty of purpose, a "wide range of reasonableness" must be allowed.[44] On the other hand, a labor organization may not impair individual employee interests on the basis of personal preferences.[45]

Section 8(a)(3) of the Act prohibits an employer from discriminating against its employees "in regard to . . . any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." Section 8(b)(2) of the Act makes it unlawful for any labor organization "to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against any employee in violation of Section 8(a)(3)." The Board and the courts have held that when a labor organization causes or attempts to cause an employer to discriminate against employees on an irrational or arbitrary ground, this conduct constitutes unlawful encouragement of union activity within the meaning of Sections 8(b)(2) and 8(a)(3) of the Act.[46] Moreover, this is true regardless of whether or not that attempt is successful.[47] The foreseeable intimidating effect on the workers is examined; specific evidence of an intent to encourage union membership is not essential.[48] However, the Board has also consistently held that a labor organization possessed of a lawful exclusive hiring hall agreement does not violate Section 8(b)(2) by causing or attempting to cause the discharge of an employee who is on the job without having complied with the contractual hiring hall procedures.[49] As the Board stated in Operating Engineers Local 542 (Ralph A. Marino, General Contractor), 151 NLRB 497, 500 (1965):

> As we construe the hiring and referral clause to require the Employer to utilize the union referral system in securing employees for the work in that area, the Union could, without violating the Act, properly seek the discharge of the employees in question who had bypassed the Union's referral system.

Moreover, in NLRB v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333, 345–346 (1937), the United States Supreme Court held:

> it does not follow that an employer, guilty of no act denounced by the statute, has lost the right to protect and continue his business by supplying places left vacant by strikers. And he is not bound to discharge those hired to fill the places of strikers, upon the election of the latter to resume their employment, in order to create places for them.

As the Board stated in Bio-Science Laboratories, 209 NLRB 796, 797 (1974),[50]

> Subsequent cases[5] have not altered the Mackay Radio rule that an employer is under no obligation to discharge or lay off permanent replacements at the termination of an economic strike. The decisions in Fleetwood, Laidlaw, and Brooks Research all relate to rights of economic strikers to job openings occurring when permanent replacements quit their jobs subsequent to the termination of a strike.

[5] N.L.R.B. v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., Inc., 389 U.S. 375 (1967); The Laidlaw Corporation, 171 NLRB 1366, enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (C.A. 7); Brooks Research & Manufacturing, Inc., 202 NLRB 634.

While the Board has held that, under Laidlaw,[51] an employer is under an obligation to place permanently replaced economic strikers on a preferential hiring list, it has also held that a union's concern about getting all strikers back to work in preference to strike replacements is "[c]learly a legitimate bargaining demand,"[52] and therefore the Laidlaw reinstatement rights of economic strikers may be cut off by an agreement between the union and the employer reached in the give-and-take of collective bargaining.[53] And a union may lawfully seek the reinstatement of economic strikers and the layoff of strike replacements pursuant to a nondiscriminatory system of layoff and recall without violating Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. However, it is well established that a union may not discriminate against employees who exercise their Section 7 right not to join a strike.[54]

The Respondent asserts in its brief, "Even if General Counsel could prove his best case, that 'case' has consistently been held not to constitute a violation of the Act by the Board's Advice Division."[55] I do not agree with the Respondent's conclusion nor its analysis of the law as applicable to the facts of this case. In truth, the Advice Memorandum which the Respondent asserts "controls here" actually contains within it the requirement of a ruling adverse to the Respondent. While this will be gone into in more detail subsequently, briefly as stated in Steelworkers Local 8560 (Spartek, Inc.), 103 LRRM 1238, 1239 (1979):

> In the instant case, the Employer alleges that the Union initially sought to have all strike replacements fired, even when the Employer was offering jobs for all employees. . . . Assuming, arguendo, that the Union initially proposed that all strike replacements be terminated, the Union clearly has abandoned this proposal and, instead is now requesting a nondiscriminatory system of layoff and recall pursuant to seniority. Given these changed circumstances, it was concluded that it would not effectuate the purposes of the Act to attempt to establish a previous, technical violation of the Act, especially since none of the strike replacements have been terminated.

However, as shown by the evidence in the instant case, the Respondent persisted in demanding that all the striker replacements be fired even though the Employer had reinstated all the striking employees who desired to return to their jobs and it never abandoned this demand, continuing to send referrals to the Employer to replace these employees for several months after the end of the strike and the reinstatement of the striking employees. This constituted more than a "previous technical violation of the Act."

The evidence shows herein that the employees of the Employer, Anco Electrical Contractors, Inc., who were members of the Respondent Union, engaged in an economic strike called by the Respondent at a time when there was no collective-bargaining agreement in force and effect between the Respondent and the Employer. The evidence further shows that the strike commenced on June 12, 1981, and, in order to continue its business operations, the Employer commenced hiring new employees to replace its striking employees. Timothy Anderson, the Employer's president, testified that the Employer hired 11 employees as "permanent replacements," including John and Albert Kelley, during the course of the strike.

While the record is confusing and somewhat unclear as to the exact date the economic strike ended and the striking employees returned to work, with regard to John and Albert Kelley the evidence does indicate that they were actually hired subsequent to these events. John Kelley testified, "It is my understanding that the strike had ended in July, sometime shortly after the 21st of July, but I am not sure of the exact date." Kelley also testified as follows:

> A. I believe the strike—the IBEW workers went back to work sometime the last part of July, but the exact date I do not know.

> Q. Does the date July 21, 1981, refresh your recollection?
> A. I recall July 21st.

Moreover, Kelley related that when he was hired by Anderson on July 31, 1981, he had inquired what his status as an employee would be since he "understood" that the strike had already ended and the striking employees had returned to work by then.

While Anderson testified, "I believe [the strike] ended approximately last day of July or first day of August, somewhere in that area," he also stated that the striking employees had returned to work on a Thursday which, according to the evidence herein and the use of a 1981 calendar, could only have occurred on July 23 or 30, 1981. Furthermore, the 1981—1983 collective-bargaining agreement between NECA and the Respondent provides for an effective date of July 22, 1981, and Anderson testified that although unsure as to the exact date of the signing of this agreement, "It would have been the day before the strike ended." Additionally, NECA and the Respondent executed a "Return-to-Work Agreement" which is dated July 21, 1981.

Considering the issue of credibility at this time, the Respondent in its brief asserts that John Kelley "lied," "fabricated statements," and engaged in "clear perjury" and thereby "contemptuous" conduct at the hearing which requires the discrediting of his testimony as a whole, and consideration of "referral of this case to the United States Attorney for review of Kelley's testimony." The Respondent also maintains that the testimony of Albert Kelley must be disbelieved because he merely "ventriloquized" the testimony of his brother John Kelley. I disagree with the Respondent on both counts.

In reviewing the testimony of John Kelley and the particular segments thereof which the Respondent points to as illustrative of Kelley's "lies," "fabrications," and "clear perjury," I find that as to most of these instances the Respondent has drawn unwarranted inferences in support of its position, reflecting on almost out-of-context consideration by the Respondent of Kelley's statements; while in other instances the Respondent has drawn inferences from answers given by Kelley, favorable to its own position herein, although various other inferences, not supporting its contentions, could also reasonably be applicable. For example, as the Respondent sets forth in its brief:

> At page 83 of the Transcript. Kelley questions if the new Agreement was signed on July 21 or it was signed at some subsequent date and backdated to July 21st. "It is my understanding that that is the case." (Emphasis ours.) The Administrative Law Judge noted this at page 84, lines 17–19, 22–25, despite Counsel for the General Counsel's efforts to divert the Court's attention. Following the Court's intervention, Kelley realized his error and answered that in fact he had no evidence. When the Court asked, at lines 10–11 of page 86 of the Transcript "What was the basis for your answer before?" Kelley quite simply lied, saying at page 87, line 1. "But I did not indicate that I did." (Emphasis ours.) Kelley's initial admission is accurate and his clear perjury, in direct response to the Administrative Law Judge, is contemptuous.

However, consider the actual testimony as given in its full context. On recross-examination by counsel for the Respondent, the following testimony appears in the record:

> Q. You now know, do you not, that a collective bargaining agreement was signed effective July 22, 1981?
> A. I do not know what you mean by "signed effective July [22], 1981." I am not sure if that means it was signed on July [22]. It is my understanding that that is the case.
> Q. Did you testify on cross that the date July 21, 1981 refreshed your recollection as to the date the back-to-work agreement was signed?
> A. No, I did not.[56]
> Q. Do you have any evidence whatsoever that the date on page 50 of Joint Exhibit 1 is not the accurate date?

At this point in the record, counsel for the General Counsel raised an objection to this line of questioning regarding the collective-bargaining agreement on the grounds that Kelley was not a party to the agreement or the negotiations thereon and would therefore have no knowledge thereof. After referring counsel for the General Counsel to Kelley's previous answer, that it was his understanding that the collective-bargaining agreement had been backdated, I overruled the objection. How this can be characterized as "Counsel for the General Counsel's efforts to divert the Court's attention" is beyond my understanding.

Kelley's testimony continues:

> Q. Do you have any evidence that the effective date indicated on page 50 of Joint Exhibit 1 is not the date of signature?
> A. No, I do not.
> JUDGE KLEIMAN: What was the basis for your answer before?
> THE WITNESS: I have experience with other Local Unions of the IBEW. I have been a member of the Local Union. And I am aware that contracts are often continued to be negotiated after a strike is over, and that sometimes several weeks or several months pass before the contract is finally signed and ratified by both parties, and whenever that happens, it in every case occurs that the contract itself is dated as for the effective date at the end of the strike or at the end of the time the past agreement lapsed.
> JUDGE KLEIMAN: So it may have been signed subsequent—

[56] As to this, Kelley's answer is accurate since the question directed to him on cross-examination referred to the date the strike ended, and not to the date the "back-to-work agreement" was signed.

THE WITNESS: Although it may have been signed subsequently.

JUDGE KLEIMAN: Do you have—

THE WITNESS: I have no evidence that it took place in this case. But I did not indicate that I did.

JUDGE KLEIMAN: I am just trying to determine the basis of your reason. It is conjecture—

THE WITNESS: There is a further basis . . . . When I spoke to Mr. Anderson on the 31st, I asked him about the fact that since the strike—since I understood that the strike was over and Local 11 electricians had gone back to work, I asked him if that would—how that would affect our status as employees. And he said that it would not, that they had not signed an agreement with the Local, and he did not even know if he was going to sign such an agreement.

When the above testimony is considered as a whole, it certainly cannot be said that Kelley "quite simply lied" or committed perjury. Kelley testified that it was his understanding that the collective-bargaining agreement had been backdated and he explained the basis for his "understanding" which did not appear to me to be incredible or unbelievable. Also, Kelley never stated in his testimony that he had actual evidence of the backdating of the agreement and therefore his testimony that he had not said that he did was true and not a lie.

Additionally, the Respondent in its brief alleges fabrication by Albert Kelley in his testimony concerning whether or not Cooley had requested a letter from the Employer stating that the Kelley's were employed as "temporary employees." At first Albert Kelley testified that Cooley had said that he wanted a letter "that said we were temporary employees of Anco." On cross-examination however Kelley was less sure of this testifying, "A letter of temporary employee—I do not—not sure if he said temporary completely, you know, but it was—he said you had to have a letter." The following testimony was given soon thereafter:

Q. I am trying to focus your attention on whether or not "temporary" was mentioned on the 13th of August. Did you or did your brother, John, raise any objection to Mr. Cooley's statement at that time?

A. It must have been "temporary employee" because there was some objection raised.

Q. What was the objection?

A. That we were not temporary employees.

Q. And who said that?

A. John.

Q. And when did he say that?

A. The 13th.

Q. The 13th?

A. Yes.

Q. Or the 31st?

A. Well, he said the 31st also.

Q. When did he first say it?

A. I am really not sure. I cannot—I think he said it on the 13th. I know he said it on the 31st. But I am not—I am not positive. I cannot give you a—

JUDGE KLEIMAN: Again, did Mr. Cooley use the words, "temporary employee," or did he just ask for a letter? Which, if you can recall? Or can you not remember?

THE WITNESS: I cannot recall that well right now. I cannot recall. I mean, I would not want to bet my life on it.

JUDGE KLEIMAN: Well, to the best of your recollection with regard to your reporting about a letter?

THE WITNESS: That we had to have a letter is—.

JUDGE KLEIMAN: So that he did not mention "temporary employee?"

THE WITNESS: Right, I am not sure about that. I cannot be positive about it.[57]

I do not consider the above to reflect that Albert Kelley sought to "fabricate" evidence. It appeared to me that Kelley desired to testify as to what had actually occurred as truthfully and as accurately as his memory could recollect.

Additionally, the events which occasioned the witness' testimony at the hearing had occurred more than a year previously and it is not surprising that there was some uncertainty and failure of recollected exactness as to dates and statements made during the course thereof.[58] And the Respondent offered no evidence itself to clarify or shed light on any of the occurrences, although it could well be supposed that, as to some of these events, the Respondent was in a better position to present evidence thereon and to clarify and complete the record than any of the other parties. This is not to say that the Respondent was obligated to assist the General Counsel in sustaining his burden of proof as to the allegations in the consolidated complaint, but the Respondent did have the responsibility of supporting its positions taken in this proceeding especially if the General Counsel has established a prima facie case.

As to Anderson's testimony, while he was unsure as to the exact dates of some of the events which occurred herein, i.e., the dates that the strike ended and the strikers returned to work, yet his testimony for the most part remains uncontradicted. Anderson was subpoenaed as a witness for the General Counsel, he did not volunteer to appear, and I perceive no actual reason or ulterior motive for him not to have told the truth under oath since no allegations of unfair labor practices were made herein against the Employer or are contained in the consolidated complaint.

[57] At this juncture in Albert Kelley's testimony, his brother John Kelley requested permission to ask a question. I denied the request explaining that, if I allowed him to do so, it would constitute improper procedure on my part. The Respondent asserts in its brief, "Respondent hopes that the Administrative Law Judge recalls that when John Kelley sought to intervene to save his brother's 'testimony,' he had to be denied." However, John Kelley appeared at the hearing on his own behalf, as a layman without formal legal training, and his request to ask a question at this point is reasonably subject to other interpretations besides that of "saving his brother's testimony." For example, it is not unusual for witnesses present at the hearing, and before they are called to the stand, to volunteer remarks or answers or ask a question out loud during the course of another witness' testimony, in a burst of enthusiasm to tell their own story or to provide an accurate and complete record of what occurred, being unable to control themselves or not realizing that this is improper. Besides, there is absolutely no evidence in the record to support the Respondent's contention that John Kelley had acted as he had in order to "save his brother's testimony."

[58] It is not unusual for witnesses, who may be generally believed, to give testimony that in part may be unclear or somewhat inconsistent because of the passage of time requiring the remembrance of things long past. See Photo Drive Up, 267 NLRB 329 (1983).

On all the above considerations, and having also based my findings on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, the weight of the respective evidence, established or admitted facts, inherent probabilities, and reasonable inferences which may be drawn from the record as a whole,[59] I credit the testimony of John and Albert Kelley and Timothy Anderson, except where it is unclear, or exhibits doubt or a failure of recollection.[60]

In applying the legal principles enunciated by the above court and Board cases to the facts in the instant case it should first be noted that, at the conclusion of the economic strike, the Employer reinstated all the striking employees who wanted to return to work and the Respondent has not contended that the employees hired as permanent replacements during the strike deprived the returning strikers of their jobs. Moreover, since Anderson testified uncontradictedly that the Employer hired 11 electrician employees from June 12, 1981, when the economic strike began and until July 31, 1981, when it was over, it is a reasonable assumption, without evidence having been introduced to the contrary, that some, if not all, 9 of the remaining employees, excepting the Kelleys, were hired during the course of the strike and before it ended in late July 1983.[61] Therefore, there was no legal basis for the Respondent's demand that the Employer discharge all the permanent employees hired during the strike as replacements for the striking employees and hire, in their stead, referrals from the Respondent's hiring hall.[62]

Nor was there a contractual justification for the Respondent's repeated demands to discharge these permanently hired striker replacements. The "Return-To-Work Agreement" specifically provides that employees hired during the economic strike "may report to the appropriate Local Union hiring hall and may, if qualified under the regular procedures of the contractual dispatch procedure, register for dispatch from Local Union 11." There is no requirement for their discharge and use of the discretional "may" also does not require them to register for dispatch from the Respondent's hiring hall to maintain their jobs with the Employer. Thus the demand by the Respondent for the discharge of the permanent striker replacement employees on the grounds that they were actually "temporary employees," subject to replacement by referrals from the Respondent, has no contractual justification therefor.

In view of the above, and inasmuch as there was neither legal nor contractual justification for the Respondent's demands, from mid-August through December 1981, that the employees who had been hired during the economic strike as permanent replacements for striking employees be replaced by union referrals, the Respondent thereby restrained employees in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, and attempted to cause the Employer to discriminate against employees, i.e., to encourage membership in the Respondent Union, in violation of Section 8(b)(2) of the Act.[63] Moreover, the Respondent's dispatch of referrals in mid-August through December 1981, in an attempt to replace these permanent employees, likewise lacked legal or contractual justification and thereby also violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act.[64]

With regard to John and Albert Kelley, the Charging Parties herein, the evidence shows that they were actually hired after the strike ended and the striking employees had returned to work. While Anderson insisted that they were hired prior to the end of the strike, John Kelley's own testimony contradicts this as noted above. Besides, Anderson admitted to a lack of sureness and recall as to the pertinent dates of events which transpired and, although I generally credit his testimony, I cannot accept or rely on his recollection as to this. The 1981–1983 collective-bargaining agreement has an effective date of July 22, 1981.[65] The "Return-to-Work Agreement" is dated July 21, 1981.[66] The Kelleys were hired on July 31, 1981. Thus I must conclude that the bargaining agreement was in effect prior to the Kelleys being hired. This being so, the Kelleys were "temporary employees" as provided for in sections 4.06 and 4.07 of the collective-bargaining agreement, and subject to replacement thereunder "as soon as registered applicants for employment are available under the Referral Procedure."[67]

[60] As Judge Learned Hand stated in NLRB v. Universal Camera Corp., 179 F.2d 749, 754 (2d Cir. 1950),

> It is no reason for refusing to accept everything that a witness says, because you do not believe all of it; nothing is more common in all kinds of judicial decisions than to believe some and not all.

[61] Anderson's testimony, that the Employer's operations had "virtually ceased" when the strike began on June 12, 1981, because its employees joined the economic strike and that the Employer was compelled to seek and hire employees to replace the strikers in order to maintain its business, would support this assumption.

[63] Wismer & Becker, Contracting Engineers, supra, 228 NLRB 779 (1977); Bio-Science Laboratories, supra; Rubber Workers Local 457 (Kentile, Inc.), supra.

[64] Should the Respondent assert that the issue of the employees hired as permanent replacements for the striking employees during the strike was not fully tried or considered by it, because the thrust of the General Counsel's case was directed towards the allegations in the consolidated complaint regarding Charging Parties John and Albert Kelley, I note that the consolidated complaint specifically refers to the Kelleys and "other permanent replacements hired by the Employer during the economic strike," and in the testimony given by the General Counsel's witnesses, the facts and circumstances testified to were sufficient to establish a prima facie case of violations of the Act as to these employees. The Respondent totally ignored its obligation thereafter to prove that its actions herein were justified and not violative of the Act. The Respondent called no witnesses and, except for its introduction of the two agreements referred to above, the bargaining agreement as a joint exhibit, and the "Return-to-Work Agreement" as its own exhibit, it offered no other evidence on its own behalf.

[65] No evidence was offered to show that this agreement has been backdated or was not signed on its effective date July 22, 1981.

[66] There is no evidence in the record as to when this agreement was ratified by the Respondent's membership, as required by its terms.

[67] While Anderson testified that in and around this time the Respondent was unable to fill all the requests by the Employer for electrician referrals from its hiring hall, this would not affect the above.

Therefore, when the Respondent demanded that John and Albert Kelley be replaced by referrals from its hiring hall and actually sent union referrals to the Employer's jobsites to accomplish this end, it did not violate the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, found to constitute unfair labor practices occurring in connection with the operations of the Employer described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

In light of the standards set forth in Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), I conclude that a broad remedial order is inappropriate since it has not been shown that the Respondent has a proclivity to violate the Act or has engaged in such egregious or widespread misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for the employees' fundamental right. Accordingly, I recommend the use of the narrow injunctive language "in any like or related manner" in the recommended Order.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Anco Electrical Contractors, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 11, AFL–CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By demanding that the Employer discharge or otherwise discriminate against its employees, and by dispatching union referrals to accomplish this purpose, the Respondent has attempted to cause the Employer to discriminate against its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, and thereby has violated Section 8(b)(2) of the Act.

4. By restraining and coercing employees of the Employer in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act, the Respondent Union has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

5. The Respondent has committed no unfair labor practices in connection with employees John and Albert Kelley.

6. The unfair labor practices found above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 6 October 1983 Administrative Law Judge William A. Gershuny issued the attached decision. The Respondents and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and, for the reason stated below, has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions of law, but not to adopt his recommended Order.

Recently, in Machinists Lodge 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984), the Board overruled the plurality decision in Machinists Local 1327 (Dalmo Victor), 263 NLRB 984 (1982),[1] which had found that a 30-day restriction on a union member's right to resign was reasonable, and held, instead, in accord with the views expressed by Member Hunter and former Chairman Van de Water in their concurring opinion in Dalmo Victor, that a union may not lawfully restrict the right of its members to resign or otherwise refrain from protected Section 7 activities for any period of time. Applying the Neufeld Porsche-Audi standard to the instant case, we conclude that article 26, section 10, of the Respondents' constitution is unlawful as it imposes a restriction on a member's right to resign by prohibiting resignations during a strike. For this reason, we find, as did the judge, that the fines imposed on those members who tendered their resignations from the Respondents and returned to work during the strike violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[2]

We also agree with the General Counsel that the Respondents further violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by threatening those employees who resigned with fines, suspensions, expulsions, and the filing of intraunion charges and by threatening to fine and blackball employee Dennis Houser after he tendered his resignation from the Union and to have his operator's card stricken if he returned to work during the strike. While the threats to Houser were clearly unlawful as they occurred after he had resigned from the Union, we note that the threats to blackball Houser and to have his operator's card stricken would have been unlawful even if he had been a member when the threats were made because the threats, if implemented, would adversely affect Houser's employment relationship.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, we shall order them to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act, including refunding to those persons named in paragraph 2(b) of our Order any money they may have paid as a result of the fines imposed against them, with interest computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

In addition, we shall order the Respondent to cease and desist from maintaining the restriction on resignations found invalid and to expunge the provision from its governing documents. Engineers & Scientists Guild (Lockheed-California), 268 NLRB 311 (1983). In so doing, we note that we are not ordering that the parent International, which is not a party to this proceeding, expunge the offending provision from its constitution. Rather, we are only ordering the Respondents to expunge the provision from their governing documents, including such documents of the International that the Respondents may have incorporated by reference and adopted as their own.[3]

[1] The plurality decision expressed the views of Member Zimmerman and former Member Fanning.

[2] Member Zimmerman agrees with the result reached by his colleagues here, but does so for the reasons stated in the Dalmo Victor plurality decision to which he continues to adhere. See his dissenting opinion in Neufeld Porsche-Audi.

[3] While the complaint in this case specifically alleges the maintenance of the provision as being unlawful, the absence of such an allegation would have no bearing on the exercise by this Board of its discretion to fashion appropriate remedies for the violations found.

Member Dennis joins her colleagues in ordering the Respondents to cease and desist from maintaining the restriction on resignations because the complaint alleges unlawful maintenance of the constitutional provision and the record supports that allegation. Compare Machinists Lodge 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), above at fn. 22, in which the complaint contained no such allegation. As in Neufeld Porsche-Audi, however, Member Dennis considers it impracticable to order the Respondent Local Unions to "expunge" a provision appearing in the constitution of the parent

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondents, Glass, Pottery, Plastic and Allied Workers, Local Union No. 185, affiliated with Glass, Pottery, Plastic and Allied Workers, AFL–CIO–CLC and Glass, Pottery, Plastic and Allied Workers, Local Union No. 128, affiliated with Glass, Pottery, Plastic and Allied Workers, AFL–CIO–CLC, their officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Maintaining in their governing documents article 26, section 10, of the constitution of the International Union, which reads as follows:

> No member may resign from his local union of the International Union during a strike. All attempted resignations shall become effective thirty (30) days from the last day of the strike.

(b) Restraining or coercing employees who have resigned from, and are no longer members of the Respondents in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act by imposing court-collectible fines on the employees because of their postresignation conduct in working at Liberty Glass Company during the strike that began about 1 April 1983.

(c) Threatening employees who have resigned from the Respondents with fines, suspensions, expulsions, or the filing of intraunion charges and threatening them with being blackballed or having their operators' card stricken if they return to work during a strike.

(d) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Expunge from their governing documents article 26, section 10, of the International Union's constitution as described above.

(b) Rescind the fines levied against the following persons because of their postresignation work for Liberty Glass Company during the strike that began about 1 April 1983 and refund to them any money they may have paid as a result of the fines, with interest:

Local Union 128	Local Union 185
Earl Hankes	Wandra J. Martin
Bobby Hurt Jr.	Ramona Faye Hurt
Dennis Houser	Jackie Peek
James Norman Cook	Ina Rice
Roy Matney	Mary Edwards
Edwin McKean	Leon Ashlock
Vernie Dodson	Jerry Shipman

(c) Post at their business offices and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 16, after being signed by the Respondents' authorized representatives, shall be posted by the Respondents immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Mail to the Regional Director forthwith signed copies of the notice for posting by Liberty Glass Company, if the Company is willing.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondents have taken to comply.

International, which is not a party to this proceeding. Instead, Member Dennis would order the Respondents to notify their members in writing that they will not enforce the restriction on resignations.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT maintain in our governing documents article 26, section 10, of the constitution of the International Union, which reads as follows:

> No member may resign from his local union of the International Union during a strike. All attempted resignations shall become effective thirty (30) days from the last day of the strike.

WE WILL NOT restrain or coerce employees who have resigned from, and are no longer members of, our organizations in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act by imposing court—collectible fines on them because of their postresignation conduct in working at Liberty Glass Company during the strike that began about 1 April 1983.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees who have resigned from our organizations with fines, suspensions, expulsion, or the filing of intraunion charges nor will we threaten to blackball employees or have their operators cards stricken for returning to work during a strike.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL expunge from our governing documents article 26, section 10, of the International Union's constitution as described above.

WE WILL rescind the fines levied against the following persons because of their postresignation work for Liberty Glass Company during the strike that began about 1 April 1983 and refund to them any money they may have paid as a result of the fines, plus interest:

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM A. GERSHUNY, Administrative Law Judge. A hearing was conducted in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on August 2, 1983, on consolidated complaints alleging violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A) based on Respondents' enforcement of a provision of the International Union's constitution which prohibits resignation from membership in local unions during a strike.

On the entire record, including my observation of witness demeanor, I hereby make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaints allege, the answers, as amended, admit, and I find that Liberty Glass Co. is an employer subject to the Act and that Respondents are labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The relevant facts are undisputed.

For some time prior to 1983, Local Unions 128 and 185 have been the bargaining representatives of employees at Liberty Glass' Sapulpa, Oklahoma plant. Labor agreements covering these employees have made union membership a condition of employment. At the time of hiring, Liberty Glass routinely obtained employee signatures on union membership applications and dues-checkoff authorizations which, by their terms, obligated employees to abide by all union rules and laws.

At all relevant times, the constitution of the International Union provided, in article 26, section 6, that members crossing a picket line during an authorized strike might be fined, suspended, or expelled from membership and, in article 26, section 10, that

> No member may resign from his local union of the International Union during a strike. All attempted resignations shall become effective thirty (30) days from the last day of the strike.

All members were informed of the existence of such provisions upon their adoption in 1981; copies of the constitution were posted and made available to all members; and members were reminded of the provisions at union meetings conducted on March 30, 1983.

At the March 30 meetings, the membership of each local union unanimously voted to reject the Company's final contract proposal and to engage in a strike. That strike commenced on April 1 and was still continuing at the time of the hearing in this case, August 2.

During that strike, 14 members in good standing submitted their resignations in writing to their local union:

Local Union 128	Local Union 185
*Earl Hankes	Wandra J. Martin
Bobby Hurt, Jr.	*Ramona Faye Hurt
*Dennis Houser	*Jackie Peek
*James Norman Cook	Ina Rice
*Roy Matney	*Mary Edwards
*Edwin McKean	*Leon Ashlock
*/Vernie Dodson	*Jerry Shipman

* Participated in picketing
 On layoff on March 30

Thereafter, each crossed the picket line and returned to work; was informed by the local union that, under article 26, section 10 of the constitution the resignation would not become effective until 30 days from the last day of the strike; was charged by the local union with a violation of article 26, section 6, which prohibits a member from crossing a picket line; was found guilty following a hearing and fined $600 and $25 per day if a member of Local Union 185 and $1000 and $25 per day if a member of Local Union 128. At the hearing all parties, through counsel, stipulated that there are no issues in these cases as to the timeliness or regularity of either the employee resignations or the actions of the local unions in response to the resignations.

Prior to the strike, all members were covered under a union life insurance program, the premium for which was $1 per month deducted from regular union dues. All members, including the 14 who are the subject of this proceeding, continue to be covered under the program after commencement of the strike, with the International Union paying all such premiums. There is no evidence that any of the 14 members have received any benefit payments under such program since April 1, 1983.

On or shortly after April 10, when he sent his initial resignation telegram, and again on or shortly after April 16, when he sent a second resignation telegram, member Houser was visited at his home by local union officials who first inquired whether he intended to return to work and then informed him that he would be fined and blackballed by the Union if he did so during pendency of the strike.

In Machinists Local 1327 (Dalmo Victor), 263 NLRB 984 (1982), a divided Board struck down as an unlawful restriction of a member's right, under Section 7 of the Act, to refrain from union or other concerted activity, a union rule prohibiting resignations during the entire course of a strike or within 14 days preceding its commencement. Members Fanning and Zimmerman, balancing the statutory right of the members and that the union under the proviso to Section 8(b)(1)(A), were of the opinion that 30 days was a reasonable restriction on such right of resignation, while Chairman Van de Water and Member Hunter were of the opinion that the statutory right of a member was paramount and that any delay in the effective date of a resignation was unlawful.

Under either view, the provision here is unlawful, for it restricts the effective date of any resignation to the duration of an authorized strike (however long) plus 30 days. Nor are there present here any extraordinary circumstances which would compel a reexamination of Dalmo Victor, even if I had authority to do so. Participation in a unanimous strike vote or in picketing, both considered by the Board in Dalmo Victor, are commonplace occurrences. And the action of the International Union in paying insurance premiums of its members puts it in the position of a volunteer and, in any event, is an irrelevant consideration in the issue of whether the constitutional limitation on resignations conflicts with the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 21 May 1984 Administrative Law Judge Marion C. Ladwig issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Heck's, Inc., Nitro and Cross Lanes, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

DECISION

MARION C. LADWIG, Administrative Law Judge. These cases were tried at Charleston, West Virginia, February 14, 1984.[1] The Teamsters Local 175 charge was filed October 21 and the UFCW Local 347 charges were filed November 21 and December 7, complaints were issued December 5 and January 5, orders consolidating the cases were issued January 11 and 17, and consolidated amended complaints were issued January 17 and 19.

The Teamsters and UFCW were engaged in organizing campaigns among warehousemen and secretaries at the Company's warehouse and offices at Nitro, and the UFCW among store employees at Cross Lanes, West Virginia. The primary issues are whether the Company, the Respondent, (a) coercively interrogated an employee and discharged her because of her union activity, (b) maintained an invalid no-distribution rule, (c) engaged in unlawful surveillance, (d) coerced employees by stating in a letter that "Heck's has an absolute right to see the union cards" they sign, and (e) engaged in other coercive conduct, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, the Company, and the Teamsters, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, a West Virginia corporation, operates retail stores at various locations including Cross Lanes, West Virginia, annually deriving over $500,000 in gross revenue and receiving at its Nitro, West Virginia warehouse goods valued over $50,000 directly from outside the State. The Company admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that Teamsters Local 175 and UFCW Local 347 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Interrogation and Discharge of UFCW Member

1. Her reemployment

Since April 1982, Roxanne Jividen has been a UFCW member with a regular part-time job at Kroger's Cross Lanes store. She works 15 to 20 hours a week, usually in the early morning from 5 to 10 a.m. or 4 to 9 a.m. (Tr. 48.)

She had previously worked twice as a cashier at the Company's nonunion Cross Lanes store (about a mile from the Kroger store), for 7 months in 1981 and during the 1982 Christmas season. Store Manager David Romeo, who hired her each of those times, was aware that she was working at the unionized Kroger store because he recommended her for the job (Tr. 9).

On September 1, Manager Romeo again hired her to work as a cashier during the 1983 Christmas season, after having seen her at the store and asked if she was interested in coming to work (Tr. 38). He admittedly hired her "out of her working ability" (Tr. 22). He asked her if she wanted to work mornings or evenings. She requested straight evenings, but told him that her schedule at Kroger's could be worked around any given week, and he said "Fine." (Tr. 39.) (Jividen's Kroger supervisor had assured her that any rescheduling that was needed for her second job could be done.) Romeo admitted at the trial that he told her she was being hired primarily for the night shift and that she "probably did" tell him

[1] All dates are from September 1983 until April 1984 unless otherwise stated.

"that if scheduling problems arose, she had some flexibility at Kroger" (Tr. 16).

From September 1 to October 27, when Manager Romeo summarily discharged Jividen purportedly for "scheduling reasons," he admittedly had no discussions with her about any possible scheduling conflicts between her two part-time jobs (Tr. 13–14). The only conflict that had arisen was on one of the first three Sundays in September (Tr. 12), when Kroger assigned her to work until 1 p.m., the same time the company had scheduled her to begin working that day. There was no need for her to ask her Kroger supervisor for permission to leave work a few minutes early because the day before she asked Assistant Manager Asaad Karam if she could be 15 minutes late and she said, "Sure, no problem." (Tr. 41, 50–51.) She clocked in at 1:15 p.m., as rescheduled. She never made any other requests to have her schedule changed (Tr. 47). Except for one time when she came in 30 minutes early at his request, Romeo never told her he wanted to schedule her for longer or different hours (Tr. 27, 47). She was working about 28 hours a week (Tr. 52).

2. The interrogation

Although Manager Romeo was aware that Jividen was a member of UFCW when he rehired her September 1 (Tr. 16), he admittedly was not aware of any UFCW organizing at the store at the time (Tr. 28).

On September 20, the day after UFCW began handbilling at the store, Assistant Manager Karam held meetings to explain the Company's opposition to a union. In the meeting that Jividen attended (as she credibly testified), Karam stated that there had never been and never would be a union at that store (Tr. 42). It is undisputed, however, that Karam also stated in the meeting that the Company "will use legal ways not to unionize the store" (Tr. 74).

At this September 20 meeting (about 5 weeks before Jividen's sudden discharge without any warning), Assistant Manager Karam singled her out, requiring her to take a stand on UFCW, which he was vigorously opposing in the meeting. As credibly testified by Jividen (who impressed me as an honest, forthright witness by her demeanor on the stand), "Mr. Karam asked me, 'Roxanne, what do you think of Kroger's union?' And I said, 'I'm very satisfied with it'" (Tr. 43). As credibly recalled by sporting goods clerk Richard Corey (who attended the same meeting), Jividen also added that "She thought the benefits were good" (Tr. 30). I discredit Karam's denial that he asked Jividen how she liked Kroger's union (Tr. 76). (He appeared on the stand to be less than candid.)

Assistant Manager Karam was clearly acting as the Company's spokesman when calling the meeting of employees and explaining the Company's strong opposition to a union at the store. By asking Jividen what she thought of Kroger's union (her own union, which represented her at the neighboring Kroger store), he was obviously seeking information on which the Company could take action against her. He expressed no legitimate purpose for asking the question and expressed no assurances to her against reprisal. He was forcing her, in front of the other assembled employees, to either join him in opposing UFCW to retain the Company's goodwill, or risk taking a stand against the Company's position. She took the risk and answered truthfully that she was pleased with UFCW and the union benefits. About 5 weeks later, she was summarily discharged.

Although Karam's statement in the meeting about the Company using "legal ways" to keep out a union may have tended to lessen the impact of his warning that there would never be a union in that store, I find that it would not overcome the tendency of his interrogation of Jividen to instill fear of reprisal, discouraging support of UFCW's organizing drive at the store. Under all the circumstances, including her summary discharge, I find that the interrogation reasonably tended to coerce the employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

3. Her discharge

On October 20, Store Manger Romeo called another employee meeting and told the employees not to be misled by grocery store employees—that a grocery store employee might be making $8 an hour, but "we are a completely different business" (Tr. 16–17). He testified that he was not referring to any one individual, although he acknowledged that Jividen was the only store employee who also worked at an organized grocery store and that he decided to discharge her "right after that."

About 9:25 p.m., October 27, Romeo called employee Corey to relieve Jividen at the cashier's box and service desk, invited her to his office, took out some graphs, and commented that "Heck's is changing" and that "it costs so much to . . . train an employee" (Tr. 44). As Jividen credibly testified,

> A. . . . the graph showed how much it would cost to train an employee. And he said, "Due to this and your inflexibility in working hours, I'm going to have to terminate you."
> Q. Did you say anything?
> A. I was flabbergasted. I . . . said, "Mr. Romeo, I know this doesn't have to do with the inflexibility of my working hours. It has to do with the union."
> Q. And what did he say?
> A. He didn't say yes or no. He just said, "I'm sorry, this is the reason for your termination."

(Tr. 45.) Employee Corey overheard Jividen asking if it was because she was in the union, but could not hear Romeo's response (Tr. 31). Romeo claimed that he told her that was not the reason (Tr. 23).

About 2 days later, on Saturday, October 29, employee Corey talked to Department Head Colleen Fisher about Jividen's discharge (Tr. 32, 35). (Although Fisher was the immediate supervisor over the service desk where Jividen worked, Fisher admittedly was not aware at the time that the store manager was discharging Jividen (Tr. 70–71).) Corey had heard in the store that Jividen was fired because of inflexibility in scheduling and told Fisher he thought this was the reason. As Corey (a credible witness) testified, Fisher said, "No, that she was running her mouth about the union." (I discredit Fisher's denial that she made this statement.)

The supervisor's statement that Jividen was not discharged because of inflexibility in her working hours but because she engaged in union activity was clearly coercive. I therefore find that the statement violated Section 8(a)(1).

4. The Company's defenses

Store Manager Romeo testified that Jividen "was terminated on scheduling reasons" (Tr. 12). He explained that under new programs that went into effect since Chairman Isaacs became the chief executive officer early in 1983, the goal was to work with few employees and "save on training costs," and "it was of upmost importance that we had flexibility" in scheduling the employees' (Tr. 11, 19–20). The number of employees hired for the 1983 Christmas season was "somewhere around" 38 or 39, as compared to "Last year [when] I think we had as many as 45" (Tr. 21).

He testified that Jividen had come in 15 minutes late on a Sunday (sometime before September 25), that "She mentioned that she had commitments at Kroger's," and that this "started the mind thinking" (Tr. 12). "I started thinking then that . . . later on down the road as we got into the Christmas season, our store would probably change—and they did change, November 6 [10 days after her discharge] we started opening at 12 noon on Sunday" (working from 12 to 6 p.m. instead of 1 to 7 p.m.) (Tr. 12). He further claimed that "It seemed to me that Kroger's was going to be her primary source of work," and "I felt that Kroger's was her main job and that she would as far as flexibility goes with my work schedule, that she would be following Kroger's schedule rather than Heck's" (Tr. 14). When asked by company counsel if Jividen did "give Heck's priority over her other job," Romeo answered (Tr. 22)

> A. I would say no.
> Q. All right, can you be specific on that?
> A. The only way that I could be specific was . . . the day that she said she would be late due to Kroger. That would basically be it.

(He did not impress me as being a candid witness.)

In its brief, the Company contends that "Mr. Romeo testified that he had difficulty scheduling her around her schedule at Kroger [evidently referring to the one Sunday in September]. Ms. Jividen herself admitted that Kroger was her primary employer [referring to her year-round employment, working part time 15 or 20 hours a week]. Thus, one must conclude that when a scheduling conflict occurred it would be resolved in favor of Kroger." The Company also argues that she "had a permanent employment with Kroger some five minutes away," that this "was her primary employer," and that "one would presume" that her secondary employment at Heck's "would have to take a back seat to her employment at Kroger. When it appeared obvious to the manager, David Romeo, that Ms. Jividen's schedule at Kroger was such that she would not be able to fit in with the flexibility required of Christmas help with Heck's—she was terminated."

I find that these are frivoulous defenses. There was no conflict between her usual early morning schedule at Kroger and her night schedule at Heck's. Her supervisor at Kroger had assured her that any rescheduling that was needed for her second job at Heck's could be done, and it is undisputed that she told Romeo when he hired her that her schedule at Kroger's could be worked around any given week. (Romeo admitted that she probably did tell him that if scheduling problems arose, she had some flexibility at Kroger.) The only conflict that ever arose was shortly after she was hired, when she was scheduled to work on both jobs on a Sunday, getting off at 1 p.m. at Kroger and starting at 1 p.m. at Heck's. Assistant Manager Karam rescheduled her to start at 1:15, telling her "no problem." She readily agreed the one time Romeo asked her to come in 30 minutes early.

Store Manager Romeo admitted that he never had any complaints from other employees about Jividen's work schedule (Tr. 16), and that he never discussed possible scheduling conflicts with her before he decided to terminate her (Tr. 13–14). Although he testified that he had anticipated a scheduling change during the Christmas season, and one did occur (10 days after he discharge Jividen), that involved only a change in the Sunday working hours from 1–7 to 12–6. Her flexible Kroger schedule could have accommodated that change, even if she were scheduled to work another Sunday on both jobs.

He had sought her out to see if she would work again for him, and he had hired her because of her working ability. Undoubtedly if any difficulty in scheduling her had arisen or was anticipated, he would have discussed the problem with her.

There was obviously no scheduling problem. The only other reason he mentioned for the discharge, the cost of training an employee, was clearly not applicable to her; she was fully trained, having worked on the job twice before.

5. Finding of discrimination

Store Manager Romeo was not concerned about Jividen's membership in UFCW until that union began organizing at his store. The next day after the handbilling began, Romeo's assistant manager unlawfully interrogated her in an employee meeting about what she thought about her union at Kroger. Despite the Company's vigorous opposition to the store being unionized, Jividen answered that she was very satisfied with the Kroger union and that she thought the benfits were good. A month later, Romeo called another meeting and told the employees not to be misled by grocery store employees about possible union wages at the store. (Jividen was the only employee who also worked at an organized grocery store.) Seven days later, Romeo suddenly discharged her near quitting time, without any prior discussion or warning. He claimed the reasons were high training costs and her "inflexibility in working hours," although she was already trained, and her working hours were flexible by prior arrangement at Kroger. Two days later, a supervisor advised another employee that Jividen was not discharged because of inflexibility in working hours, but because "she was running her mouth about the union."

I find that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that Jividen's union activity was a motivating factor in the Company's decision to discharge her. Having found the Company's defenses to be frivolous, I find that the purported reasons were a mere pretext and that the Company discriminatorily discharged her because of her union activity, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1).

B. Overly Broad No-Distribution Rule

The Company's "Heck's and You" employee manual, which was last revised in September 1980, was issued to all employees at the Nitro warehouse and in all its stores (G.C. Exh. 3; Tr. 63). Under "Rules and Discipline Procedure" (at 21–23), the manual provides that "Employees will be subject to disciplinary action for any of the following [42] offenses." Rule 13 prescribes a written warning, 1 week off, and discharge for the first, second, and third offenses and forbids (at 21)

> 13. Distributing written or printed matter of any description on company premises unless approved by Management.

At the Cross Lanes store, Assistant Manager Karam read this rule in the employee meetings he held September 20, the day after union handbilling began.

The General Counsel contends that this rule is overly broad and illegal on its face. The Company contends that there is no indication that the rule related to the union movement at all and, ignoring Karam's admission that he read the rule to employees after the union organizing began, argues that "clear testimony of [Store Manager] Romeo establishes that this Rule was not enforced in any way." The Company also contend that unless the rule is issued to limit or disrupt Section 7 rights, the rule should not be declared invalid.

I agree with the General Counsel. In one of the cases he cites, Olympic Villas, 241 NLRB 358, 363 (1979), the employee manual prescribed a penalty "up to and including discharge" for "distribution of literature of any kind" anywhere on the premises "without the general manager's approval." There, the employer "made no effort whatsoever to inform its employees either before or during the union campaign that the rule was not in effect," the rule remained to be invoked anytime the employer chose to do so, "By the mere existence of the rule the employees remained under a continuous threat" that the employer would invoke the rule, and "Thus, the rule constitutes interference with the organizational rights of employees that Section 8(a)(1) of the Act condemns."

Similarly here, I find that by maintaining the overly broad no-distribution rule, prohibiting the distribution of any written matter on company premises unless approved by management, the Company coerced employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

C. Alleged Surveillance

About 4:55 p.m., October 21, several UFCW representatives went to the company offices at the warehouse to handbill the secretaries. A member of management came out and requested them not to block traffic. A few minutes later, Business Representatives Claude Roster and Sterling Ball went about a quarter mile away, to the entrance of the complex, and began handbilling at the intersection. On instructions from Company President Ray Darnell, who was in the parking lot, Personnel Director Henry Babcock drove Darnell's car (a sable-colored Cadillac) to the intersection to determine the reason for the traffic jam. After observing the efforts to handbill employees as they were leaving, Babcock drove into the intersection, turned around and waited 3 or 4 minutes to get back into the traffic, and returned to the parking lot.

When Bobcock reported to President Darnell that there was no accident, that handbilling was slowing down the traffic, Darnell asked him to go back and request the union representatives not to block the traffic so badly. The second time, however, Babcock found that the traffic was moving faster and did not relay the request. He again turned around, waited a short time for the traffic to let him through, and returned to the parking lot. (Tr. 64–67.)

The General Counsel contends that "Babcock's only purpose in driving out onto the road in Respondent's president's automobile was not only to observe the handbilling but to signal employees by the use of a conspicuous automobile owned by Respondent's president, that he was there to observe their activity." To the contrary, however, I credit Babcock's testimony that he went there the first time to determine the reason for the traffic jam, and the second time to ask the organizers not to obstruct traffic so much.

I therefore agree with the Company that it was not engaged in surveillance of its employees' union activities, and find that this allegation must be dismissed.

D. Coercive Letter to Employees

1. Contested language and contentions of parties

About October 10, the Company distributed a letter (G.C. Exhs. 2A and 2B) to employees at the Cross Lanes store and the warehouse. The one-page letter (written in all capitals) was signed by Company Chairman Russell Isaacs. The letter opposed the signing of union cards, stating toward the end "We feel that a union would be of no advantage to any of us and it would hurt the business that we all depend on for our livelihood," and "if anyone should come to you and ask you to sign a union authorization card, we are asking you to refuse to sign it."

The middle paragraph of the letter (the capitalization retained in only the last sentence for emphasis) read

> These cards are often obtained by unions by making false statements or misrepresentations. These cards could be used as evidence with the National Labor Relations Board to get into a company without an election. The Union is telling you that Heck's will never see the union cards you sign. This is just not true. In past cases with this Union we have seen these cards which were shown to us by the NLRB where the Union claims bargaining rights without an election. HECK'S HAS AN ABSOLUTE RIGHT TO SEE THE UNION CARDS.

In his brief, the General Counsel "submits that not only is this statement inaccurate but it also is incomplete and a misstatement of applicable Board law." The Teamsters' brief argues that "The statement, 'HECK'S HAS AN ABSOLUTE RIGHT TO SEE THE UNION CARDS,' is manifestly false and is presented to its employees to make them believe that the identity of union supporters and members would be made known to Mr. Isaacs, and appropriate reprisals would be taken."

The Company argues in its brief that when the sentence, "Heck's has an absolute right to see the union cards," is "read in the context of the entire paragraph, it is obvious that what Mr. Isaacs is saying in that particular sentence is that where the union is demanding bargaining rights without an election, Heck's has the right to see the cards." I disagree. That is a paraphrase of two preceding sentences, "These cards could be used as evidence with the National Labor Relations Board to get into a company without an election" and "In past cases with this Union we have seen these cards which were shown to us by the NLRB where the union claims bargaining rights without an election." It is clearly not the meaning of the last, unequivocal statement, that Heck's "has" the "absolute" right to see the union cards.

Even if employees could be expected to ignore the clear, plain message in the unqualified statement, "Heck's has an absolute right to see the union cards," and to analyze the whole paragraph to derive some limited meaning, this added sentence would still place the confidentiality of their cardsigning in jeopardy. Thus the company chairman asserts that "The Union is telling you that Heck's will never see the union cards you sign," and makes three responses. The first is "This is just not true." The second is that "In past cases with this Union we have seen these cards which were shown to us by the NLRB where the Union claims bargaining rights without an election." Those are complete responses to the purported union contention that the Company "will never see the union cards you sign." But then the chairman adds a third response—without making any reference to the right the Company "had" in past cases to see the cards, or to the right it "would have" if the Union claimed bargaining rights without an election. Claiming a present, unqualified right to see the cards, he adds that "Heck's has an absolute right to see the union cards" (emphasis added).

2. Concluding findings

It is well recognized that employees would be coerced or "chilled" in the exercise of their Section 7 right to sign union authorization cards if they knew that the employer had the absolute right to see the cards.

In denying an employer access to union authorization cards under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552, the court held in Committee on Masonic Homes, 556 F.2d 214, 221 (3d Cir. 1977) (footnotes omitted)

> [I]t is entirely plausible that employees would be "chilled" when asked to sign a union card if they knew the employer could see who signed. . . . To order disclosure here would effectively do away with union cards as they are used now. We need only consider whether employees would be likely to sign a prominently displayed notice at work, "Sign up for the union here. Organize for better working conditions and higher wages." Solicitation of authorization cards plays a vital role in organizational campaigns, and we cannot envision a workable substitute.
> Furthermore, union elections must be conducted by secret ballot. Whatever reasons and policies lie behind that would be directly undercut by forcing employees to acknowledge in public their support of the union, in order to be given the right to vote in secret for the union.

After quoting this language in Pacific Molasses Co., 577 F.2d 1172, 1182 (5th Cir. 1978), the court observed

> We agree with the Third Circuit, and feel that the Freedom of Information Act does not compel disclosure of these cards. . . . We would be naive to disregard the abuse which could potentially occur if employers and other employees were armed with this information. The inevitable result of the availability of this information would be to chill the right of employees to express their favorable union sentiments. Such a chilling effect would undermine the rights guaranteed by the NLRA and, for all intents and purposes, would make meaningless those provisions . . . which guarantee secrecy in union elections.

In Madeira Nursing Center, 615 F.2d 728, 730–731 (6th Cir. 1980), the court cited Masonic Homes and Pacific Molasses and found

> Both the 3rd and 5th Circuits have held that union authorization cards are not discoverable under the Act. . . .
> . . . .
> When an employee signs an authorization card during the initial phase of union organization, he expresses a personal decision to seek the support of a union in future dealings with his employer. Since the union organization of a company may take the form of a protracted and bitter struggle over employee loyalties, an employee may be amply justified in wishing to protect his prounion declaration from employer scrutiny.
> Appellant insists that an employee can have no expectation of confidentiality when he signs a card. This contention is apparently based on the fact that a union which holds authorizations from the majority of a bargaining unit may bypass the election process by submitting its authorization cards directly to the employer. Appellant's argument ignores an important distinction. An employee may reasonably feel less vulnerable after he knows his union is likely to prevail than at the outset of an organization campaign when the ultimate result remains un> certain. Indeed, it is in such a case as this one, where the defeated Union may be unable to give the support anticipated by its adherents, that employees who sign authorization cards could be most justified in seeking to preserve their anonymity.

Several cases involve alleged coercion when an employer refers to this anonymity of cardsigning being lost when a union seeks recognition without an election. In NLRB v. Finesilver Mfg. Co., 400 F.2d 644, 645–646 (5th Cir. 1968), the employer posted a notice, stating that "The union says the signing of cards will be confidential," but the truth is that "Any employee who signs a card for a union may be called upon to testify in open court under a subpoena," and commenting that "The best way to avoid this is to stay away from the union meetings, and then you can't be forced to sign cards." The court observed that "we see no reason for informing employees that they might be required to testify in open court other than to let them know that the names of union adherents could be ascertained and appropriate reprisals taken." It held that whether or not this and another statement were legally correct, they "have unlawfully coercive implications, especially when considered in the context of the company's widespread patter of antiunion conduct."

In Lundy Packing Co., 223 NLRB 139 (1976), enf. denied in relevant part 549 F.2d 300, 301 (4th Cir. 1977), the Board found "there was no reason for informing employees that they might be required to testify in open court other than to let them know that the names of union adherents could be ascertained and appropriate reprisals taken." Similarly, except this time with court approval, the Board in Arrow Automotive Industries, 256 NLRB 1027, 1033–1034 (1981), enfd. mem. 679 F.2d 875 (4th Cir. 1982), adopted the administrative law judge's finding that "Absent . . . any valid reason for repeatedly informing employees that those employees who sign union cards could be required to appear in court to testify about them and occurring in the context of other unfair labor practices," the vice president's statements in letters to employees, in the employer's newspaper, and in a speech "were to discourage employees from signing union authorization cards," violating Section 8(a)(1).

In Huntington Rubber Co., 260 NLRB 1008 (1982), the employer's vice president told employees in a meeting that "if the Union obtained signed cards from over 50 percent of the employees, the Union would take the cards out in [his] office and lay them on his desk." The Board adopted the judge's finding that the statement, in the context of several other unfair labor practices, "conveyed a threat to the employees that the identities of those who signed union cards would be revealed" to the employer, "followed by appropriate reprisals."

All four of these decisions involved the loss of confidentiality if the union uses the cards to seek bargaining rights without an election. In Finesilver, Lundy, and Arrow, the employer's statements about cardsigners having to appear in court were held to be coercive, and in Huntington, the statement about the union's laying the cards on the employer's desk after obtaining a 50-percent majority was found to be.

Here, in contrast, the statement that "Heck's has an absolute right to see the union cards" is an uneqivocal warning to the employees that they cannot sign union authorization cards in confidence, even if the cards are used merely to show sufficient support for a secret Board election. The General Counsel does not allege to be coercive the two statements in the October 10 letter about cards being used "to get into a company without an election" and about the Company seeing the union cards "where the Union claims bargaining rights without an election."

I find that this added, last sentence in the quoted paragraph, that the Company "has an absolute right" to see the cards, was intended to discourage employees from signing the union authorization cards by instilling fear of reprisals. I therefore find that the statement tends to coerce the employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By discriminatorily discharging Roxanne Jividen October 27, 1983, because of her union activity, the Company engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By coercively interrogating an employee, the Company violated, Section 8(a)(1).

3. By telling an employee that the Company had discharged an employee for engaging in union activity, a company supervisor violated Section 8(a)(1).

4. By maintaining in its employee manual an overly broad no-distribution rule, prohibiting the distribution of any written matter on company premises unless approved by management, the Company violated Section 8(a)(1).

5. By informing employees that "Heck's has an absolute right to see the union cards" to discourage them from signing union authorization cards by instilling fear of reprisals, the Company violated Section 8(a)(1).

6. The Company did not engage in surveillance of its employees' union activities.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent having discriminatorily discharged an employee hired for the 1983 Christmas season, it must make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits, computed on a quaterly basis from the date of her discharge to the date her seasonal employment would otherwise have ended, less any net interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

The Respondent, Heck's, Inc., Nitro and Cross Lanes, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against any employee for supporting Food Store Employees Union, Local 347, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC, or any other union.

(b) Coercively interrogating any employee about union sympathies.

(c) Telling any employee that it has discharged an employee for engaging in union activity.

(d) Maintaining a rule prohibiting employees from distributing any written matter on company premises unless approved by management.

(e) Discouraging employees from signing union authorization cards by informing them that "Heck's has an absolute right to see the union cards."

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make Roxanne Jividen whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against her, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge and notify the employee in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used against her in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its warehouse at Nitro, West Virginia, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A," and at its store at Cross Lanes, West Virginia, copies of the notice marked "Appendix B."[3] Copies of notices, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaints are dismissed insofar as they allege violations of the Act not specifically found.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 9 August 1982 Administrative Law Judge Robert A. Gritta issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel each filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Charging Party filed a brief in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by implementing a striker recall policy which restricted the recall of strikers to their prestrike positions and resulted in the preferential hiring of new employees in jobs which, the parties stipulated, the unrecalled strikers were qualified to perform. Inasmuch as valid business considerations might well justify such restrictive recall measures, our affirmance of the judge's above findings rests on the evidence of record which belies any possible business justification for the Respondent's recall procedure here.

The judge found there is ample evidence of the Respondent's avowed policy favoring cross-training and multiple capabilities for all hotel employees. The record evidence concerning the Respondent's past transfers—of a painter to dishwasher to houseman; houseman to hotel trainee; bar porter to furniture refinisher; bartender to room service manager—serves to establish the disparateness of promulgating those jobs as separate work functions for purposes of recalling economic strikers who have made unconditional applications for reinstatement. A further illustration of the Respondent's inconsistency vis-a-vis employment and recall policy is shown by the separate grouping of Dining Room PM and Dining Room AM on the recall document despite the lack of evidence that the Respondent ever classified new dining room hires as PM or AM. Accordingly, for the above reasons and the total absence of evidence of any business justification for the recall procedure utilized by the Respondent, we affirm the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[4]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Arlington Hotel Company, Inc., Hot Springs, Arkansas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(b):

"(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] Respondent has requested oral argument. This request is hereby denied as the record, the exceptions, and the briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] In the absence of specific exceptions thereto, we adopt pro forma the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by refusing to reinstate striker Aretha Collins.

[3] We have concluded that a broad remedial order is inapposite and we have substituted the narrow injunctive language. See Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

[4] We are unable, due to the absence of striker seniority dates, to pass on the accuracy of the respective strikers' recall dates as found by the judge. We will accordingly refer the matter to the compliance stage of this proceeding.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discriminate against striking employees who have applied for reinstatement at a time when their former positions were occupied by replacement employees by refusing to offer each reemployment to an existing vacancy.

WE WILL NOT give job preference to newly hired employees over our returning striker employees.

WE WILL NOT give job preference to striker replacement employees over our returning striker employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer each striker against whom we have found to have been discriminated full and immediate reinstatement to his or her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position of employment without prejudice to his or her seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed; and WE WILL make each striker whole for any loss of pay suffered as a result of the discrimination against her or him, with interest.

ARLINGTON HOTEL COMPANY, INCORPORATED

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT A. GRITTA, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on December 9, 10, and 11, 1981, in Hot Springs, Arkansas, based on amended charges filed by International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, AFL–CIO (the Union) on March 23 and April 22, 1981, and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 26 of the National Labor Relations Board on May 29, 1981.[1] The complaint alleges that Arlington Hotel Company, Inc. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by refusing to reinstate economic strikers to their former positions or substantially equivalent positions after the strikers made an unconditional offer to return to work. Respondent's timely answer denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

All parties hereto were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to introduce evidence, and to argue orally. Briefs were submitted by the General Counsel, Respondent, and the Union. All briefs were duly considered.

On the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor on the witness stand, and on substantive, reliable evidence considered along with the consistency and inherent probability of testimony, I make the following[2]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Arlington Hotel Company, Inc. is an Arkansas corporation engaged in the operation of a nonresidential hotel in Hot Springs, Arkansas. Jurisdiction is not in issue. Arlington Hotel Company, Inc. annually in the course and conduct of its business operations derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and purchases and receives at its Hot Springs, Arkansas facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Arkansas. I conclude and find that Arlington Hotel Company, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I conclude and find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. OVERVIEW[3]

Respondent operates a resort hotel in Hot Springs, Arkansas throughout the year. Besides the horse race season, there is tourism and visitations to the natural spring baths. General Manager Horst Fischer came to the hotel during the winter of 1979. It was his function as general manager to revitalize an ailing facility. He proceeded to upgrade the services of the facility to a first-class establishment for guests. Included in Fischer's renovations were a new chef and reorganization of the various functions such as food, beverage, and specialty preparations and the service facilities to dispense the products. As a result of the changes, a gourmet dining room was added to the hotel. By the fall of 1980 the changes were well in place and the hotel was functioning as a first-class resort under the guidance of Fischer. The horse race reason runs from February 5 to April 11 annually and the 1981 season brought over 1000 guests to the hotel. Fischer's expectations were to maintain 99-percent occupancy. The race season is one of the busiest times for the hotel and the 81 season was interrupted by a strike called by the Union. Fischer was notified of the impending strike on March 12 by an official of the Union. The following morning approximately 66 employees did not report for work. Respondent began hiring replacement employees to carry on its business. After the strike Respondent began recalling the striking employees it considered eligible for reinstatement.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Strike's End; Offer to Return; Recall Procedure

The uncontroverted and/or corroborated evidence in the record discloses the following:

The strike which began on the morning of March 13 ended at 5 p.m. on March 16 when the Union sent Respondent a telegram. The telegram reads:

> On behalf of all striking employees we hereby apply unconditionally for reinstatement to their old positions and/or their maximum employment rights under the law.

On March 17 the striking employees returned individually and presented Respondent's management with a form letter which reads:

> I hereby apply unconditionally for my old job back, or if my old job is not available, my maximum employment rights under the law. Please consider this a continuing application for employment.

[1] All dates herein are in 1981 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] Jt. Exhs. 1 and 2 are received into the record.

[3] The facts necessary to resolve the issues in this case are largely undisputed. Several fact issues involving conduct of individual employees will be determined as they arise.

Respondent ceased hiring replacements on March 16 and devised a recall system to implement the placement of returning strikers. Fischer had prepared a list from information supplied by department heads detailing all employees who had not reported for working during the strike to enable Respondent to determine who had to be replaced during the strike. This list plus a list of employees hired as replacements formed the basis for the recall system on March 16. All jobs in the hotel which included striking employees were grouped into categories and structured as the striking employees' former positions and substantially equivalent positions. All striking employees were listed by seniority within each category and any vacancies existing in any category were filled by the most senior striker who held that vacant position before the strike. On this basis 31 strikers were reinstated to their former positions. All remaining strikers were considered by Respondent to be permanently replaced. Any vacancy arising in any category of the recall list was filled by the most senior replaced striker who had occupied the position before the strike. All other vacancies occurring in the hotel were filled by newly hired employees without any consideration being given to striking employees awaiting return to work. Fischer stated that it was indicated to him very plainly that the strikers wanted their jobs back and there was just no other way to call them back except to their old job. For whatever reason, Fischer established the policy that striking employees would only be recalled to their specific prestrike job. Fischer also stated that he did not consider any striking employees' work history in the hotel or any past experience in classification of work other than the employee's prestrike classification when recalling replaced strikers.

As a result of Respondent's devised recall system and its policy to only recall strikers for vacancies in their specific prestrike position, 25 striking employees were not recalled to work. The 25 were composed of 5 maids, 1 floor supervisor in housekeeping, 1 evening waitress in the Venetian dining room, 4 morning waitresses in the Venetian dining room, 1 garde-manger, 1 room service waiter, 4 cashiers, 2 bellmen, 3 banquet employees, 1 maintenance man, 1 furniture refinisher, and 1 carpenter. The five maids were grouped for recall as housekeeping-maids-permanent.[4] Ann Pascoe, the floor supervisor, was grouped separately under housekeeping. The dining room bus help grouping was divided between busman, p.m. waitresses, and a.m. waitresses with only the Venetian dining room represented.[5] The kitchen group was divided into cooks, pantry, pantry temporary, stewards, and garde-manger, naming Frank Avant as the incumbent. Room service was a separate grouping showing Richard Alexander as the only striker. Cashiers were grouped as permanent and temporary with Bertha Welhelmi and Linda Portwood as permanent and Freida Wallace and Gloria Morse as temporary. Frank Jones and Nathan Dendy were grouped as bell stand. Three employees, Barbara Dooley, Rita Taylor and Lillie Boone were grouped under the heading banquet. The engine room was represented by separate groupings: maintenance, naming Monte Cales; furniture, naming Wade Ashburry; carpenter, naming Leroy Doll. Other groupings contained striking employees who were among the 31 recalled immediately or the 10 recalled within several weeks. The striking employees who were denied immediate recall were, according to Respondent, either not needed to carry on its business at strikes end or had been replaced permanently by an employee hired during the strike with the following exceptions: Aretha Collins, maid, denied recall due to strike misconduct; Marie Halpain, a.m. waitress, denied recall due to outside employment; Frank Avant, garde-manger, denied recall due to abolishment of his position; and Freida Wallace, cashier, who could not be located by Respondent for recall. Excluding the two bellmen, Respondent recalled all other strikers eligible for recall before the case came on for trial.

The record evidence shows that housekeeping maids Omans, Richardson, Morgan, and Willis were recalled on May 7. Floor Supervisor, Pascoe was recalled on September 4. Waitress Lloyd was recalled on April 23 and waitresses Doll, Mauldin, and Brundage were recalled August 5. Room service waiter Alexander was recalled April 29. Of the cashiers; Welhelmi was recalled July 2, Portwood was recalled September 8, and Morse was recalled October 12. Banquet waitresses Taylor, Dooley, and Boone were reinstated to the banquet call list on July 3. Engine room strikers were recalled as follows: maintenance, Cales on August 20; furniture, Ashberry on September 8; and Carpenter, Leroy Doll on October 27.

General Counsel's Exhibit 4 is the compilation made by Respondent of striking employees and their respective groupings. Replacement employees hired during the strike are listed within their respective group to the right on the exhibit.

B. Ineligible for Recall

Aretha Collins was denied recall because Fischer identified her as making a threat to a nonstriking employee. Fischer testified that he had feedback on March 13 that an employee was somehow threatened. Fischer had the non-striking employee brought to his office. The employee, Angela Brown, was interviewed by Fischer and his attorney. Fischer stated that Brown related an incident in the hotel lobby where four or five maids, as they walked through the lobby, said to Brown, "We're going to beat the fat off you after work tonight." Brown identified Aretha Collins as the declarant and said that the statement was directed to her. Brown also named Lois Richardson and Mary Willis as among the group of maids. Fischer stated that Brown did not disclose any further substance of the conversation. Fischer said that Brown was distressed, crying, and upset and afraid to go home at night now. The hotel saw that she had a cab that evening to go home. Fischer and his attorney decided that Collins was to be denied recall as a result of the incident without any further investigation.

[4] Aretha Collins, Betty Omans, Joyce Richardson, Wanda Morgan, and Mary Willis.

[5] Waitresses—p.m., Helen Lloyd; a.m., Violet Doll, Debbie Mauldin, Marie Halpain, and Maggie Brundage.

Collins testified that she went through the picket line on Friday, March 13, to get her paycheck accompanied by four other employees, Johnnie Moore, Joyce and Lois Richardson, and Lula Mae Buckley. As they walked through the lobby they saw Angela Brown dusting. Collins said to Brown, "You're down here dusting, and they are down there picketing. You need a whipping girl." Brown smiled back at Collins but did not respond. Collins has known Brown for 3 or 4 years since Brown has worked at the hotel. Brown is the inspectress on the floor that Collins worked on as a maid. Collins returned to work on March 18 but was told by Fischer she had been replaced temporarily and would be recalled in a month or so by seniority. Fischer did not then, nor since, say anything to Collins about misconduct during the strike.

Angela Brown testified that she worked with Collins both as a maid and a supervisor for a couple of years. When the strike started she was working in the lobby. As she was heading for an elevator she heard someone say, "Girl when you get off work we're going to beat the fat off you." Brown turned around and saw Collins and several other maid-housekeepers. Brown reported the incident to her supervisor, who in turn informed Fischer. Brown stated that she was not upset nor crying over the incident when it happened or when she reported it to Fischer. Brown also stated that she and the other maids, including Collins, joke with one another while in the hotel.

Marie Halpain was denied recall because she obtained employment elsewhere during the strike. Halpain had worked at the hotel as a waitress in the Venetian dining room for 5 years, 10 months, and 12 days. She went on strike from March 13 to March 16. On March 17, she presented a copy of the union form letter to Fischer. Halpain testified that Fischer said, "As of now you have been replaced, but when your job becomes available, you will be called back." During the strike while the race season was in full swing, Halpain worked two nights at a neighborhood steak house replacing a girl who was off sick on the weekend. On July 22, after her unemployment ceased, Halpain began working casual at the Downtowner in Hot Springs. She had no other employment during the strike or since the strike ended. In October, Halpain contacted Fischer by phone inquiring why she had not been recalled and stating that she wanted to return to work. Fischer responded, "Marie, your name had been erased from the list." Halpain asked why, and Fischer mentioned something about a steak house. Halpain told Fischer she only filled in for another girl and Fischer said, "I'll talk to my attorney, and get back to you." Halpain has not, to date, received any response from Fischer.

Fischer acknowledged that Halpain returned for work at strikes end but was not recalled. Fischer learned from supervisors 2 to 3 weeks after the strike that Halpain was working in a steak house as a waitress, a job equal to her former position at the hotel. At this time Fischer in consultation with counsel eliminated Halpain for recall. Subsequent to the decision not to recall Halpain, Fischer was contacted by Halpain on two occasions. Once in the summer and second in late fall. On the first occasion Fischer confronted Halpain with the steak house employment and she stated to Fischer that it was temporary work during the race season only. Halpain told Fischer that the steak house was closed down and she was not presently working and wanted to return to the hotel. Fischer testified, "She said, 'Why did you not call me back,' and I said, 'You have another job.'" Fischer informed counsel of Halpain's circumstances but her removal from the recall list remained extant. During the second conversation Halpain told Fischer that she was desperate to go to work but she was not recalled. Other waitresses who participated in the strike were recalled and new employees were hired off the street throughout the summer and fall.

Frank Avant was refused recall because his former position was abolished prior to the end of the strike. The uncontroverted evidence in the record shows that Avant was employed in the mid-1950s. In 1977 he was classified as butcher at $3.40 an hour. In January 1978 he was put on a salary of $500 biweekly. A year later his salary was increased to $540 and he was reclassified as assistant chef. In February 1980 he received a $60 salary increase but the hotel records show no classification at that time.

Fischer testified that when he assumed the helm in the fall of 1979 he found kitchen conditions deplorable in that canned and frozen foods were used exclusively and he set out to change that. Fischer immediately hired an executive chef, Paul Healy, demoted the former chef, Parker, to sous chef, removed Avant from assistant chef to the pantry, and hired two new sous chefs. Fischer found that kitchen employees had certain titles but did not necessarily perform the duties of the title. Fischer was particularly concerned about establishing a basic kitchen first and then getting fancy. Fischer's policy is to use everyone in the kitchen to do any job especially during rush times. Fischer himself worked in the kitchen to get first-hand knowledge of how employees functioned. He was not impressed with Avant, particularly in the area of cooperating with other employees. In mid-1980 Fischer hired a food and beverage director, Heinz Graf Polke, to share the responsibilities with chef Healy. By the fall of 80 Fischer directed chef Healy and Polke to lower the cost of the kitchen and to improve the efficiency. Polke and chef Healy discussed the kitchen situation for several months and decided on March 16 to abolish the position of garde-manger. They jointly made the decision and Fischer approved the decision. When Avant offered to return after the strike Fischer told him his prestrike position of garde-manger had been abolished and he would not be recalled.

Chef Paul Healy testified that he was employed by Respondent on November 26, 1979. After the prior chef was demoted and Avant was moved to the pantry, Healy and Fischer decided that Avant's creative abilities would qualify him to be garde-manger. A garde-manger traditionally is in charge of cold production in the kitchen, including salads, hors d'oeuvres, cold hors d'oeuvres, canapes, and some cold meats such as corned beef and turkey, also makes decorative pieces for buffets, aspics, ice carvings, cheese mirrors, and cheese trays. Chef Healy considered Avant a good cook and qualified to perform as garde-manger albeit he had difficulty helping other employees and cooperating with supervision for extra duties., e.g., Avant did not like to do the ice carvings or work extended hours at the hot stone. Nonetheless, Avant performed the tasks of a garde-manger without incident until October 1980. At this time Avant was moved to the pantry and assumed additional duties of the a la carte variety. This move eliminated one pantry employee and was designed to make the kitchen preparations more cost effective. Avant functioned in this capacity up to the strike although chef Healy and Polke continued their review of kitchen procedures to further eliminate waste and inefficiency. Immediately after New Years' Day 1981 one of the three sous chefs quit. Thereafter, chef Healy discussed with Fischer the need for further reductions of personnel in the kitchen to lower cost. Avant was among the highest paid help in the kitchen and his productivity was weighed against cost to the hotel. Both Healy and Fischer felt a lot of payroll was tied up in a low production position. When Avant chose to join the strike chef Healy parceled his duties among the kitchen employees who were not as busy as they should have been and on March 15 or 16 made a joint decision with Polke to close the position of garde-manger for economic reasons. Chef Healy, however, had no intention of terminating Avant as an employee. With employees out on strike Healy fully realized that the garde-manger position was an unnecessary luxury. After the strike was over the four pantry employees that had participated were recalled to their former positions. In addition, after the strike ended chef Healy needed more help in the kitchen and during the months following the strike hired 6 pantry employees, 26 stewards, 9 dishwashers, and 6 cooks. Cooks were hired on March 25, April 27, July 2, August 5, September 11 and 28, and October 28, including a replacement for an interim cook who had quit. By August Polke and Healy needed an additional sous chef at a salary comparable to Avants' so Polke placed an advertisement in the local paper. The ad was seeking an experienced sous chef with garde-manger capabilities. Chef Healy did not consider Avant for any of the positions that were filled following the end of the strike nor did he consider Avant qualified as a sous chef. Chef Healy testified that Avant was capable of performing the tasks for which he had hired new employees but added, "Aren't we reaching the point of asking a brain surgeon to take out a splinter." Healy stated that Avant was overqualified even for the cook's positions.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

The General Counsel's complaint alleges that the striking employees on March 16 made an unconditional offer to return to their former or substantially equivalent positions of employment and that Respondent refused to reinstate or offer to reinstate the named employees to their former or substantially equivalent positions of employment because the employees engaged in strike activity.[6]

Respondent's answer denied that the employees offered to return to substantially equivalent positions and that the refusal to reinstate or offer to reinstate the employees was due to their strike activity.

The issues drawn at the trial of the case center on Respondent's designed recall procedure and the results of that procedure. The General Counsel contends that any striker who was denied an opportunity to return to work in a substantially equivalent position prior to recall to a prestrike position is a discriminatee. Respondent contends that the strikers sought only their prestrike positions expressing no interest in any other positions. With three exceptions, the opposing contentions cover all 25 striking employees named in the complaint. The circumstances surrounding the failure to recall Frank Avant, Marie Halpain, and Aretha Collins are separate and distinct.

At the outset it seems appropriate to note that this is not a case where the employer's productivity suffered as a result of the strike (not just because the strike was of short duration but additionally Respondent basically operated a service organization) nor was there any increase in business during the strike which necessitated an expansion of services. The Union called the strike at the height of Respondent's busiest season in an obvious attempt to strengthen its position as representative of the employees. Either through miscalculation or lack of support the strike lasted only 2 days. Admittedly, the timing of the strike was not lost on Respondent for Fischer opined that the Union attempted to shut him down at the height of his busiest season. Neither was the short duration of the strike any consolation to Respondent for Fischer viewed the nonstriking employees as loyal employees who deserved rewarding treatment from Respondent. Fischer took his hat off to the employees who worked during the strike. Respondent had a commitment for 99-percent occupancy during the race season and the record shows there was no decline. It was admittedly the busiest time of the year for the kitchen. Thus, Respondent's actions during recall of the strikers must be viewed as deliberate and in no way qualified by peaks and valleys of productivity as normally influenced by striker activity.[7] Further support for this view is found in Fischer's testimony detailing how the recall list was determined and the basis for that determination, i.e., each striker was listed by work function and thus confined to a specific grouping on the recall list. If several work functions were within the same department of the hotel they were nevertheless grouped separately.[8] Respondent further determined, in its own mind, that such grouping was the only proper basis for recall because the prestrike work function of each striker was equated with the "only" substantially equivalent employment. Moreover, Fischer, admittedly did not consider any striker's past employment experience in the hotel when faced with filling any poststrike vacancies, notwithstanding his avowed policy of cross-training and multiple capabilities for all hotel employees. In effect, Respondent disqualified all strikers for recall except to their specific prestrike positions arguing in brief that an employer has no obligation to recall a permanently replaced striker at strikes end. In my view, Respondent's recall list as designed precludes consideration of an offer to any striker of a position that is substantially equivalent to his or her prestrike position.

[6] The economic nature of the strike is not in dispute.

[7] The record discloses that during the period following the strike new employees were hired due to factors such as, increased business, expanded pantry work, heavy banquets, need for extra employees, workload, race traffic, and heavy business. Although five replacements for one striker were hired in the garage the lone striker was still recalled immediately.

[8] The strikers were listed in each group according to hotelwide seniority.

Respondent cites many cases quoting selective language of the Courts and the Board to support its failure to recall the named strikers. The General Counsel, in turn, cites several cases quoting language from the courts and the Board which is supportive of his complaint allegations. As is sometimes the case both parties can find solace in the reported cases but such ambivalence must be resolved. My reading of the cases leads me to conclude that Respondent was victimized by conceptualism and failure to distinguish factual support for the law of the case. Respondent's arguments, as general propositions, may be accurate when viewed in isolation but when viewed in conjunction with each case's factual circumstances become less efficacious. Respondent's main case support is Lincoln Hills Nursing Home, 257 NLRB 1145 (1981), cited for the proposition that Respondent has no obligation to recall a replaced striker to any other available position for which the striker may be qualified. Respondent further argues that its recall procedure is identical to that approved by the Board in Lincoln. Suffice it to say that the evidence in Lincoln showed that recalls were made by seniority as vacancies occurred in any available position. With regard to Respondent's specific argument that the respondent in Lincoln was not obligated to recall a physical therapist to a nurses aide position, the decision clearly shows that the record did not contain evidence that any prestrike position was available at strikes end, resulting in a failure of proof on the part of the General Counsel not an approval of Respondent's conduct. Likewise, Respondent's reliance on New Era Electric, 217 NLRB 477 (1975), is misplaced. In New Era the General Counsel argued that the respondent should have recalled a first-class lineman to a second-class lineman's position that was filled by a new hire. The administrative law judge found that the striker's status was in question in addition to finding that the General Counsel was in error in his argument that a prestrike position was available for the alleged discriminatee which the General Counsel argued placed an obligation on the respondent to offer the position to the questionable striker.

In addition to disagreeing with Respondent's argued case support, I reject the dual premise for structuring the recall list, i.e., Respondent's only obligation to a returning striker is reinstatement in to his prestrike position and, if the striker's prestrike position is filled with a permanent replacement hired during the strike, Respondent has no further recall obligations to the striker unless and until the permanent replacement leaves.[9] In my view, Respondent has confused its obligations to reinstate returning strikers with the rights of economic strikers who have unconditionally applied for reinstatement. If an economic striker fails to apply unconditionally for reinstatement the employer is free to continue hiring replacement employees; however, on a striker's unconditional application to return the employer has obligations of reinstatement as a matter of law. Such obligations are not qualified by the language of the unconditional offer. Respondent's erroneous view of its reinstatement obligations and the law in this regard is not a defense. Accordingly, I reject Respondent's argument that an economic striker is only entitled to full reinstatement to his prestrike job. Further, I reject Respondent's reliance on the failure of any striker to express an interest in a job other than his or her prestrike job. Respondent has the obligation to offer reinstatement to returning strikers and must do so without discrimination against the returning strikers. A lesser job with less pay and/or reduced benefits may not be as attractive but it is better than no job at all. The cases cited by Respondent make it abundantly clear that oftentimes replaced economic strikers are offered lesser jobs until their prestrike positions become vacant. No cited case stands for the proposition that an employer can refuse to offer other jobs to the economic strikers because they have been replaced.

The Board in Zapex Corp., 235 NLRB 1237 (1978), synthesized rights and duties attendant to reinstatement of strikers as follows (at 1238):

> Certain principles governing the reinstatement rights of economic strikers are by now well settled. In N.L.R.B. v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., Inc., 389 U.S. 375, 378 (1967), the Supreme Court held that if, after conclusion of a strike, the employer "refuses to reinstate striking employees, the effect is to discourage employees from exercising their rights to organize and to strike guaranteed by [Sections] 7 and 13 of the Act . . . . Accordingly, unless the employer who refuses to reinstate strikers can show that his action was due to 'legitimate and substantial business justifications,' he is guilty of an unfair labor practice. The burden of proving justification is on the employer." The Court in Fleetwood relied on its decision in N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 34 (1967), where it held that "once it has been proved that the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him." In reevaluating the rights of economic strikers in light of Fleetwood and Great Dane, the Board in The Laidlaw Corporation, 171 NLRB 1366, 1369 (1968), stated that:
> > The underlying principle in both Fleetwood and Great Dane, supra, is that certain employer conduct, standing alone, is so inherently destructive of employee rights that evidence of specific antiunion motivation is not needed.[14] Specifically in Fleetwood, the Court found that hiring new em-

[9] Except for specific instances raised in the record or alluded to in this decision it is undisputed that the replacement employees hired during the strike were permanent.

> ployees in the face of outstanding applications for reinstatement from striking employees is presumptively a violation of the Act, irrespective of intent unless the employer sustains his burden by showing legitimate and substantial reasons for his failure to hire the strikers.

[14] See also N.L.R.B. v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221 (1963). Even if a finding of antiunion motivation is necessary, the employer's preference for strangers over tested and competenent employees is sufficient basis for inferring such motive, and we, in agreement with the Trial Examiner, would do so if we considered motive material.

In addition the Supreme Court in Fleetwood stated: "If and when a job for which the striker is qualified becomes available, he is entitled to an offer of reinstatement." 389 U.S. at 381. The right can be defeated only if the employer can show "legitimate and substantial business justifications." Obviously, the Court is requiring an employer to be impartial in hiring for any and all vacancies, particularly when there are outstanding applications from replaced economic strikers. In the instant case, with the exception of three employees, the record evidence shows that Respondent made a judgment based on the strikers' written offer to return to work and supported by the meekest of testimony dealing with attitude of employees. There was no legitimate and substantial business justification for preferring newly hired employees over the returning strikers to fill necessary vacancies in the hotel. Respondent had in the past transferred a painter to dishwasher to houseman, a houseman to hotel trainee, a bar porter to furniture finisher, and a bartender to room service manager.

Rather than consider striking employees for reinstatement to vacancies occurring after a cessation of strike activities Respondent hired new employees. From March 20 through November 3 (the date Respondent recalled the last striker) Respondent hired as new employees 14 waitresses, 4 waiters, 44 maids, 2 inspectresses, 16 bar persons, 1 beverage person, 29 housemen, 2 newsstand employees, 1 garage employee, 5 repairmen, 1 watchman, 1 cashier, 9 restaurant hostesses, 6 pantry employees, 26 stewards, 9 dishwashers, and 6 cooks. During this entire employment period the strikers were recalled by seniority only as vacancies occurred in their prestrike positions.

It is clear that Repondent's expressed policy of recall resulted in the discriminatory conduct alleged by the General Counsel. Moreover, Respondent's implementation of the recall policy included delayed discrimination in that Respondent hired new employees rather than consider the outstanding applications of the strikers.

Respondent argues alternatively that the General Counsel has not proven a discriminatory motive for the recall policy and the resulting failure to reinstate striking employees. In my view the General Counsel has met his burden of proving discrimination whether he must prove motive or not and Respondent has not proffered legitimate and substantial business justifications for refusing to recall the strikers to various existing positions when the strike ended. Further, the parties stipulated that the named strikers were qualified for the very vacancies that existed at strikes end and those that occurred during the recall period. In addition, Respondent's records reflect the following: In housekeeping-maids-permanent, three prestrike positions, over and above those filled at strikes end, were vacant.[10] Therefore three additional striking maids should have been recalled immediately. Also, on April 23 Catherine Woodall was transferred out of housekeeping creating a vacancy for a maid which should have been offered to a striker. The dining room positions of waitress had eight strikers. Four replacements were hired before the strikers made application to return. Three strikers were recalled leaving one prestrike position open at strikes end. The most senior a.m. waitress should have been recalled to that vacancy. Further, a newly hired waitress was employed on March 20 for the tackroom but such vacancy should have been offered to the most senior waitress with an outstanding application. Three more newly hired employees reported as waitresses in May and these vacancies should have been offered to the remaining strikers who had applied for reinstatement. Respondent's argument a.m. waitress positions are not comparable to p.m. waitress positions is rejected in that Respondent does not classify waitresses when hired as a.m. or p.m. In fact, the record shows that waitresses transfer from one dining room to another. Four cashiers went on strike and were premanently replaced. As cashier vacancies occurred the strikers were recalled by seniority. However one newly hired employee transferred to food and beverage cashier prior to the last striker's recall and that vacancy should have been filled by the remaining striker. Three banquet waitresses whose names were on the call list participated in the strike. Respondent immediately removed their names from the call list ostensibly to replace them permanently. The record shows that one such replacement, Horne, was transferred from part-time to regular part-time banquet waiter from the nonemployee group on the call list. Since Horne was previously on the call list he could not operate as a replacement employee. Sonnier was a hotel employee and not on the nonemployee call list but rather the hotel employee call list as extra help if the nonemployee call list was exhausted, and, therefore she could not be a replacement employee for the nonemployee call list. Larry Guinn, a newly hired employee for the nonemployee call list, was indeed a replacement employee. Thus, at strikes end two prestrike positions on the nonemployee banquet call list were open and two strikers should have been immediately recalled. The first banquet work after the strike was March 18, 19, 20, and 22, which was worked only by nonemployees on call, Horne, Guinn, and Berthia. Berthia was newly hired but did not appear on Respondent's list as a replacement employee, therefore, banquet work was available for all three striking employees immediately after the strike and they should have been recalled. Respondent argues that Banquet Supervisor Hoffman did not follow Fischer's instructions to recall the strikers before hiring any outside employees and, therefore, Hoffman's dereliction of duty cannot be discrimination by Respondent. Such an argument places the onus on the returning striker which I am not inclined to do. Hoffman is Respondent's supervisor and Respondent is responsible for his actions. Moreover, Fischer's instructions to Hoffman do not recognize the accepted practice prior to the strike, i.e., that hotel employees as alternates were only used for banquets after the nonemployee call list was exhausted. Also, the record shows that a striker replacement in the employee cafeteria, Ashley Norling, who was not on the banquet call list, worked banquets before striking employees were recalled. In fact, the three strikers' names should not have been removed from the list but should have simply been passed over for banquet work. I perceive the nonemployee banquet call list as analogous to the hotel's payroll from which striking employees are not removed when engaging in a strike.[11] With regard to maintenance man Monte Cales he was one of three that engaged in strike activities. Respondent hired two replacement employees but the record is unclear whether one or both of the other striking maintenance men were recalled at strikes end. If they were not recalled a prestrike position was open and should have been offered to Cales on March 17 predating his actual recall of August 20 by several months. If the other strikers were recalled to maintenance positions then Cales should have been considered for other vacancies which occurred before his recall to his prestrike position. Based on the above I conclude and find that several striking employees (enumerated above) should have been recalled immediately to their prestrike positions and that those strikers whose positions were filled by permanent replacements should have been offered the vacancies present in other positions in the hotel which Respondent filled with newly hired employees. It is Respondent's obligation, by Law, to treat returning strikers impartially and I specifically find that Respondent's refusal to consider striking employees, who had made application to return, for positions other than their prestrike positions discriminated against the strikers by such refusal and by showing partiality for newly hired employees. Respondent's obligation is to offer vacancies to returning strikers. The returning striker has the right as an employee to refuse the offer and elect to await a vacancy in his prestrike position.

Aretha Collins: Respondent contends that Collins engaged in conduct sufficient to deny her reinstatement rights. The alleged conduct did not take place on the picket line nor was there evidence of any picket line misconduct. The alleged conduct of Collins was the single isolated incident subject to scrutiny. While no misconduct by strikers is to be condoned it is manifest that the alleged conduct be fully considered before imposition of discipline on strikers. To hold individual striking employees subject to discipline, including the loss of reinstatement rights the proof must be substantial for the effect is to render the right to strike nugatory.

It is fully recognized that an employer has the burden of proving that strikers engaged in conduct barring their return to employment. An employer's honest belief that strikers engaged in misconduct of a nature serious enough to require discipline therefor is not a defense if it affirmatively appears that such misconduct did not, in fact, occur as alleged or was less serious in nature. The question in the instant case becomes: Was the alleged misconduct of the striker of a nature requiring disqualification for reemployment? I conclude and find that the alleged statement of Collins was not of such a serious nature as to deny her reinstatement rights. My conclusion is based on the lack of evidence from Respondent. The evidence presented only evinces a terse conversation between a striker and nonstriker which occurred off the picket line on the Employer's premises. The apparent basis for Respondent's decision to deny reinstatement was subjective and not supported by the testimony of its main witness. Thus, Brown's testimony did not disclose fear of reprisal or apprehension to continue working during the strike. Rather, Brown displayed lack of concern for the statement and affirmatively passed the statement off as the usual talk among maids who are and have been coworkers. Further, Respondent did not fully investigate the incident which to me evinces an attempt to seek reasons, however slight, not to reinstate certain strikers to retaliate for striking. I also note that of the group Collins was singled out by Respondent on the slimmest of identity facts. Accordingly, I find that Collins was denied reinstatement as a returning striker unlawfully and shall order her full reinstatement.

Marie Halpain: Respondent removed Halpain's name from its recall list 2 to 3 weeks after the strike ended as a result of information that Halpain was employed at a local steak house. Subsequent to Halpain's removal several waitresses were hired by Respondent in March, May, June, and July contrary to Respondent's argument that the first available position for Halpain existed on August 17.[12] Respondent further argued that if Halpain did not lose her employee status in April she did so in July when she secured her second employment as a waitress which eliminated any recall rights prior to the first available vacancy. I reject Respondent's arguments as unsupported by record evidence. Respondent's claims are based on strikers securing regular and substantially equivalent employment elsewhere which by statute causes the striker to lose employee status and therefore any reinstatement rights to which they may otherwise be entitled. Respondent has the burden to establish that the striker has lost employee status and that burden must be met with objective evidence. The employer's belief, however honest or reasonable, is not sufficient. The Board has stated, "The question of what constitutes 'regular and substantially equivalent employment' cannot be determined by a mechanistic application of the literal language of the statute but must be determined on an ad hoc basis by an objective appraisal of a number of factors, both tangible and intangible, and includes the desire and intent of the employee concerned.[13]

[11] Had the General Counsel alleged that Dooley, Taylor, and Boone were discriminatorily removed from the list when they went on strike I would have so found.

[12] I previously found that Respondent makes little or no distinction between dining rooms when hiring waitresses, making Respondent's argument that no vacancies occurred in the Venetian dining room (Halpain's former work station) unavailing.

[13] Little Rock Airmotive, Inc., 182 NLRB 666 (1970).

It appears from the testimony of Fischer and Halpain that the compensation and benefits received by Halpain from the subject employment was not equivalent nor was Halpain satisfied with the interim employment. Fischer knew, or should have known, that Halpain's outside employment was temporary while awaiting recall. Halpain testified such was the case and Fischer reluctantly acknowledged he could not recall the entire conversation. Fischer did admit he knew at the time he was considering Halpain's continued status as an employee of Respondent that the steak house was not a full-time business and in fact was closing. In addition, Fischer made no conscious effort to determine what employment Halpain had secured on either occasion. He was satisfied that someone saw her working. That is not enough. The statute requires more before a striker will be relieved of employee status and the attendant rights. In my view, Respondent has again seized upon a meager circumstance in an attempt to punish an employee for engaging in a strike. Accordingly, I conclude and find that Respondent has unlawfully withheld recall from Halpain in violation of the Act and shall order her full reinstatement.

Frank Avant: Avant, on applying for reinstatement at the strike's end, was told by Fischer that his job of garde-manger had been abolished and therefore he would not be reemployed by the hotel. Respondent specifically contends that there are no substantially equivalent positions for which Avant is qualified. Apparently, Respondent refers to the sous chef position since the testimony of both chef Healy and Avant leads me to conclude that Avant is not a sous chef. The record shows that Avant performed numerous kitchen tasks in his tenure with Respondent but sous chef was not among them. Albeit Avant was performing some tasks of a garde-manger before the strike, it appears that Fischer's bestowment of the title was benevolent in nature rather than a promotion. The employment records show no reclassification of Avant to garde-manger nor did Avant train or supervise any employees in the garde-manger tasks. As I perceive the evidence, Fischer was simply trying to add class to the kitchen operation and was recognizing an existing highly paid kitchen employee who had recently been demoted. However, whether or not Avant was in fact garde-manger, Respondent has the right to reduce kitchen cost and, if a strike presents the first opportunity, there is no vice in making adjustments at that time. The evidence does show that Avant's salary and performance were discussed prior to the strike and several adjustments had already been made by the time the strike started. There are certain risks attached to employees electing to engage in strike activity and one of those is that the employer may be forced into belt tightening circumstances which subsequently eliminate the need for employees or their functions. That, I feel, is the case here. The record is clear that Fischer was in the midst of a renovation of the hotel's services, particularly the kitchen. Such reworks do not happen overnight nor are they accomplished by a single stroke of the brush. Observation and opportunity can be time consuming as it was here. The need for changes in the kitchen is well substantiated in the record; however, the effect on Avant does not end there. As I view the circumstances and the law Respondent may very well abolish a striker's job or downgrade the functions for legitimate business reasons but that does not mean that the striker must be denied reemployment. Only in the case where no other vacancies exist can the striker be denied his reinstatement rights. That is not the case here. From March 21 through October 28, 47 positions in the kitchen were filled with newly hired employees. Of those 47 positions 12 were functions that Avant had specifically performed for Respondent. Whereas Avant's abilities to perform as sous chef can be questioned, his capabilities in the pantry or as a cook cannot. Notwithstanding Avant's qualifications (past work history) Respondent refused to consider Avant for any vacancy. Therein lies the violation as I see it. Respondent has the obligation to treat returning strikers impartially, which includes preferential treatment for the returning strikers in filling vacancies as they occur. Respondent cannot be heard to say that seeking out strikers to fill usual vacancies is burdensome or unduly restrictive. I see no other way that an employer's obligations to strikers can be fulfilled if impartial treatment is the rule. In the last analysis, the Respondent only has to offer a lesser position that is open. It is up to the striker whether he is actually reemployed or not. To refuse to give a returning striker the opportunity to resume his employment for less compensation or benefits, by preferring newly hired unknown employees, is prima facie partiality which I conclude and find is violative of the Act. Accordingly, I shall order Respondent to offer reinstatement to Avant to a kitchen position for which he is qualified. This includes the discharge of an incumbent if necessary.

While the testimony of Freida Wallace, cashier, is partially corroborated by objective evidence, I cannot fully credit her statements. Her recall of events and their chronology was not specific enough to be helpful, except for the ultimate fact, which I feel was more imaginative than real. Respondent had what appeared to be a current address in its files (which was occasioned by Wallace's giving such notice to her employer) and used it to recall Wallace. There was no forwarding by the Postal Service, which indicates a failure by Wallace to be concerned. There is no credible evidence in the record to suggest any wrongdoing on Respondent's part toward Wallace. Respondent having discharged its obligation to Wallace, as shown by the objective evidence, I conclude and find that Respondent has not violated the Act in regards to Freida Wallace. Accordingly, I shall dismiss the allegation as it pertains to Wallace.

In summary and pursuant to my findings above the following strikers should have been reinstated to their prestrike positions on the dates indicated:

Aretha Collins	March 17
Betty Omans	March 17
Joyce Richardson	March 17
Wanda Morgan	April 23
Mary Willis	May 7
Helen Lloyd	March 20
Violet Doll	March 17
Debbie Mauldin	May 6
Maggie Brundag	May 15

Marie Halpain	May 20
Rita Taylor	March 18
Barbara Dooley	March 18
Lillie Boone	March 18
Gloria Morse	October 6

The following strikers should have been offered vacancies for which they qualify pursuant to the stipulation of the parties on the date and position indicated:

Ann Pascoe—May 10—maid
Richard Alexander—March 19—houseman
Frank Jones—March 26—houseman
Nathan Dendy—March 28—houseman
Monte Cales—April 10—houseman
Wade Asbury—April 10—houseman
Leroy Doll—April 14—houseman
Frank Avant—March 26—cook

I acknowledge the difficulty attached to determining whether any replaced striker would have accepted the alternative job offer or not; however, this circumstance is caused by Respondent's discriminatory conduct and therefore the returning strikers should not be held to suffer for conduct not their own.

Additional Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent discriminated against economic strikers who had applied unconditionally to return to work in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by refusing to recall them to their vacant prestrike positions.

2. Respondent discriminated against replaced economic strikers who had unconditionally applied to return to work in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by hiring new employees to fill vacancies for which the replaced strikers were qualified.

3. Respondent discriminated against economic strikers Aretha Collins, Marie Halpain, and Frank Avant, each of whom applied for reinstatement, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by denying them reinstatement rights to employment.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent having discriminated against its striking employees, I find it necessary to order it to offer them full reinstatement to their former positions or, if these positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, with backpay computed on a quarterly basis and interest therein to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977),[14] from the date that each should have been offered reinstatement to the date that each returning striker was actually reinstated or is actually reinstated.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[15]

ORDER

The Respondent, Arlington Hotel Company, Inc., Hot Springs, Arkansas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discriminating against employees by failing to accord them their reinstatement rights as economic strikers and without regard to whether each individual striker had been permanently replaced or not.

(b) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, coercing, or discriminating against its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer each striker, against whom the Respondent has been found to have discriminated by refusing reinstatement, full and immediate reinstatement to his or her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position of employment, without prejudice to his or her seniority or other rights and privileges, or to a position for which the striker is qualified; and make each such striker whole for any loss of pay suffered as a result of the discrimination against him or her in the manner set forth hereinabove in the section entitled "Remedy."

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary or useful to a determination of each striker's seniority and the position Respondent is required to offer each striker and the amount of backpay due each discriminatee.

(c) Post at its Hotel in Hot Springs, Arkansas, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[16] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 26, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[14] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[15] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[16] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS ALSO ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

Taracorp Industries, a Division of Taracorp Inc. and Fred Elmore. Case 14–CA–13551

12 December 1984

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 31 July 1981 the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order[1] in this proceeding, adopting, with minor modifications, an administrative law judge's findings that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by conducting an investigatory interview of employee Fred Elmore after having denied Elmore's request for union representation at the interview. NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975). The Respondent was ordered to cease and desist from its unlawful activity and to take certain affirmative actions, including offering Elmore reinstatement and making him whole for any loss of earnings or benefits resulting from the unlawful interview.

Thereafter, the Respondent filed a petition for review of the Board's Order with the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit. Subsequently, the Board moved the court for withdrawal of the record so that the Board could reconsider its Decision and Order. The court granted the Board's motion.

On 14 December 1981 the Board informed the parties that it had decided to reconsider sua sponte its decision and that they were entitled to file statements of position. The General Counsel and the Respondent filed statements of position.

After reconsideration, we have decided to reaffirm the Board's finding that the Respondent's interview of Elmore violated Section 8(a)(1).[2] We have further decided, however, that a make-whole remedy is inappropriate for this or any similar Weingarten violation. Accordingly, we shall vacate the Board's original order in this proceeding and issue a new order setting forth the appropriate remedy for violations of this type.

The pertinent facts are as a follows: Employee Fred Elmore worked as one of several "feeders" of used storage batteries to a moving belt. The belt was subject to frequent jamming; freeing it required the feeders to pull the belt. On the day at issue here, the belt jammed and Foreman Greg Vaughn twice told Elmore to help pull the belt. Each time Elmore replied, "It's not my job." Vaughn then told Elmore he was suspended and should report to Plant Manager Charles Harper's office.

While Elmore was enroute to Harper's office, Vaughn telephoned Harper and described the incident. Harper replied, "[I]f Fred Elmore refuses to do the job, that's termination." Once in Harper's office, Elmore asked for a union representative. Harper refused. Elmore then told Harper his version of the incident, admitting that he had not obeyed Vaughn, but claiming that he had explained to Vaughn that he "couldn't pull on the belt . . . it was unsafe" and that it was not his job. At that point Vaughn was invited to join the interview. He recounted the incident as it is described in the previous paragraph.[3] Harper then terminated Elmore.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by conducting an investigatory interview[4] of Elmore after denying his request for union representation at the interview. The judge rejected, however, the complaint allegations that Elmore was discharged for requesting a representative, for raising a safety complaint, or for engaging in any other union and/or protected concerted activity. The judge found that the Respondent discharged Elmore solely because of his conduct in the belt-pulling incident. As a remedy, the judge ordered Elmore's reinstatement and backpay. As noted above, the Board adopted the judge's decision and recommended Order with minor modifications.

In its statement of position, the Respondent again argues that the remedy of reinstatement and backpay is inappropriate because Elmore was discharged for just cause, i.e., insubordination. For the reasons set forth below, we agree with the Respondent. We find that this make-whole relief in the context of a Weingarten violation is contrary to the specific remedial restriction contained in Section 10(c), the general remedial framework of the Act, and, independent of those restrictions, consti-

[1] 257 NLRB 463.

[2] In its statement of position, the Respondent again seeks reversal of some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

As in our original decision, we do not rely on the judge's finding that the Respondent developed a "new" theory at the hearing to explain its actions; nor do we draw any adverse inference from the Respondent's failure to call Manager Harper as a witness at the hearing; and we do not adopt the judge's reference to possible "bargaining" during the interview, since no such issue was presented here.

[3] The judge credited Vaughn's version of the incident.

[4] As noted in our original decision, the judge found that the Respondent, prior to discharging employee Elmore, conducted an unlawful investigatory interview. Thereafter, he consistently denominated the interview as "investigatory" except in one part of the decision. In the first Conclusion of Law the judge inadvertently refers to a "disciplinary" interview. As before, we hereby correct this inadvertent error and insert "investigatory" in place of "disciplinary."

tutes bad policy. Accordingly, we hereby overrule Kraft Foods, 251 NLRB 598 (1980),[5] and its progeny[6] to the extent inconsistent with this decision, and henceforth, we will not impose make-whole remedies for Weingarten violations.

The Board possesses a certain latitude in fashioning remedies for unfair labor practices. Our discretion, however, is not absolute. Thus, we are bound by certain specific and general restrictions that limit our remedial authority. This is particularly true regarding our authority to impose a remedy of reinstatement and backpay.

The clearest example of when a make-whole remedy of reinstatement and backpay is appropriate is where an employee is discharged or disciplined for engaging in union or other protected concerted activities. Such a remedy was imposed in the Board's first published decision[7] and, since that time, has become the traditional means by which the Board seeks to neutralize employer discrimination. Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177 (1941). This is achieved by restoring the status quo ante, thereby placing the employee in the position enjoyed prior to the discriminatory conduct.

Conversely, an employee discharged or disciplined for misconduct or any other nondiscriminatory reason is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay even though the employee's Section 7 rights may have been violated by the employer in a context unrelated to the discharge or discipline. This principle is embodied in the remedial restriction in Section 10(c) of the Act, which provides:

> No order of the Board shall require the reinstatement of any individual as an employee who has been suspended or discharged, or the payment to him of any backpay, if such individual was suspended or discharged for cause.

Thus, when an employee is discharged for "cause"[8] the Board, normally, is precluded from imposing a make-whole remedy. Fibreboard Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 (1964).[9]

A third category of cases involving the issue of whether a make-whole remedy is appropriate arises where an employee is discharged or disciplined for what appears to be a legitimate reason, but further examination reveals that the discharge or discipline was the result of an act that was, itself, an unfair labor practice. That was the situation in Fibreboard, supra. There the employer discharged a group of employees pursuant to its decision to subcontract the employees' work, a seemingly legitimate basis for the discharges. Because, however, the employer failed and refused to bargain with the union over its decision to subcontract, the subcontracting violated Section 8(a)(5). The Supreme Court ruled that in such circumstances an order reinstating the discharged employees with backpay was appropriate because the discharges stemmed directly from the unfair labor practice. 379 U.S. at 217. In other words, when the reason for the discharge is an unfair labor practice, a make-whole remedy is appropriate since the "loss of employment stems directly from an unfair labor practice." Id.[10]

Applying these and related principles in the context of Weingarten violations, we are unable to justify the imposition of a make-whole remedy where an employer's only violation is the denial of an employee's request for representation at an investigatory interview. In this regard, we note that the courts of appeals have repeatedly refused to endorse the Board's previous efforts to impose a make-whole remedy for a Weingarten violation.[11] In our view, these courts are correct.

[5] Under the Kraft Foods test the General Counsel could make a prima facie showing that a make-whole remedy was appropriate by demonstrating that a Weingarten violation was committed and that the employee subjected to the unlawful interview was disciplined for conduct that was the subject of the interview. The burden then shifted to the Respondent, who could avoid a make-whole remedy by demonstrating that the decision to discipline the employee was not based on information obtained at the interview.

[6] See, e.g., Illinois Bell Telephone Co., 251 NLRB 932 (1980); Ohio Masonic Home, 251 NLRB 606 (1980).

Member Hunter notes that he agreed with the application of a Kraft Foods analysis in Chromalloy American Corp., 263 NLRB 244 (1982). Upon further consideration, however, and for the reasons set forth in today's decision, he believes that the remedy ordered in Chromalloy American Corp. was erroneous.

[8] It is important to distinguish between the term "cause" as it appears in Sec. 10(c) and the term "just cause," which is a term of art traditionally applied by arbitrators in interpreting collective-bargaining agreements. Just cause encompasses principles such as the law of the shop, fundamental fairness, and related arbitral doctrines. Cause, in the context of Sec. 10(c), effectively means the absence of a prohibited reason. For under our Act:

> Management can discharge for good cause, or bad cause, or no cause at all. It has, as the master of its own business affairs, complete freedom with but one specific, definite qualification: it may not discharge when the real motivating purpose is to do that which [the Act] forbids. [NLRB v. Columbus Marble Works, 233 F.2d 406, 413 (5th Cir. 1956).]

[9] As the Court stated in Fibreboard: "The legislative history of [Sec. 10(c)] indicates that it was designed to preclude the Board from reinstating an individual who had been discharged because of misconduct." 379 U.S. at 217.

[10] The Board consistently applies make-whole remedies in similar situations. See, e.g., Boland Marine Mfg. Co., 225 NLRB 824 (1976) (employees made whole where suspensions and discharges resulted from work rules imposed in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3)). Even in those cases, however, a make-whole remedy is appropriate only for employees whose discipline resulted "solely" from the unlawfully promulgated work rules. See also Alfred M. Lewis, Inc., 229 NLRB 757, 759 (1977).

[11] NLRB v. Potter Electrical Signal Co., 600 F.2d 120 (8th Cir. 1979); Montgomery Ward & Co. v. NLRB, 664 F.2d 1095 (8th Cir. 1981); General Motors Corp. v. NLRB, 674 F.2d 576 (6th Cir. 1982). See also NLRB v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co., 674 F.2d 618 (7th Cir. 1982) (remanding to the Board for determination of whether discharge was solely dependent upon evidence obtained at the unlawful interview), and NLRB v. Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph, 676 F.2d 499 (11th Cir. 1982) (refusing to enforce a make-whole remedy on the facts while preserving the legal issue).

Initially, it is plain that typical Weingarten cases do not present a situation where an employee is discharged for engaging in union or other protected concerted activities. Rather, the employee is discharged for what the employer considers misconduct. Indeed, this fact is recognized implicitly in the first step of the Kraft Foods test (see fn. 5 above) whereby the General Counsel must demonstrate that the employee was denied his or her Weingarten rights and was disciplined subsequently "for the conduct which was the subject of the unlawful interview." Kraft, 251 NLRB at 598 (emphasis added). Accordingly, Weingarten violations do not fit into the category of cases where a make-whole remedy traditionally is necessary and appropriate.[12]

Similarly, any attempt to fit Weingarten violations into the Fibreboard line of cases that permit a make-whole remedy when the loss of employment stems directly from an unfair labor practice is unavailing. In Fibreboard and cases that properly apply its doctrine (see fn. 10, supra), the reason for the discharge is itself an unfair labor practice. By contrast, in Weingarten cases, the reason for the discharge is not an unfair labor practice, but some type of employee misconduct. In short, there simply is not a sufficient nexus between the unfair labor practice committed (denial of representation at an investigatory interview) and the reason for the discharge (perceived misconduct) to justify a make-whole remedy.[13]

Accordingly, we are compelled to conclude that Weingarten cases fall into the category of cases where a make-whole remedy is precluded by operation of Section 10(c). Thus, when an employee is discharged or disciplined for cause,[14] that employee will not be entitled to reinstatement and backpay simply because his or her Weingarten rights were violated.

In addition to the remedial restrictions imposed by Section 10(c), we must recognize other limitations placed on our authority by the Act. Thus, the Board may not order punitive remedies. Carpenters Local 60 (Mechanical Handling) v. NLRB, 365 U.S. 651, 655 (1961). Nor should our remedies serve as a windfall to employees or employers. Service Roofing Co., 200 NLRB 1015, 1017 (1972). Yet these are precisely the results of this Board's previous impositions of make-whole remedies for Weingarten violations. In those cases, employers had discharged employees for reasons wholly independent of any unfair labor practice, yet were required to reinstate them with full backpay.

Even if this Board were not bound by the various remedial limitations discussed above, we would find a make-whole remedy in Weingarten cases inappropriate because we believe that past Board decisions have exceeded the intended scope and limitations found in the Supreme Court's Weingarten decision. What began as a limited protection of employees and a potential guide to management in conducting fair and expeditious investigations of employee misconduct has become a labyrinth of rules and procedures analogous to the law of criminal procedure. As Member Hunter stated in a related context, the Board's expansionist policies in the Weingarten field have served "to encourage the transformation of investigatory interviews into formalized adversary proceedings, a result the Supreme Court clearly wished to avoid."[15]

We believe that the expansionist approach to Weingarten, including make-whole remedies, has served to assure that the adversarial nature and complexity of the investigatory process would increase until employers are tempted to forgo interviews altogether. We believe that, in the long run, our refusal to grant make-whole remedies for Weingarten violations will serve the interests of the entire labor-management community.

In summary, we hold that we are without authority to order reinstatement and backpay as a remedy for a Weingarten violation. Accordingly, Kraft Foods, supra, and its progeny are hereby overruled to the extent inconsistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

Finally, applying these principles to the instant case, we find that a make-whole remedy for Elmore is inappropriate. As indicated above, the only violation committed by the Respondent was a Weingarten violation. The record does not establish that Elmore was discharged for asserting his Weingarten rights at the interview. On the contrary, it is undisputed that Elmore was discharged for what the Respondent determined to be a "refusal to per-

[12] A make-whole remedy can be appropriate in a Weingarten setting if, but only if, an employee is discharged or disciplined for asserting the right to representation. See, e.g., Garment Workers ILGWU v. Quality Mfg. Co., 420 U.S. 276 (1975). In such circumstances, the employee's employment status is adversely affected because the employee engaged in protected concerted activity. We will continue to apply our traditional make-whole remedy in such cases.

[13] As the court stated in Montgomery Ward & Co. v. NLRB, 664 F.2d 1095, 1097 (8th Cir. 1981), when confronted with the claim that the discharge of employees for theft stemmed from the employer's denial of their Weingarten rights: "[T]he employees effected their own discharge for stealing and the [Weingarten] violation was simply incidental to the investigation which preceded the firing."

[14] We emphasize again that the Board will not seek to determine whether the asserted "cause" for the discharge was good cause or just cause. The extent of our authorized inquiry is whether or not the employee was discharged for union or other protected concerted activity or whether the reason for the discharge was, itself, an unfair labor practice. See fn. 8, supra.

[15] Materials Research Corp., 262 NLRB 1010, 1021 (1982) (Member Hunter concurring and dissenting).

form assigned work." It is also clear that the reason for his discharge was not, itself, an unfair labor practice. Thus, since Elmore was discharged "for cause" within the meaning of Section 10(c), the Board is without authority to require his reinstatement or the payment to him of any backpay. Accordingly, we shall vacate the Board's original Order and direct the Respondent to cease and desist from its unlawful activity and take other appropriate remedial action.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Taracorp Industries, a Division of Taracorp, Inc., Granite City, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Depriving any employee of his right to union representation at an investigatory interview which the employee reasonably believes might result in disciplinary action.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its Granite City, Illinois plant, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[16] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Board's Order reported at 257 NLRB 463 is vacated.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that in all other respects the complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, concurring.

I join my colleagues in overruling Kraft Foods, despite my earlier approval of the remedy prescribed in that case for violations of the Weingarten rule.[1] As my colleagues point out, the courts of appeals have consistently refused enforcement of Board decisions imposing a make-whole remedy for a Weingarten violation where employees were clearly discharged for cause and not for attempting to assert their Weingarten rights.

The Eighth Circuit in a decision rendered prior to Kraft Foods, refused to enforce the Board's order requiring a make-whole remedy in a case where employees, whose Weingarten rights had been violated, were discharged for participation in a fight which stopped the production line. NLRB v. Potter Electrical Signal Co., 600 F.2d 120 (8th Cir. 1979). There, the court acknowledged the Board's broad authority to restore the status quo to remedy violations effectively, but held that where the discharges were the result of employees' misconduct Section 10(c) barred the Board from imposing a make-whole remedy. Despite the subsequent issuance of Kraft Foods, where the Board set forth a new standard for determining the propriety of a make-whole remedy in the Weingarten context, the courts of appeals continued to reject the Board's analysis and relied instead on the 10(c) argument espoused by the Eighth Circuit in the Potter Electrical decision.[2] Upon reviewing these decisions, I am persuaded that the initial approach of the Eighth Circuit in Potter Electrical is correct. I therefore join my colleagues in concluding that make-whole relief in the context of a Weingarten violation is contrary to the specific remedial restriction contained in Section 10(c) of the Act.[3] Accordingly, I concur in overruling Kraft Foods and its progeny.

[16] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[1] See, e.g., Chromalloy American Corp., 263 NLRB 244 (1982).

[2] See, e.g., Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. NLRB, 711 F.2d 134 (9th Cir. 1983); Montgomery Ward & Co. v. NLRB, 664 F.2d 1095 (8th Cir. 1981); General Motors Corp. v. NLRB, 674 F.2d 576 (6th Cir. 1982).

[3] Unlike my colleagues, I do not find that past Board decisions such as Materials Research Corp., 262 NLRB 1010 (1982), have exceeded the intended scope and limitations of the Supreme Court's Weingarten decisions. Accordingly, I do not join in that aspect of their opinion which holds that make-whole relief for Weingarten violations, independent of the restrictions of Sec. 10(c), "constitutes bad policy."

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT deprive any employee of his or her right to union representation at an investigatory interview which the employee reasonably believes may result in disciplinary action.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 6 March 1984 Administrative Law Judge Clifford H. Anderson issued the attached supplemental decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 400, Helena, Montana, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Substitute the following for the line containing the discriminatee's name and backpay principal.

"Mary Christian	$2,075.00"

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would not extend the Respondent's financial liability to Mary L. Christian beyond 1 April 1982. In my view, the Respondent's contract with Christian expired on that date and the Respondent was not thereafter liable for further payments to Christian.

As more fully set forth in the judge's decision, on 1 April 1981 the Respondent entered into a contract with Mary L. Christian under which she was to provide cleaning services to the Respondent for a monthly fee of $650. In relevant part, the contract provided for a duration of "one year from 1 April 1981 until 1 April 1982 at which time this contract may be renewed for one year by mutual consent of the parties." It further provided that "either party may cancel this contract on thirty (30) days written notice. . . ."

In late July or early August 1981 the Respondent notified Christian that it was canceling the cleaning services contract effective 3 September 1981. About the same time, the Respondent discharged Richard Christian, Mary L. Christian's husband, from his position as a dispatcher. In the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding, the Board adopted the judge's conclusions, in the absence of exceptions, that the Respondent took these actions in retaliation for Richard Christian's protected concerted activities and thereby violated the Act. Accordingly, the Board ordered reinstatement of Mary Christian's contract and payment of lost revenues caused by the Respondent's unlawful cancellation of her contract.[1]

The judge concluded that the Respondent's backpay liability to Mary Christian continued at all times after cancellation of her contract. In so doing, he found that the 30-day cancellation provision in the Respondent's contract with Christian rendered it one for an unlimited term and that the Respondent had not met its burden of demonstrating that its contractual relationship with Christian would have terminated at any time.

I do not agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent's contract with Mary Christian was of unlimited duration. The plain language of the contract established that it terminated on 1 April 1982, absent earlier cancellation on 30 days' written notice. Under the circumstances, the Respondent's liability to Christian should not extend beyond 1 April 1982, the date upon which its contractual obligations to Christian ceased. Christian was an independent contractor and the loss suffered from the Respondent's conduct was the contract rights she possessed at the time, i.e., a contract expiring 1 April 1982. Under the circumstances, the coercive effects of the Respondent's conduct will be fully remedied by requiring that the Respondent make [1] Contrary to our dissenting colleague's view, continuing the make-whole remedy effectuates the purposes of the Act because Mary Christian's contract was terminated in retaliation for her employee husband's protected activity. The 30-day cancellation provision and the renewal clause rendered the contract equivalent to a contract for an unlimited duration. Therefore, the judge correctly found that, because the contract would not automatically have terminated on the contract's anniversary, the proper consideration for the make-whole remedy was what actions the Respondent and Christian would have taken at relevant times. In these circumstances, the Respondent's burden, which it failed to satisfy, was to show that it would have ended the contract.

[2] In calculating Mary Christian's gross earnings for quarter IV of 1981 in fn. 7, the judge incorrectly computed the amount to be $475. The correct figure is $1425 making the total backpay principal $2075.

[1] It is clear from a review of the Board's original Decision and Order, reported at 265 NLRB 1316 (1982), that the specific terms of the Respondent's contract with Mary Christian were not in issue.

Christian whole for these lost contract rights. As Christian is not an employee entitled to the protection of the Act, I do not find that it is necessary to effectuation of the Act's purposes to assume that Christian and the Respondent would have mutually agreed to renew their contractual relationship after 1 April 1982. Accordingly, I would find the Respondent's gross backpay liability equivalent to the contractual revenues payable to Mary Christian during the balance of the contract period ending 1 April 1982.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

CLIFFORD H. ANDERSON, Administrative Law Judge. On December 16, 1982, the Board issued a Decision and Order in the above-captioned case adopting with modification the May 21, 1982 decision of Administrative Law Judge David G. Heilbrun. The Order as adopted by the Board, inter alia, ordered Respondent:

> 2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act:
> (a) Offer Linda Clark [and others not here relevant] . . . reinstatement to their former positions of employment without prejudice to seniority or other rights and privileges, or if in any case their former job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, discharging, if necessary, any employee hired in replacement, and make them whole in the manner provided in F. W. Woolworth, 90 NLRB 289 and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651,[15] for any loss of earning incurred as a result of their being terminated.
> (b) Offer Mary Christian reinstatement of her janitorial contract and make her whole, including interest to be determined in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corporation, supra, for any loss of contractual revenue she may have incurred as a result of her contract being terminated.

[15] See generally Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716.

A dispute having arisen over, first, the amount of backpay due Mary Christian and, second, the reinstatement of Linda Morgan nee Clark and Mary Christian, Respondent and the General Counsel entered into a stipulation, quoted in full in the Appendix, infra, and, on July 27, 1983, the Regional Director for Region 19 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing which Respondent answered on October 13, 1983. I heard the matter in trial on October 25, 1983, in Helena, Montana. Thereafter the General Counsel and Respondent filed posthearing briefs.

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

Based on the record as a whole, including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor and the posthearing briefs of the parties, I make the following findings and conclusions.

I. LINDA CLARK, NOW MORGAN

A. Facts

William K. Burlingame was elected business manager of Respondent on August 11, 1981. As a result of that election, he ultimately took over control of Respondent on October 1, 1981. Assisting him in his campaign were various of the discriminatees in the original unfair labor practice hearing in this matter including Morgan. Soon after the election and the ballot count which resulted in the apparent victory of Burlingame, he, his wife, and the various discriminatees, including Linda Morgan, went to a victory celebration at the Hof-brau restaurant in Helena, Montana. Also present was Mary Fitzpatrick, an election ally of Burlingame and, as of October 1981, Respondent's bookkeeper. Fitzpatrick and Burlingame in speaking to the various election allies and discriminatees indicated that when the new administration took office, those employees, including Linda Morgan, would have their jobs back. Linda Morgan answered that she was getting married and moving to Idaho Falls, Idaho. She indicated that she might be able to help for "a few days if we absolutely needed her" but that she was leaving and could not resume her employment.[1]

Sometime later, but before the administration took power in October, another social event occurred at The Locker Room, a bar in Helena. Les McGetrick, who would be Respondent's business manager in October, addressed various of the discriminatees, including Linda Morgan. He testified, without contradiction, that he told Morgan "if she wanted her job back it was available. And that she replied she was going to get married and move to Idaho, and that she would be unable to accept it."

At the orginial hearing in this matter the parties stipulated that all discriminatees, except for Morgan, were reinstated as of October 15 and that she moved from the vicinity.

The original trial on the underlying unfair labor practices in this matter occurred on November 19, 1981. Representing the General Counsel were Patrick F. Dunham and Stephanie Rene Cottrell, the latter counsel for the General Counsel in the instant litigation. Counsel for Respondent at that time was R. Louis Brown Jr. During the course of the original unfair labor practice proceeding, counsel for Respondent attempted to ask then witness Linda Morgan if she had been offered reinstatement by Respondent's agent McGetrick. Counsel for the General Counsel Dunham objected, stating "this goes to a matter that would be proper in a backpay hearing, but not here." Following record colloquy which made it clear that the General Counsel and Respondent had a dispute regarding whether or not an adequate offer of reinstatement had been made to Linda Morgan, the General Counsel's objection was sustained by the administrative law judge with the assurance to counsel for Respondent that the litigation of the matter would not be foreclosed if appropriate in a later proceeding.

[1] Mary Fitzpatrick and William Burlingame testified to this meeting. Morgan did not. Although Burlingame and Fitzpatrick each advanced a rather vague recollection of the specific remarks made and although their memories do not coincide with precision, it is clear that the offer of reinstatement was made in roughly the terms noted above and that Linda Morgan indicated she would be unable to reassume her position because of her upcoming marriage and move.

The administrative law judge in his May 21, 1982 decision ordered Linda Morgan, then Clark, be offered reinstatement, as noted supra, and also ordered that all other discriminatees be offered reinstatement including those individuals who the parties had previously stipulated were already reinstated. The judge included in his order the following:

> 2(e) Notify the Regional Director, in writing, within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.[17]

[17] I recognize that General Counsel has represented all discriminatees except for Clark [now Morgan] were reinstated as of October 15, and that she had moved from the employing vicinity. In view of unusual circumstances in this case, I nevertheless recommend couching reinstatement rights in prospective terms, and would envision the notification procedure of this paragraph 2. (e) as the vehicle whereby Respondent may finally and formally verify that job restorations are of settled permanence and that Clark could have become re-employed had she so chosen. It is particularly appropriate to fashion this deviation in light of the Board's newly-announced policy on expunction of disciplinary file references. See Sterling Sugars, Inc., 261 NLRB No. 71.

Respondent filed no exceptions to the administrative law judge's decision and this portion of the Order was accepted without modification. The Board in ruling on the judge's decision on the General Counsel's exceptions substituted a new notice for that recommended by the administrative law judge. In each case the following paragraph of the notice was the same:

> WE HAVE reinstated Mary Fitzpatrick, Joyce McCutcheon, Richard Christian, Ruth Strah, Susan Agostinelli, and Maxine McFarland to their former positions of employment without prejudice to seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, recognizing too that Linda Clark had such a right to reinstatement before she moved from this job area, and WE WILL make them all whole, with interest, for any losses in pay resulting from their each being terminated during 1981.

B. Positions of the Parties

Respondent argues that in the September 1981 conversations, noted supra, Respondent offered Linda Morgan reinstatement and that she declined the offers. Thus, argues Respondent, it has no further obligation to offer or reoffer employment to Linda Morgan.

The General Counsel argues that the original administrative law judge's decision, which was not excepted to by Respondent and in this regard was adopted in its entirety by the Board, is res judicata as to the Linda Morgan matter. Thus, notes the General Counsel, the administrative law judge specifically ordered Respondent to offer Linda Morgan reinstatement and, it is undisputed that no offer of reinstatement has been made to her since the judge's decision issued.

The General Counsel on brief argues that in the underlying unfair labor practice hearing Respondent abandoned its "claim and defense" concerning the Morgan reinstatement matter and further suggest, at footnote 4, page 5 of her brief, that, since Respondent failed to present any evidence during the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding on the issue, an adverse inference should be drawn that such evidence if offered would not have supported Respondent's contention. Respondent with some heat argues that it attempted to introduce evidence concerning the September 1981 reinstatement conversation at the original hearing but was precluded from doing so as a result of the administrative law judge sustaining the objection of counsel for the General Counsel that such matter should be appropriately raised later in a backpay hearing. Thus, argues counsel for Respondent, the General Counsel is attempting to breach or vary from the position taken in the original proceeding in order to prevent Respondent from now adducing evidence on the question.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

Having carefully considered those portions of the transcript of the original hearing offered by Respondent to support its position that it was not allowed to introduce evidence concerning the Morgan reinstatement issue and the argument of counsel, I am in complete agreement with counsel for Respondent and reject the factual assertions of counsel for the General Counsel on the matter. More specifically, I find that Respondent did attempt to introduce evidence concerning the Morgan reinstatement conversations of September 1981 at the original hearing and that it persisted in doing so until the ultimate and final adverse ruling on the General Counsel's objection by the administrative law judge. Respondent at the original hearing did not abandon its defense and the claims of counsel for the General Counsel to the contrary are simply wrong.

Having made this threshold finding, I further find that there can be no finding of res judicata or collateral estoppel which would, in any way, preclude Respondent from now raising the September 1981 Morgan reinstatement conversations in its own defense. First, the decision of the Board adopting the underlying administrative law judge's decision in this matter simply makes no findings regarding the question of Morgan's reinstatement. Second, even were this not so, the fact that Respondent was led to believe that its September 1981 reinstatement evidence could be offered in a backpay hearing and the fact that the administrative law judge sustained the objection of the General Counsel to Respondent's offering this evidence at the original hearing, all require that the evidence properly be considered now. Not to allow the presentation of this evidence now would, I find in complete agreement with counsel for Respondent, violate Respondent's fundamental right to due process of law by simply precluding him at each stage in a two-stage proceeding from offering evidence relevant to his defense by suggesting that the evidence should be or should have been offered in the other stage of the proceeding.[2]

[2] I do not take the General Counsel's argument regarding reinstatement of Linda Morgan to go so far as to suggest, if I find that Morgan

Turning to the evidence regarding the reinstatement offer, the General Counsel argues that Assistant Business Manager Les McGetrick's statement to Morgan "if she wanted her job back, it was available" is no more than an inquiry as to Morgan's desire for a job. The General Counsel further argues that the offer was without specifics regarding terms and conditions of employment. The Board had occasion to consider an offer somewhat similar to the instant case. In American Enterprises, 200 NLRB 114 (1972), the Board considered the following job offer: "We are inquiring as to whether or not you will be interested in returning to work for us. We will hold the job open until Monday, August 31, 1970." With Board approval, the administrative law judge undertook the following analysis at 115:

> In his brief, the General Counsel correctly states that a discriminatee is entitled to a specific and unequivocal offer of reinstatement, and that a mere inquiry concerning his interest in returning to work does not constitute such an offer. Rea Trucking Company, Inc., 176 NLRB No. 67; Barr Packing Company, 82 NLRB 1. I do not agree with his contention that the August 25 letters were at most a "careful" query concerning the dischargees' possible interest to some "undescribed" job unaccompanied by a specific offer of reinstatement. It is true that taken alone, the first paragraph would not meet the applicable test. A reasonable interpretation of the first sentence of the second paragraph, however, was that Respondent was holding open the dischargees' jobs for them. Admittedly, the offer to hold "the" jobs for the dischargees was not the most felicitous choice of language; and unquestionably, an offer to the dischargees to hold "your" jobs open would have been preferable. But as stated in Centac Corp., 179 NLRB 313 at 322, "If the men had doubt, they could have inquired."

My decision in this matter is reinforced by the larger context of events in which the job offer was made to Linda Morgan. Morgan, along with other discriminatees, had supported the election campaign of Burlingame. The reinstatement offers were made to the discriminatees following his successful election but before his installation as an official of Respondent. Thus the relationship of Burlingame and his political allies to the discriminatees including Morgan at that time, is different from the often adversarial relationship between an employer and a discriminatee seeking reinstatement. Further, although the evidence is hardly specific or crystal clear, it was apparently well known at the time of these conversations that Morgan was soon to marry and leave the area. Indeed, in her conversations she made it clear that, while she could assist Respondent's agents for a short time, she could not accept any employment offers. Thus, under these circumstances, and on the basis of the authority cited, I find Respondent's reinstatement offers to be sufficient to meet Board requirements. I further find Morgan's immediate and unequivocal declination of those offers has ended all reinstatement rights she had under the Board's Order.[3]

Accordingly, having found it appropriate to consider the evidence adduced by Respondent at the hearing concerning its purported offers of reinstatement to Morgan and having found that this evidence supports a finding that good faith offers of reinstatement were made and declined, I find that there are no further reinstatement rights remaining to Linda Morgan. I shall therefore dismiss this portion of the backpay specification.

II. MARY CHRISTIAN

A. Facts

On April 1, 1981, Respondent and Mary L. Christian entered into a contract whereby Christian agreed to provide cleaning services for Respondent in exchange for $650 per month. The contract contained the following provisions:

> 2. It is Mutually agreed between [Respondent] and [Christian] that the duration of this contract shall be one year from April 1, 1981 until April 1, 1982, at which time this contract may be renewed for one year by mutual consent of the parties.
> 3. It is further mutually agreed that either party may cancel this contract on thirty (30) days written notice to the other party.

As found by the Board in the initial unfair labor practice litigation, sometime in the last week of July through the first week of August 1981, Christian received a letter from Respondent terminating her contract for "economic reasons" with the added advice that effective September 3, 1981, the service would be provided "in house."

Apparently, Respondent provided these services with its own staff until early October 1981. Then the Burlingame administration determined bids for cleaning services should be solicited. Mary Fitzpatrick, the office manager, was authorized to solicit and consider such bids. There is no dispute and I find that Fitzpatrick specifically asked Les McGetrick whether Mary Christian should be contacted regarding the cleaning contract and that McGetrick told Fitzpatrick that because Mary Christian's husband was working for Respondent and because the Burlingame administration's policy was not to employ husbands and wives, that Christian should not be solicited.[4] On October 9, 1981, Respondent contracted had been offered and declined reinstatement in September 1981, that a second offer of reinstatement is required by the judge's Order. While this is an arguable construction of the judge's Order, in light of the fact that he ordered Respondent to offer reinstatement to other discriminatees who had already been reinstated, an examination of the notice in the case makes it clear that no additional reinstatement offer is required for employees who had already been reinstated.

[3] While it is true that the offer was not by its terms open for a specific period of time, Morgan's declination was immediate and unequivocal and clearly not influenced by the lack of an opportunity to consider the offer. See, e.g., Morro Motors Limited, 216 NLRB 192 fn. 3 (1975).

[4] Richard Christian, husband of Mary Christian, a discriminatee in the underlying case, was reinstated in October but left Respondent's employ by early or mid-December 1981.

for certain cleaning services, not identical to those contracted to by Christian, with an independent cleaning contractor. The contract entered into provided for a payment of $300 per month and contained the following clause:

> SECTION 9. DURATION OF AGREEMENT
> This agreement, which commences as of its effective date, all prior agreements written or oral, between the parties concerning the same services having terminated, shall become effective on October 14, 1981, and shall continue thereafter for one year, subject to renegotiation of the terms hereof unless terminated by either party on thirty (30) days written notice to the other. In the event the parties intend to continue the contract past its first year or anniversary date, the party shall give written notice within thirty (30) days of the date of termination of their intention to extend the contract and renegotiate its terms.

Insofar as the record reflects this contract has been carried forward to date without change in its terms or the rate of remuneration.

The hearing in the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding was held on November 19, 1981. The administrative law judge's decision issued on May 21, 1982, and, as noted supra, did not include a remedy for the Mary Christian contract cancellation. The Board's decision, issued on December 16, 1982, and sustaining the General Counsel's exceptions to the decision below, added the previously quoted portion of the Order with respect to Christian. Thereafter, on June 28 and July 18, 1983, respectively, Respondent and the General Counsel entered into the stipulation quoted in the Appendix.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

1. Preliminary arguments

Respondent makes several initial arguments attacking the Board's Order as to Christian.[5] Thus on brief counsel for Respondent challenges the hearing in the underlying proceeding as follows:

> Local 400 was never faced with a clear statement of the "charges" with respect to Mary Christian, never provided the opportunity to fully defend regarding the unfair labor practice charge implicating Mary Christian's contract, and has been left throughout this proceeding in a deficient posture in terms of its ability to defend on the issues. There was simply no notice, no specific charges, no clear right of confrontation, and no due process opportunity to defend.

Insofar as Respondent is seeking to attack the validity or propriety of the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding, Respondent should have (1) taken those arguments to the Board on brief in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions; (2) filed a motion for reconsideration of the Board's decision; or (3) initiated an action with the United States Court of Appeals seeking review of the Board's decision. Respondent undertook none of the above and further entered into a stipulation with the General Counsel which contains the following sentence:

> In the event judicial proceedings are thereafter necessary to enforce or review the Board's backpay and reinstatement determinations, the only issues before the Court will be the validity of the backpay computation and the reinstatement issues, as Respondent concedes that in all respect the Board's Decision and Order of December 16, 1982, is valid and proper.

Thus, in agreement with the General Counsel, I find the underlying unfair labor practice decision in this matter is res judicata and not subject to attack on the grounds quoted supra.

Respondent also argues that certain facts peculiar to the instant case should be considered to reduce any award to Christian. Thus, counsel for Respondent argues on brief that any recovery herein should commence on the date of the Board's Order rather than earlier. In support of its argument, counsel cites Board cases issuing before A.B.W. Products, 137 NLRB 25, 31 (1962), as well as circuit court authority for the proposition that, where a Board Order reverses an administrative law judge's dismissal of an allegation, the remedy should be prospective only. Respondent is aware that the earlier Board position favorable to him was reversed and is no longer current law. Counsel argues however that the Board still admits that special circumstances may warrant reduction of the traditional remedies, citing Ferrell-Hicks Chevrolet v. NLRB, 357 F.2d 822 (D.C. Cir. 1966). I have considered counsel for Respondent's argument and cases cited in support thereof, and conclude that there is no basis on this record for a tolling of the ordered remedy for particular times. Accordingly, I shall deny Respondent's motion in this respect.

2. The contract to November 15, 1981

Given my earlier rejection of Respondent's arguments challenging the reach of the Board's Order, it follows that Christian shall be made whole from the commencement of the backpay period until the disputed October events discussed infra.

3. The October events

There is no dispute that in October 1981 Respondent's agents sought to obtain contractual cleaning services from an independent contractor and, by contract dated October 14, 1981, procured cleaning services at $300 per month. The parties also stipulated that Respondent at this time was under extreme financial duress. Further the record contains uncontradicted testimony that Respondent declined to contact Mary Christian regarding a cleaning services contract because Respondent's agents in the new administration wished to institute a "no husband and wife" hiring policy.

[5] At the hearing counsel for Respondent moved that I dismiss the backpay specification as to Christian because she was not a Charging Party in the underlying proceeding. I denied that motion at the hearing as without support in reason or precedent and reaffirm that ruling here.

From these facts Respondent argues that the make-whole period for Christian should terminate as of the assumption of the new contract.[6] Respondent further argues that, even were Christian's make-whole period not terminated as of Respondent's negotiation of the new contract, that Christian's period should end as of the expiration of her contract on April 1, 1982. This is so, Respondent argues, because it is clear that Christian's contract would not have been renewed at that time because of the economic necessities which pressed Respondent to accept the lower rate offered by the new contractor.

The General Counsel argues that the obligation of Respondent to Christian continues unabated at $650 a month throughout the backpay period irrespective of Respondent's new contract entered under necessity or no, and irrespective of the Christian contract's 30 day termination clause, 1-year expiration clause or renewal clause.

The initial dispute between the parties may be resolved by consideration of the terms of Christian's contract with Respondent. The contract by its terms is of 1-year duration with a 1-year renewal option by mutual consent. The contract is subject to cancellation by either party on 30-day written notice. Contrary to the argument of the General Counsel, and in agreement with Respondent, I view the 30-day cancellation clause as rendering the contract susceptible to cancellation before the conclusion of its first year. Further, in agreement with the General Counsel and in rejection of Respondent's argument, I find that the 30-day provision renders the contract, for purposes of this analysis, equivalent to a contract for an unlimited term. Thus, I do not find the contract would of necessity by its terms automatically have been cancelled after 1 year or 2 years. Thus, in considering the make whole order, I do not find the first or second anniversary of the contract's execution significant. Rather, I will consider what actions Respondent and Christian would have taken at relevant times, given the burdens and presumptions applicable to backpay specifications.

An administrative law judge is obligated to determine the most accurate method of determining backpay. J. S. Alberici Construction Co., 249 NLRB 751 (1980); American Mfg. Co. of Texas, 167 NLRB 520 (1967). Coupled with this obligation however is the fundamental notion that uncertainties will be assessed against the wrongdoer. NLRB v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 360 F.2d 569 (5th Cir. 1966). Returning to the October 1981 actions of Respondent in negotiating a substantially less expensive cleaning contract, I find, even assigning the burden on this aspect of the case to Respondent, that the economic necessities pressing upon Respondent at that time would have required renegotiation even if the Christian contract had never been illegally breached. Thus I find that, even if Christian had been continuing satisfactory cleaning services as of that time, Respondent under the press of economic necessity would have sought to renegotiate the contract and would have offered Christian no more than $300 a month for her cleaning services thereafter, i.e., after November 15, 1981. Thus I am in agreement with Respondent that the dollar sums properly accruing to Christian under the Order after November 15, 1981, accrue at a maximum rate of $300 per month.

4. The duration of Respondent's obligation to Christian

Respondent contends that because of the nepotism policy instituted by the new administration, Mary Christian would not have been retained but rather would have been terminated as an independent contractor in October 1981 when the new administration took office. I reject this argument for several reasons. First there is insufficient evidence that the antinepotism policy was benignly arrived at. Second I have grave doubts as to whether or not even a benignly arrived at antinepotism policy could be applied in the middle of a running backpay period to discharge Respondent's obligation under the Board's Order to offer Christian reinstatement. Third, and on the facts of this case most importantly, I am not satisfied that an antinepotism policy on this record would have resulted in termination of Christian's contract. Respondent bears the burden of establishing the merits of this asserted defense. Why should Richard Christian rather than Mary Christian have been reinstated if only one could be? Furthermore the record is clear that Richard Christian was reinstated for a brief period ending in December 1981. There is no record evidence to indicate when it became clear that Richard Christian was leaving, after which it was possible under any interpretation of Respondent's asserted antinepotism rule to reinstate his wife's contract. Considering all of the above I find the asserted antinepotism rule of Respondent, apparently initiated for the first time in October 1981, to be of no force and effect to defeat the Board's Order with respect to Mary Christian or to diminish the amounts necessary to make her whole.

The second argument Respondent offers in support of its contention that Mary Christian's contract should have terminated when the new contract was entered into is the assumption, implicit in Respondent's argument, that Mary Christian would not have continued as a contractor for Respondent at $300 per month. It is this assumption, about which there is no evidence in the record, which must fall to the teaching of Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Co., supra. It is uncertain whether or not Mary Christian would have accepted the lower monthly cleaning rate in late 1981. The record is completely without direct evidence regarding the question one way or the other. The question is of necessity speculative and not susceptible to certain resolution. This is so of course because Respondent consciously decided not to offer the new rate to her. In such circumstances of uncertainty the facts will be assessed against the wrongdoer, here Respondent, whose illegal actions in terminating the contract with Christian and whose later refusal to offer her the lower rate made it impossible to ascertain whether or not Christian would have in fact continued working for Respondent at the substantially lower rate. Thus, I find, while effective November 15, 1981, Respondent's obligation to Mary Christian reduced from $650 to $300 per month, that obligation continued thereafter.

[6] While counsel for Respondent was not specific as to the proposed cutoff date, since the Christian contract contained a 30-day cancellation provision, and assuming the date of the contract with the new cleaner is taken as the decision date, the cutoff date advocated is assumed to be November 15, 1981.

As I have earlier determined that the 1-year expiration of the contract and the expiration of the second 1-year renewal period do not operate to cancel Mary Christian's contract with Respondent, it follows that I examine the record evidence to determine if Respondent would have continued to use cleaning services through the backpay period. It is clear that a contract was entered into between Respondent and the second contract cleaner, Bompart Cleaning Service. There is no record evidence that the contract was ever cancelled or modified. The burden in this aspect of the case is on Respondent. I find therefore that the $300 per month fee continued to be paid at all times relevant to this proceeding, i.e., through the backpay period ending in June 1983. I further find that Christian is due that sum and that such an amount will continue to accrue on a monthly basis pursuant to the Board's Order unless and until Christian is offered a cleaning contract on equal terms. Thus this obligation continued through the second quarter of 1983, the end of the period at issue herein. Respondent's obligations thereafter will be resolved as necessary in subsequent proceedings and will not be adressed here.

5. Calculation of amounts owing

Using the above findings to determine gross earnings and taking the undisputed interim earnings contained in the backpay specification, the following chart establishes the amounts due and owing to Mary Christian without interest. As noted supra, additional amounts which may accrue for later quarters are not addressed in this proceeding.

ORDER

On the basis of the foregoing and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I recommend the following[8]

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that Respondent, International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 400, its successors or assigns, shall forthwith pay to Mary Christian the amount listed after her name, plus interest to be computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 146 (1980),[9] less tax withholding required by state and Federal laws.

Mary Christian $1,125.00

[8] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[9] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). The specification by calendar quarter as set forth supra shall be used for purposes of interest calculation.

APPENDIX

STIPULATION

The following matters are stipulated by and between counsel for Respondent, and the General Counsel for the National Labor Relations Board:

1. Respondent has no objection to the Board's Decision and Order of December 16, 1982;

2. Respondent has not been able to reach agreement with the General Counsel as to reinstatement issues concerning Linda Morgan and Mary Christian, nor as to the amount of backpay due Mary Christian under the terms of said Decision and Order;

3. The Regional Director for Region 19 may issue an order setting a date for hearing before an Administrative Law Judge to determine the amount of backpay due and the issues of reinstatement in this case; with the understanding that Respondent reserves the right to assert, as an affirmative defense at the backpay proceeding, that circumstances would have caused the Respondent not to renew Mary Christian's janitorial contract after April 1, 1982; notwithstanding the unfair labor practice was found to have been committed;

4. Following the decision of the Administrative Law Judge issued after such hearing, the matter will be subject to review in due course by the Board. In the event judicial proceedings are thereafter necessary to enforce or to review the Board's backpay and reinstatement determinations, the only issue before the court will be the validity of the backpay computation and the reinstatement issues, as Respondent concedes that in all respects the Board's Decision and Order of December 16, 1982, is valid and proper.

The Armstrong Rubber Company, Pacific Coast Division and United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, Local No. 703, AFL–CIO–CLC. Case 32–CA–5876–5

13 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 20 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Russell L. Stevens issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, The Armstrong Rubber Company, Pacific Coast Division, Hanford, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] In adopting the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by threatening, disparaging, and harassing Shop Steward Tesoriere because of his activity on behalf of the Union, Chairman Dotson and Member Hunter do not rely on any of Supervisor Homen's comments to Tesoriere during August 1983. Further, Member Hunter does not rely on the confrontation between Homen and Tesoriere on 17 September 1983.

The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] In adopting the judge's conclusion that by various statements and actions of Supervisor Homen directed toward employee Tesoriere the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act, we do not rely on that portion of the judge's analysis, in III of his decision, which discusses Homen's motivation and asserts that once an antiunion motivation on the part of Homen was shown the burden shifted to the Respondent to show either that the incidents did not occur or that if they occurred they were unrelated to Tesoriere's union activity. We note that the test for finding a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) such as that alleged here is whether the employer's actions reasonably tended to interfere with, restrain, or coerce the free exercise of employees' statutory rights. American Freightways Co., 124 NLRB 146 (1959).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RUSSELL L. STEVENS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Fresno, California on April 26, 1984.[1] The complaint, issued November 30, is based on an original charge filed September 16 by United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, Local No. 703, AFL–CIO–CLC (Union); a first amended charge filed by the Union on September 30; and a second amended charge filed by the Union on November 21. The complaint, as amended at trial, alleges that The Armstrong Rubber Company, Pacific Coast Division (Respondent), violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act).

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of counsel for General Counsel and counsel for Respondent.

On the entire record, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material Respondent, a Connecticut corporation with an office and place of business in Hanford, California, has been engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale of automobile, truck, and tractor tires and tubes. During the past 12 months, in the course and conduct of its business operations, Respondent purchased and received goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California.

I find that Respondent is, and at all times material has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, Local No. 703, AFL–CIO–CLC is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Background[2]

Anthony Tesoriere, a member of the Union, has been employed by Respondent approximately 17 years as an industrial mechanic. He has held several offices in the Union, and at all times material has been the union shop steward for Respondent's maintenance department. Since approximately 7 years ago, and at all times material, Tesoriere's immediate supervisor was Bill Homen, Re-

[1] All dates are within 1983, unless otherwise stated.

[2] This background summary is based on credited testimony and evidence not in dispute.

spondent's maintenance foreman,[3] who supervised 10 to 16 employees. Under the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union, the first step of grievances in Homen's department often were discussed by Homen and Tesoriere. Those two persons attempted to settle grievances, but written grievances are not seen by Homen—they are filed with Respondent's maintenance superintendent. During the past year Tesoriere filed approximately 30 grievances for the 80 employees of the maintenance department, of which approximately 12 grievances involved Homen.

1. The incidents involved

Tesoriere testified that Homen has threatened and harassed him on several occasions, as follows:

a. On August 29 he discussed a grievance with Homen concerning movement of molds by mechanics, which movement he contended was improper.

> A. Well, I first told him about moving these molds and why the mechanics were doing the job instead of the mold repairmen. He got upset when I started talking to him, and he accused me of just standing there wasting time and ordered me to get back to work, get back to my area and go back to work.
> Q. Did he say anything else?
>
> A. Other than accusing me of wasting time, no, he just told me to get back to work.
> Q. Did he indicate that he would correct the situation or not correct it?
> A. He did say he wouldn't do anything about it. He said the mechanics were moving molds and that was it. He couldn't do any further than that.

b. On August 30 he was called by Homen to the office of Tom Driver, Respondent's maintenance superintendent, to represent an employee, John Smith, who was being investigated. As he left the office, Homen, was standing just outside the door, Homen stated to him, "You were in there long enough. Let's get back to work."

c. On August 26 again he was called by Homen to Driver's office to represent employee Bob Clay, who was being investigated by Respondent. Again Homen was just outside the door when Tesoriere left Driver's office. Homen said "I'd been in there long enough with Bob Clay and to go back to work."

d. On August 16 Tesoriere filed a grievance on behalf of employee Al Palomo, and on that day Homen called Tesoriere to Driver's office for an investigatory interview of Palomo by Driver. The meeting was attended by Palomo, Driver, Homen, and Tesoriere. Palomo later left, and a second grievance hearing then was held for employee Les Davis, with the same people present. As everyone was leaving after the meeting, Homen approached Tesoriere outside the office, and appeared angry. Homen "told me we'd been in there long enough again, and it was time to get back to work."

e. On September 15 a mechanic named John Borba told Tesoriere he wanted to file a written grievance against Homen because Homen had taken tools from Borba's toolbox and was using them. Tesoriere said he first would like to discuss the matter with Homen. Later that afternoon Tesoriere approached Homen:

> A. I stopped Bill Homen in the same area, in the maintenance shop by the battery area, and I said to Bill, "Just a minute, Bill, I'd like to speak to you for a minute." And he stopped, he was on his bicycle, and he stopped. And I said, "I understand you've been using tools out of a mechanic's tool box and I'd like you to stop it." And at first he denied it. He said, "No, I wasn't working. I wasn't using anyone's tools." And he paused for a minute, and then he just came unglued and he called, he said to me, "You little mother-fucker, I'll get you, I'll get you, if it's the last thing I do. I'll get you." And he was screaming and waving his arms when he said it. And we weren't but a few feet apart. He jumped on his bicycle and he rode off in the direction of the plant.

f. On September 17 Tesoriere talked with Homen:

> A. Well, I was standing at the tool crib, at the counter there, and Bill Homen came riding up on his bicycle, stopped and just started shouting and screaming right in my face, and we were nose-to-nose, wasn't a foot apart. He said, "You little son-of-a-bitch, there you are. Just the other day you wanted to write a grievance against me and now here you are standing here." And he was just—he was waving his arms, he was very—I thought he was going to hit me at one point, because he was just moving his arms and had a fist in front of my face. And then he jumped on his bicycle, and I said all I was trying to do was first-step grievance, and I don't even know if he heard me. He jumped on his bicycle and he took off and he went back towards the shop or the curing area.

g. On Monday, October 17 he talked with Homen before going to work late, at 11 a.m. He was late because he had been attending to union business as a trustee, with an absence excuse from management:

> A. Well, I'd gone upstairs to change clothes, get into my work clothes to go to work. And Homen came up there and he stood down the edge of the aisleway and he said, "So, there you are!" He said, "You're off all day Friday, and you're off half a day today on union business, and this shit has got to stop." And that was it. He turned around and he left and he left the locker room.

Tesoriere had been absent the preceding Friday on union business as a trustee, with an absence excuse from management.

h. On October 18, shortly after 8 a.m.:

[3] Homen's supervisory status is not in dispute.

A. Well, Homen approached me that morning, cleaning his bicycle, and he had a can of—a spray bottle in his hand, of eye-glass cleaning solution. He come over to me with it, and he sprayed the air all around my head and shoulders with it, it got in my coffee, I was holding a cup of coffee, it got into my coffee, and he just started to chuckle, he said, "All right, get to work."

He got this stuff all over me, all around me, and in my coffee. I just took my coffee cup and I threw it in the waste basket that was there and I just left the area and went into work.

Homen testified relative to Borba:

A. I remember he had—Tony had stopped me that day, that morning, and he said he was going to have to turn a grievance in or I'd been using tools, and I said—I denied it, no. And I said, "I'll talk to you about it later." And I rode off.

Homen denied that he ever talked, or had a confrontation, with Tesoriere while cleaning his bicycle. He also denied spraying Tesoriere with cleaning fluid.

Discussion

Generally speaking, Tesoriere was a more convincing witness than Homen. He seemed sincere, straightforward, and candid in his testimony. His version of events is credited.

Homen not only was not convincing—he did not deny most of Tesoriere's testimony. His denials principally involved only the Borba incident and the matter of spraying the cleaning fluid.

Prima facie, in view of the number of incidents involved and the single theme of those incidents, i.e., all of them occurred directly or indirectly in relation with Tesoriere's activity on behalf of the Union, Homen was motivated by a desire to restrain, interfere with or coerce Tesoriere in his union activity. It then became Respondent's burden to prove that the incidents did not occur, or that, if they did occur, they were not related to Tesoriere's union activity. That burden was not met. There is no evidence that Tesoriere and Homen were engaged in a personal feud, or that Tesoriere had been goofing off and needed to be prodded to get him to work, or that Homen's actions against Tesoriere were motivated by anything other than a dislike of the latter's union activity. No reason was shown for such a dislike, but that fact is irrelevant. It is found that Homen's actions in all incidents were dictated by his desire to restrain, interfere with, or coerce Tesoriere in his union activity.

Possibly one or more of the incidents Tesoriere related would not constitute violations of the Act, if they were considered in a vacuum. For instance, Homen's direction to Tesoriere to get back to work because he had been in with Driver and fellow employees long enough, possibly would not, in the absence of anything else, be a violation of the Act. However, that is not this case. It is apparent that Homen seized every opportunity to threaten or harass Tesoriere because the latter was acting in behalf of grieving employees. There is a pattern of conduct, not just one or two isolated incidents. Whatever may have been Homen's reason to be annoyed by Tesoriere's activity, it is clear that the reason was related to the Union. Homen supervised Tesoriere all day every day, yet there is no evidence that his comments discussed above ever were related to any activity other than union activity.

Homen made plain to Tesoriere his views of the latter's union activity. It is not necessary to dwell on implications. On August 16 Homen told Tesoriere, after waiting outside during an interview, that Tesoriere had been in Driver's office long enough with a grievant—that he should get back to work. On August 26 he repeated that action—he waited outside the office for Tesoriere to finish the grievance interview, and again told him to get back to work. On August 30, Homen again waited outside the office until a grievance interview was over, and then told Tesoriere that he had been in the interview long enough, and to get back to work. On September 15, angered by a grievance, Homen threatened Tesoriere "I'll get you . . . if it's the last thing I do. I'll get you." On September 17 Homen swore at Tesoriere because the latter had been involved with a grievance. On October 17, Homen objected to Tesoriere's being off work on union business, and threatened that "this shit has got to stop." On October 18, Homen assaulted Tesoriere with cleaner spray. That assault, standing alone, possibly would be ambiguous. However, it does not stand alone—it followed an earlier threat by Homen to "get" Tesoriere, and a threat the day before concerning Tesoriere's union activity, "this shit has got to stop." Those actions by Homen clearly were coercive, and constituted threats and harassment in violation of the Act, as alleged in the complaint.[4]

On the basis of the foregoing findings of fact and on the entire record, I make the following

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent The Armstrong Rubber Company, Pacific Coast Division is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, Local No. 703, AFL-CIO-CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening, disparaging, and harassing a union shop steward because of the steward's activity on behalf of the Union.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices, it is recommended that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

ORDER

The Respondent The Armstrong Rubber Company, Pacific Coast Division, Hanford, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening, disparaging and harassing a union shop steward because of the of the steward's activity on behalf of the Union.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

13 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 16 June 1983 Administrative Law Judge William A. Gershuny issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order[3] as modified.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Eastern Telecom Corporation, Monroeville, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1:

"1. Cease and desist from

"(a) Soliciting its employees to take their grievances directly to it rather than attempting to obtain redress through the contractual grievance procedure or through other protected activities.

"(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

2. Add the following as paragraph 2(b):

"(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

---

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In addition, the General Counsel contends that the judge's credibility resolutions, factual findings, and legal conclusions are the result of bias. After a careful examination of the entire record, we are satisfied that this allegation is without merit. There is no basis for finding that bias and partiality existed merely because the judge resolved important factual conflicts in favor of the Respondent's witnesses. As the Supreme Court stated in NLRB v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 337 U.S. 656, 659 (1949), "[T]otal rejection of an opposed view cannot of itself impugn the integrity or competence of a trier of fact."

In sec. III,B,(9) of his decision, the judge incorrectly stated that Charging Party Wieland "admitted making all the disparaging remarks, the threat to go to city council and telling co-employees about his litigation with a former employer." The record reveals, however, that Wieland only admitted making two of the disparaging remarks and telling other employees about his litigation with a former employer. This error in the judge's findings does not affect his conclusions, because he relied on other independent evidence as to Wieland's threat and all of the disparaging statements.

In the paragraph titled "The sub-contractor grievance" in sec. III,B of his decision, the judge incorrectly stated that Local Union President Peterson testified Wieland's complaints about the Respondent's subcontracting of unit work were never brought to the Respondent's attention. Although Peterson did testify that he never told the Respondent of Wieland's complaints, Peterson also testified that Wieland had complained directly to the Respondent about the subcontracting. Further, Respondent Director of Operations Gingery admitted that Wieland complained to him in May 1982 about the Respondent's use of subcontractors to do bargaining unit work, and the judge found that Wieland questioned Respondent Administrative Assistant Yocco about subcontracting in June 1982 when Yocco informed employee Smith he would be laid off. We do not rely on the judge's erroneous finding in adopting his decision. Rather, we note there is no evidence that the Respondent expressed any animus toward Wieland's subcontracting complaints or that his complaints to Gingery in May and to Yocco in June played any part in the Respondent's decision to discharge him in September.

In par. 4 of sec. III,C of his decision, the judge incorrectly stated that "help was needed due to the maternity leave of one clerk and the vacation of another." The record establishes, however, that no employee was on maternity leave when the Respondent recalled Snyder. This error in the judge's findings does not affect his conclusions, and we do not rely on it in adopting his decision. In the paragraph titled "Wieland as steward" in sec. III,B of his decision, the judge incorrectly stated that there were two other stewards instead of one. We therefore correct this inadvertent error.

[2] The General Counsel argues that the judge erred in concluding that the Respondent discharged Wieland for cause, pointing to evidence not addressed by the judge that on two occasions Respondent President Chiodo called Wieland "a troublemaker" and linked these comments to either a threat to get rid of Wieland or his actual discharge. Inasmuch as the record reveals that Chiodo also made similar statements about the other union steward, Grimes, but the Respondent did not discharge him and that the Respondent had fired other employees for the same conduct as it discharged Wieland, we agree with the judge that the Respondent decided to discharge Wieland solely because of his poor work performance, not because of any protected activities in which he may have participated, and that the Respondent would have made the same decision regardless of whether Wieland engaged in any protected activities. Furthermore, we note that Chiodo's vague "troublemaker" references were not in most cases specifically directed at any possibly protected activities, but rather were usually linked to Wieland's abuse of privileges or poor job performance and that the judge credited Chiodo's testimony that he considered Wieland a troublemaker because Wieland had called him names, threatened to slash his tires, and threatened to obstruct the sale of part of his business by revealing damaging information.

[3] We have modified the judge's recommended Order to add the standard language requiring the Respondent to refrain from violating the Act "in any like or related manner" and requiring the Respondent to notify the Regional Director of its compliance. We have also modified the judge's notice to conform to our Order.

EASTERN TELECOM CORPORATION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM A. GERSHUNY, Administrative Law Judge. A consolidated hearing was held in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on February 14–17 and April 11–12, 1983, on complaints alleging a number of 8(a)(1) violations, the unlawful layoff of nonbargaining unit employee Carole Snyder and the unlawful discharge of her friend, Steward Robert Wieland, on September 8, 1982.[1] A third complaint, Case 6-CA-15630, alleging a number of 8(a)(5) violations was settled on the opening day of the hearing.

On the entire record, including my observation of witness demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

The complaints allege, the answers admit, and I find that Respondent is an employer subject to the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaints allege, the answers admit, and I find that Local Union 126, IBEW is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

III. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent operates a number of cable television systems in the Pittsburgh area. Its main office is in Monroeville and it has another office in Mt. Lebanon to service operations in that area.

Repsondent (and predecessors) has recognized and bargained with Local 126 since 1968 and the current contract covering technicians expires April 30, 1983. Admittedly, its relationship with the Union over the years has been good, there have been no unfair labor practice charges, all disputes have been resolved amicably without resort to arbitration, and there is no history of union animus.

B. The Wieland Discharge on September 8, 1982

By letter dated September 8, 1982, Robert Wieland, the Company's highest grade technician and union steward for the Mt. Lebanon operations, was discharged by Administrative Assistant and Director of Personnel Yocco. The stated grounds were numerous:

(1) The unauthorized use of company telephones for long-distance toll calls during March–May. On July 22, he was confronted with bills. Restitution was demanded and made, and he received a written warning. Other employees (including steward Grimes) received similar demands and warnings. Wieland admitted the facts. No grievance was filed.

(2) The failure to bond and ground connections to telephone lines, contrary to safe practices, company policy, and the Company's contractual obligation with the telephone company. Wieland was leader of the crew which performed the work. Wieland admitted the facts and received a reprimand on August 6, following a telephone company complaint on August 3. No grievance was filed.

(3) The failure on September 1 (and other days) to bury a cable connected to a customer's house, contrary to specific instructions and a written company policy announced August 3, and his issuance of verbal instructions to other employees not to bury cable and not to worry about it. Wieland admitted not burying cable at the time of installation, stating that the ground often was hard and he lacked proper digging equipment or the time and that other technicians similarly failed to bury cable on occasion. Once, the cable was left on a driveway.

(4) The damage of a company vehicle in January 1982, requiring repairs in the amount of $155.

(5) The inability to understand and perform work assigned on August 20 to Wieland within the scope of his superior classification, resulting in the loss of a full day of labor and necessitating performance of the work by a supervisor. He did not ask for assistance or blueprints and his wiring on the "head end" was a "mess."

(6) Two customer complaints in late August of failure to provide home service when scheduled. Wieland had marked work orders with the notation that the customer was not home, contrary to the fact.

(7) The scheduling of followup customer service, contrary to company policy which states that all service calls are to be scheduled only by office personnel who have responsibility for their coordination. Wieland admitted doing so, stating that often irate customers have to be told something.

(8) The failure to hook up a cable on September 3, as called for by a work order.

(9) The making of disparaging remarks about Company President Chiodo ("fat SOB" and "bastard") in conversations with other employees; disparaging remarks to customers that company equipment was "outdated, obsolete, old and in need of repair"; threats to report how bad the cable system was to city council which licensed the system and was then considering an extension of the license, if he were discharged; threats to "get even" with the Company for laying off his girl friend, Charging Party Snyder; and threats to "do the same" to Respondent as he had done to a former employer who had discharged him and paid Wieland money in settlement of a claim. He admitted making all the disparaging remarks, the threat to go to city council, and telling co-employees about his litigation with a former employer. His reasons: in part, because they were true; in part, because he was angry with Respondent for having reassigned him from the Monroeville office (near his home and where his girl friend worked) to the Mt. Lebanon office where he was needed because of his classification. Significant also are statements to nonbargaining unit co-employees, after his transfer to Mt. Lebanon, that he had records and photographs to show that the system was bad, that he intended to get back at the Company because of his transfer, and Respondent's refusal to allow him (or other employees) personal use of company trucks, that he was going to "nail his ass" (referring to the company president) with those records, and that he had taken a former employer for a lot of money and was going to "take" the Company "for all he could get." Noteworthy is the fact that neither the transfer nor the truck-use policy is alleged to be unlawful.

The record evidence is overwhelming that actual cause existed for Wieland's discharge on the grounds that he was incompetent, insubordinate, careless, disloyal, and dishonest. Nor was there disparate treatment of Wieland. Another shop steward similarly was required to make payment for unauthorized toll calls and the truck-use policy applied to all. Other employees occasionally did not bury cables at time of installation, but none with the regularity of Wieland and no other employee directly disobeyed specific instructions to do so. There is evidence proffered that other employees slandered the president, but their remarks fall well afield of Wieland's. Another employee damaged a truck, but the when, where, and how are unexplained. Other employees were the subject of customer complaints, but Wieland was the subject of far more complaints and followup calls than all other employees. Indeed, another employee was similarly discharged for similar conduct.

The real issue is whether the discharge decision was also based in part on any protected concerted activity which Wieland may have engaged in. For reasons set forth below, I conclude that the decision was bottomed solely and exclusively on work performance and not on any protected activity and that Respondent would have taken the same course regardless of whether Wieland engaged in any such activity. For this reason, there is no occasion to consider whether Wieland's disparagement of the company cable system and its president was so destructive of the employment relationship as to make inappropriate the usual remedy of reinstatement.

The General Counsel's principal witness in both cases is Charging Party Wieland. Moreover, the keystone to the General Counsel's case is comprised of "admissions" of unlawful company motive allegedly made in July and August by Supervisor Turak to Wieland prior to the July 15 layoff of Snyder and the September 8 discharge of Wieland. For these reasons, the credibility of Wieland must be addressed at the outset.

In doing so, it must be said that the record in this case raises critical credibility issues, not of the run-of-the mill variety involving faulty memory, misperceived motives, misconstrued actions, and misinterpreted words. Rather, this record is strongly suggestive of evidence manufactured for purposes of this case.

It is helpful, I believe, to first consider the unusual circumstances surrounding the emergence of Turak as a source of evidence damning to Respondent. Turak was Wieland's supervisor and social friend when the latter was transferred to Mt. Lebanon in late June Wieland testified that Turak admitted (a) that he had been instructed by the Company to reprimand Wieland; (b) that the Company was watching both Wieland and his girl friend and housemate, Carole Snyder; (c) that Carole Snyder was laid off to provoke Wieland into giving Respondent grounds for discharge; (d) that he was told by the Company to deny Wieland assistance on an assignment; (e) Wieland would soon be given a difficult job in an effort to demote him; (f) that Wieland's visit to the Board offices would "cause war"; (g) that the Company was out to get Wieland; and (h) that Wieland was being watched.

These "admissions" were made by Turak to Wieland before his discharge on September 8, yet none were the subject of Wieland's charge of September 10 or the complaint which issued October 7. Presumably they were not mentioned in any of Wieland's first three affidavits given to the Board between September 10 and 21. It was not until the amended complaint of February 1, 1983, 2 weeks before the hearing, that Turak's role emerged in the form of seven allegations of violations of Section 8(a)(1). Presumably, Turak's role first was disclosed to the Board in Wieland's affidavit of January 26, 1983. This sequence of events—actual knowledge of admissions by Wieland in July and August when he was addressed by Turak; first disclosure and first allegations in early January 1983; and Turak's quitting his job in August 1982 and, by early 1983, his disappearance—raises grave suspicions as to the credibly generally of Wieland.

Of even greater importance, however, is my inability to credit Wieland based simply on my observation of him on the witness stand during his extended examination. On direct, his testimony was extensive and detailed, recounting numerous events and conversations over a 6-month period with recourse to no notes or other documents. On cross-examination, his testimony became vague vague, uncertain, exaggerated, and contradictory and he displayed a reluctance to admit to any fact which he perceived to be harmful to this case. He admitted making the basest of derogatory remarks concerning the company president and the cable system to get back at the Company for transferring him (admittedly lawfully) to another office where he was needed; he admitted that he gave conflicting evidence in an unemployment compensation hearing, in his affidavit, and at this hearing as to Respondent's knowledge of his activity regarding a union grievance over use of subcontractors; and he admitted he similarly gave conflicting testimony as to whether he was asked by Turak about his visit to Board Offices.

In Wieland's zeal to support the allegation, it is my belief that he shut his eyes to the facts. I reject his testimony in its entirety.

This credibility finding thus disposes of paragraphs 11(a)(1)–(5) and 12(a)(1)–(7) and (b) of the complaint as amended.

The General Counsel contends that Wieland engaged in a number of activities protected under Section 7 of the Act and that each played a part in the decision to discharge Wieland.

1. The subcontractor grievance

This grievance was filed by the Union on August 27 and since has been arbitrated with the grievance being denied. According to the testimony of Local Union President Peterson, Wieland had complained to him many times about the Company's use of subcontractors to do bargaining unit work, but that Wieland's involvement never was brought to the attention of the Company. Thus, this activity could not have come within the Section 7 umbrella and could not have been a part of Respondent's decision.

2. Wieland's June 16 discussion with Yocco

On June 16, Director of Personnel Yocco informed technician Smith that he was to be laid off because of cutbacks. Present was Wieland, who was not yet a steward. Wieland asked if subcontractors were to be used; Yocco replied it was not his decision; and Wieland advised Smith to talk with the steward. The layoff decision was revoked 2 days later for unexplained reasons. Assuming, without deciding, that Wieland's fleeting involvement in the Smith layoff constitutes protected concerted activity, I am unable to find any evidence that this event played any role whatsoever in the discharge decision. Wieland's role was innocuous and there is no suggestion on this record that any ill will was generated.

3. Wieland's uniform and training discussions

Wieland, both before and after his appointment as steward, was outspoken in his opposition to a company plan that employees who make calls on private homes wear uniforms and to a company practice of providing training classes to benefit its employees who contractually are required to pass tests for advancement. The Company had heard that Wieland was circulating a petition. Local Union President Peterson advised Wieland that the issues were not covered under the contract. The uniforms were the suggestion of municipalities for security purposes. Chiodo, Respondent's president, in a conversation with Peterson, referred to Wieland as a troublemaker and the latter assumed the reference was to classes and uniforms issues. Chiodo, however, used the phrase to refer to Wieland's abusive attitude following his transfer to Mt. Lebanon and his loss of the use of company trucks for personal reasons. I credit Chiodo's testimony as it is fully consistent with the totality of events, of which Peterson was unaware and, thus, was left to speculate about Chiodo's meaning. Again, I am unable to detect any record suggestion that this series of events, which culminated on July 14, left any bitter aftertaste in the minds of Respondent's officials, despite the fact that employees originally (in June) had voted for uniforms, only to unanimously reject them on July 14. Given the other events of the same period (e.g., Wieland's disparaging remarks and his negligent work which necessitated many followup calls, all of which began in late June), I can neither find nor infer that such activities, assuming them to be protected and concerted under the Act, played any role whatsoever in the discharge decision. Simply stated, they were overshadowed and cast aside by those events which actually formed the basis for the discharge decision.

4. Wieland as steward

Wieland, at his request, was appointed steward on July 8. There were two other stewards. Chiodo admittedly was not unhappy or upset to learn of the appointment and there is no evidence of animus toward other stewards. As steward, Wieland processed no grievances, participated in no negotiations, and, to the knowledge of the Union, engaged in no other activities as steward. Another steward was required to make restitution for unauthorized toll calls and was on the receiving end of a number of remarks which are familiar subjects of 8(a)(1) allegations. No such allegations are included in the present complaint and, on the first day of the hearing, counsel for the General Counsel represented that the present case involves no allegations of harassment of Wieland because of his status as steward. There is evidence that Wieland detained co-employees from beginning their service calls in the morning, but the only evidence of subject matter relates, on one occasion, to an upcoming union meeting. There is no evidence that Respondent was aware of the subject matter of this discussion and, in any event, no protected activities are involved.

I find and conclude that the discharge of Wieland was not unlawful.

C. The Layoff of Carole Snyder

Carole Snyder, a girl friend and housemate of Wieland, was laid off on July 15.[2] The General Counsel's case as to Snyder is a derivative one. It is not based on any protected concerted activity on her part—indeed, there was none. Rather, it is the General Counsel's theory that she was a pawn in Respondent's efforts to retaliate against Wieland for his protected concerted activities.

[2] By Order of March 24, 1983, the Board granted the General Counsel's special appeal and directed that the General Counsel be permitted to amend the complaint in the middle of Respondent's case, to allege that Snyder also was unlawfully laid off on November 12, 1983, following a 2-week temporary recall. At the hearing, the General Counsel conceded that this November 12 layoff was not intended to allege an independent violation, but was simply evidentiary in nature, relevant to the issue of Respondent's motive for the original layoff.

Because Wieland's discharge was not unlawful, and for the further reason that the layoff of Snyder was motivated solely and exclusively by economic factors, these allegations must be dismissed.

It is undisputed that Snyder was at all relevant times a good and able employee in Respondent's Monroeville office. In 1982, the clerical work was divided among four clerks: Snyder and Carr handled the Plum cable system; and Keebler yet another. Of the four, Carr was most senior. Although Snyder had worked exclusively with the Plum system, she could have (and, indeed, did) worked on the other systems with minimal on-the-job training.

On July 15, she was abruptly laid off in the middle of the day for economic reasons. No replacement was hired and no other clerk was transferred into the position, except that, from time to time, the receptionist gave limited assistance to Carr. It is uncontroverted that other cutbacks were made, other employees were laid off, and Respondent lost money in 1982. The decision was based on Director of Personnel Yocco's determination that only one clerk was necessary to handle the Plum system. Snyder was chosen because she was single and less senior to Carr, the other clerk working on the Plum system, and because Carr was an unmarried mother. No consideration was given to the layoff of clerks working on other systems and the transfer of Snyder to perform work on those other systems. Thereafter, she requested and received from Chiodo a laudatory letter of recommendation which restated the reason for her layoff as the institution of a more efficient office procedure. On November 1, she was recalled for 2 weeks because, in the opinion of the office manager, help was needed due to the recent maternity leave of one clerk and the vacation of another.

I reject the testimony of Snyder (that 2 hours before her layoff, Chief Technician Flynn said to her, "I guess you know why Chiodo is upset") and that of Carr (that, at the time of the layoff, Chiodo said to her, "Snyder was involved because she was living with Wieland," who had sent certain unidentified information to the Union; and that, several weeks later, Flynn told her that he had warned Snyder "what would happen"). Carr admittedly was hysterical on July 15 and, thus, an unreliable reporter of events. Moreover, her bias was patent. Even crediting Snyder, Flynn's reference to Chiodo's upset would be nothing more than what Snyder already would have learned from Wieland himself—that Chiodo was upset by Wieland's disparaging remarks and his threats to go to city council, which could interfere with relicensing and an impending sale of the Company, involving millions of dollars. But I credit Flynn that no such statements were made. I was particularly impressed with the feelings that, despite his supervisory status, Flynn was not involved at all in the controversy and that he related events as they in fact occurred. I also credit Chiodo's denial. A big, gruff, self-made man with an amiable relationship with the Union for 15 years, Chiodo was a candid and convincing witness, based on my observation of his demeanor on the witness stand. Moreover, his testimony is consistent with the admitted facts concerning Wieland's seeking revenge for his transfer to Mt. Lebanon in late June and his loss of truck privileges based on his misuse and abuse of the privilege in the past.

For these reasons, I am convinced beyond any doubt that the decision to layoff Snyder was motivated solely by financial considerations, unrelated in whole or in part to any activities, protected or unprotected on the part of Wieland.

D. Chiodo's July 14 Meeting With Employees

On July 14, having heard "rumbles" concerning uniforms and training, Chiodo called a meeting of all technicians and servicemen during working hours. Admittedly, the meeting was a "gripe session," with Chiodo stating that he heard rumors of employee gripes and asking what they were. When he got no response, he asked whether they wanted uniforms. There was no response. He asked whether they wanted training classes for advancement tests. Again, there was no response. He stated that, without study, advancement tests would be harder to pass. He then aired a gripe of his own: the abuse of a prior policy concerning personal use of company trucks. He announced that that policy was being revoked[3] because of one "troublemaker" (pointing to Wieland) who "has abused it." No other mention was made of Wieland by Chiodo either during or after the meeting. Expressing his concern for employee-company relations, Chiodo invited employees to come directly to him with their problems.

The General Counsel alleges a number of 8(a)(1) violations arising out of this meeting. First, it is alleged that Chiodo denigrated and threatened to discharge employees because of their union and other protected activities. Crediting the testimony of Chiodo for the reasons set forth above, I find no factual basis for these allegations. Next, it is alleged that he informed employees that working conditions would be more onerous because they did not want to attend training classes in preparation for advancement tests. This allegation also is unfounded. Chiodo's statement tests would be more difficult to pass is simply a common sense statement of fact that, without training, any test is more difficult to pass. There is no evidence or suggestion that Respondent controls the subject of the tests which, under the contract, are under the control of the Joint Committee. Nor is there an 8(a)(5) allegation that Respondent has unilaterally altered the testing levels. Finally it is alleged that Chiodo solicited employee grievances and complaints to "interfere" with employees' Section 7 rights. This allegation is well founded. Board precedent is clear that employer solicitation of employee grievances and employer initiations to use the "open door" to air such grievances is unlawful because it has the effect, regardless of employer motive, of interfering with employee use of he contractual grievance procedure and the exercise of Section 7 rights generally. See, e.g., Martin-Bower Co., 273 NLRB 194 (1982).

[3] Neither these consolidated complaints nor the one which was the subject of a settlement on February 14, 1983, alleged that revocation of this policy was unilateral and unlawful.

THE REMEDY

Having found and concluded that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, Respondent shall be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

The Respondent Eastern Telecom Corporation Monroeville, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, succesors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from soliciting employees to take grievances directly to their employer, rather than attempting to obtain redress under the contractual grievance procedures or through other protected activities.

2. Post at all of its locations where bargaining unit employees are assigned, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION, ORDER, AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 7 February 1979 Administrative Law Judge Irwin H. Socoloff issued the attached decision. The Respondent Employer and the Respondent Union filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Charging Party Union filed further exceptions and a supporting brief. Thereafter, on 19 July 1979 the Board issued its decision[1] and remanded this case to the judge for further credibility determinations. On 31 August 1979 Administrative Law Judge Socoloff issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent Employer filed further exceptions and a supporting brief, and counsel for the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the supplemental decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision, the supplemental decision, and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] only to the extent consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

In the underlying decision, the judge was presented in part with the question whether Respondent Crown Cork de Puerto Rico, Inc. (hereafter Crown Cork or the Respondent Employer), and Respondent S.I.U. de Puerto Rico, Caribe y Latinoamerica a/a S.I.U. of North America, AFL–CIO (hereafter SIU or the Respondent Union), engaged in unlawful conduct when they negotiated and executed a collective-bargaining agreement on 12 August 1976,[4] and thereafter maintained and enforced this agreement. It has been the General Counsel's and the Charging Party's position that this conduct violated the Act because it occurred at a time when a competing labor organization, Union Independiente de Trabajadores de la Crown Cork (Union Independiente), had filed a representation petition and was seeking to represent Crown Cork's production and maintenance employees who theretofore had been represented by SIU. Crown Cork and SIU have contended that the agreement executed on 12 August was merely an interim extension agreement to succeed the expiring contract between them, that it did not provide for any additional benefits for covered employees, and that its execution and maintenance was lawful under G & H Towing Co., 168 NLRB 589 (1967). The judge rejected the Respondents' contentions, finding that the Respondents' 12 August agreement was designed to favor the incumbent SIU, increased employer contributions to a SIU medical plan, and violated the Respondents' duty to maintain strict neutrality in the face of competing representational claims by the incumbent SIU and by Union Independiente. In finding these violations, the judge in effect relied on Shea Chemical Corp., 121 NLRB 1027 (1958), which held that an employer must remain neutral and refrain from further negotiations when an incumbent bargaining representative's status is contested by a valid question concerning representation raised in support of a rival labor organization.

Subsequent to the issuance of the judge's initial decision, the Board overruled Shea Chemical in RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 NLRB 963 (1982), holding that "the mere filing of a representation peti-

[1] 243 NLRB 569.

[2] The Respondent Employer asserts that the judge's resolutions of credibility, findings of fact, and conclusions of law are the result of bias. After a careful examination of the entire record, we are satisfied that this allegation is without merit. There is no basis for finding that bias and partiality existed merely because the judge resolved important factual conflicts in favor of the General Counsel's witnesses. As the Supreme Court stated in NLRB v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 337 U.S. 656, 659 (1949), "[T]otal rejection of an opposed view cannot of itself impugn the integrity or competence of a trier of fact." Furthermore, the Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all of the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] In the absence of exceptions, we adopt the judge's dismissal of the complaint allegations that the Respondent Employer violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by pointing a camera at striking employees who were waiting to vote in a representation election.

Chairman Dotson does not adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent Employer's statements to employees Fernandez and Rivera created the impression of surveillance in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1). In identifying supporters of the Charging Party Union, the Respondent made no reference to the method by which it learned of these employees' union activities and the record provides no basis for finding that such knowledge was unlawfully obtained.

[4] Unless otherwise indicated, all dates are in 1976.

tion by an outside, challenging union will no longer require or permit an employer to withdraw from bargaining or executing a contract with an incumbent union. . . ."[5] In view of the Board's decision in RCA Del Caribe, there no longer is any basis for finding that Crown Cork's negotiation and execution of the extension agreement on 12 August unlawfully assisted the incumbent SIU.[6] Accordingly, we shall dismiss the allegations that Crown Cork violated Section 8(a)(2) and (3) of the Act by executing and maintaining this agreement. Likewise, we shall dismiss the related allegations that SIU's conduct violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A).

In view of the above, we shall modify the judge's conclusions of law to the extent that the violations found by him are based on the execution and enforcement of the 12 August agreement. Specifically, we shall dismiss the allegations that Crown Cork violated Section 8(a)(2) of the Act when it acted in furtherance of its bargaining relationship with the incumbent SIU, when it informed employees that SIU was their representative, and when it instructed its employees to attend a meeting conducted by SIU at the plant during working hours.

However, we shall not disturb the judge's finding that the strike which commenced on 24 September was an unfair labor practice strike from its inception. In finding that the strike was caused in part by unfair labor practices, we rely on the existence of numerous acts of misconduct which preceded the commencement of the strike, including violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3). Such misconduct was directed at the most prominent supporters of Union Independiente including incidents occurring in May or June, July, August, and September and culminated in the discriminatory discharge of employee Heriberto Padua, vice president of Union Independiente, on 24 September. Accordingly, the record supports the judge's finding that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike, notwithstanding that the strike additionally was based on the lawful execution of the extension agreement.

We also shall not disturb the judge's finding that Crown Cork violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on 25 September, the day after the strike began, when it threatened to discharge the striking employees. The discharge threat was premised on these employees' purported breach of the no-strike provision under the extension agreement.[7] The strike was based on unfair labor practices which were not subject to resolution by the applicable grievance provision.[8] Moreover, the strike was just one aspect of the ongoing, underlying dispute with respect to the representative status of SIU and Union Independiente's efforts to replace it. Accordingly, Crown Cork's threat to discharge employees pursuant to the no-strike provision was at its core an attempt to restrict the unit employees' selection of a bargaining representative. See generally NLRB v. Magnavox Co. of Tennessee, 415 U.S. 322 (1974), rehearing denied 416 U.S. 952 (1974). See also Servair, Inc., 265 NLRB 181 (1982), enfd. 726 F.2d 1435 (9th Cir. 1984). Accordingly we agree with the judge that this threat coerced employees' exercise of Section 7 rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1).[9]

In his decision, the judge also found that Crown Cork violated Section 8(a)(3) on 21 June when it transferred employee Esteban Arroyo from the first to the third shift. The judge supported this finding solely on the basis that the Respondent Employer's president, Arturo Diaz, conducted a meeting in August with members of Union Independiente at which they complained of alleged acts of discrimination. At the meeting, Diaz requested the opportunity to "fix everything up" and "put everything back to normal." The judge found that Diaz' statements during this meeting, and the subsequent reassignment of Arroyo back to the first shift, evidenced that the original transfer was discriminatory. In effect the judge has used employee complaints regarding shift changes, pay reductions, and job reclassifications, which employees had claimed were discriminatory, and the Respondent Employer's subsequent efforts to resolve these disputes as

[5] RCA Del Caribe, supra at 965.

[6] Chairman Dotson and Member Dennis did not participate in RCA Del Caribe and express no view here on whether that case was correctly decided. Absent a majority to overrule RCA Del Caribe, Chairman Dotson and Member Dennis consider themselves institutionally bound to apply that precedent in this case.

In view of our holding herein, it is immaterial whether the 12 August agreement was merely an extension of the expiring agreement without modification of benefits, as contended by the Respondents, or also served to increase benefits under the medical plan.

[7] This provision states as follows:

> During the life of this Agreement, the Company shall not order lockouts. During the life of this Agreement, the Union shall not cause or permit its members to cause, nor shall the Union members for any reason participate in a strike, nor a slowdown, nor a sitdown or permanent strike within the plant, nor any other type of interference with the Company's production. The employees involved in any conduct prohibited by this Article shall be submitted to disciplinary measures up to and including discharge.

[8] The scope of the bargaining agreement's grievance provision is limited to cover only disputes over the application or interpretation of the terms of the contract.

[9] Member Dennis concurs in the majority's finding that the 24 September strike was a protected unfair labor practice strike despite the contractual no-strike clause. Under Arlan's Department Store of Michigan, 133 NLRB 802, 807 (1961), "only strikes in protest against serious unfair labor practices should be held immune from general no-strike clauses." In Member Dennis' view, the Company's unfair labor practices were "serious" within the meaning of Arlan's. In addition to discharging employee Padua, vice president of the rival union, the Company engaged in numerous other acts in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3), all designed to prevent its employees from exercising their fundamental Sec. 7 right to select the rival union as their bargaining representative.

an admission by the Respondent Employer that its earlier actions were discriminatory. These settlement efforts however were primarily designed to prevent an anticipated strike by the unit employees, and were not admissions of misconduct for the Respondent Employer's earlier actions with respect to Arroyo. On the contrary, the evidence supports Crown Cork's claim that Arroyo's initial transfer, one of several such transfers which occurred on 21 June, was based on the need to train certain employees as a result of the recent introduction of a third shift during the previous month.[10]

In his decision, the judge also found that Crown Cork violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act when it "terminated" Miguel Carrasquillo as leadman on 19 July and reduced his pay 25 cents per hour. We agree. However, as a remedy for this violation the judge recommended only that Carrasquillo be made whole for lost wages as a result of this incident. In adopting the judge's decision in this regard, we shall modify his remedy with respect to Carrasquillo's demotion and in addition shall require Crown Cork to reinstate Carrasquillo to his former leadman position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position. Walker Electric Co., 219 NLRB 481 (1975).

Finally, in light of our agreement with the judge that the strike herein was an unfair labor practice strike, and that the strikers had offered to return to work prior to the representation election conducted on 29 October 1976,[11] we adopt his finding that unfair labor practice striker replacements were ineligible to vote, that on this basis 190 challenged ballots be sustained, and that the remaining challenged ballots are not determinative. Accordingly, we adopt his finding that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Union Independiente, and that it should be certified as the collective-bargaining representative in the appropriate unit.

[10] Although the judge used the same rationale as that noted above in finding that the transfer of employee Guadalupe Rivera on 19 July from the first to the third shift also violated Sec. 8(a)(3), we agree with the judge's ultimate conclusion that this transfer was discriminatorily motivated. To support this conclusion, we rely on evidence that on 19 July Crown Cork engaged in a number of adverse changes affecting job assignments and wage rates which were found to have violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. Further, although other employees were reassigned shifts on 19 July, the conclusion that Rivera's transfer was discriminatory is additionally supported by our adoption of other concurrent acts of discrimination against Rivera whereby Crown Cork departed from its longstanding practice of allowing Rivera to work during his vacation period, and by its belated decision to eliminate his leadman's pay, notwithstanding his demotion from that position had occurred 16 months before.

[11] The election was conducted pursuant to a Decision and Direction of Election. The tally was 118 for Union Independiente and 15 for SIU; there were 213 challenged ballots, a sufficient number to affect the results of the election.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Crown Cork de Puerto Rico, Inc., Carolina, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or changing the rates of pay, classifications, shifts, and other terms and conditions of employment of its employees because of their union activities and sympathies.

(b) Refusing to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers upon their unconditional offer to return to work.

(c) Threatening summarily to discharge unfair labor practice strikers.

(d) Threatening to discharge employees because of their union activities and sympathies.

(e) Creating the impression of surveillance of the union activities of its employees.

(f) Soliciting employees to encourage other employees to support SIU.

(g) Prohibiting in-plant meetings of Union Independiente while permitting such meetings of SIU.

(h) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act to engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid and protection, or to refrain from such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Heriberto Padua and all the employees who engaged in a concerted work stoppage and strike commencing 24 September 1976, immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, discharging, if necessary, other employees who have been hired in their places.

(b) Make Heriberto Padua whole for any loss of pay he may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against him by payment to him of a sum of money equal to that which he normally would have earned as wages from the date of the discrimination, in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), less his net earnings during such period, with interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

(c) Make whole all the employees who engaged in a concerted work stoppage and strike commencing 24 September 1976, for any losses they may have suffered by reason of the failure and refusal to reinstate them to their former jobs, or to substantially equivalent positions, upon their unconditional offer to return to work, by payment to each of them of a sum of money equal to that which that employee normally would have earned as wages from the date of the discrimination to the date of the Respondent's offer of reinstatement in the manner set forth in paragraph (b) above.

(d) Make Guadalupe Rivera, Rigoberto Febres, Miguel Carrasquillo, and Luis Nigaglioni whole for the losses they suffered as a result of the unlawful reductions in their rates of pay in the manner set forth in paragraph (b) above.

(e) Make Guadalupe Rivera whole for any loss of pay he may have suffered as a result of the refusal to allow him to work during his scheduled vacation in 1976 in the manner set forth in paragraph (b) above.

(f) Offer Miguel Carrasquillo immediate and full reinstatement to his former position as leadman, with all duties and functions or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position.

(g) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge of Heriberto Padua and notify him in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used as action against him in any way.

(h) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(i) Post at its Carolina, Puerto Rico facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the notice, in English and in Spanish, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(j) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint filed against the Respondent S.I.U. de Puerto Rico, Caribe y Latinoamerica a/a S.I.U. of North America, AFL–CIO is dismissed in its entirety.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the challenges to the ballots of the 190 strike replacements in Case 24–RC–5775 are sustained and that Case 24–RC–5775 is severed from the unfair labor practice proceeding.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots in Case 24–RC–5775 have been cast for Union Independiente de Trabajadores de la Crown Cork and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Crown Cork de Puerto Rico, Inc. at its factory located in Carolina, Puerto Rico, but excluding all office clerical employees, sales personnel, professional employees, drivers, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

> To organize
>
> To form, join, or assist any union
>
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
> To act together for other mutual aid or protection
> To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discharge or change the rates of pay, classifications, shifts, and other terms and conditions of employment of employees because of their union activities and sympathies.

WE WILL NOT threaten summarily to discharge unfair labor practice strikers and WE WILL NOT refuse to reinstate them upon their unconditional offer to return to work.

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge employees because of their union activities and sympathies.

WE WILL NOT create the impression of surveillance of the union activities of employees.

[12] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL NOT solicit employees to encourage other employees to support SIU.

WE WILL NOT prohibit in-plant meetings of Union Independiente while permitting such meetings of SIU.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights under the National Labor Relations Act.

We will offer Heriberto Padua, and all the employees who engaged in a strike commencing 24 September 1976, and who offered, unconditionally, to return to work on 22 October 1976, immediate and full reinstatement to their former or equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, discharging, if necessary, other employees who have been hired in their places.

WE WILL make Heriberto Padua, and the striking employees, whole for any loss of earnings because of the discrimination against them, plus interest.

WE WILL expunge from our files any reference to the discharge of Heriberto Padua and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future action against him.

WE WILL make Guadalupe Rivera whole for any loss of pay as a result of our refusal to allow him to work during his scheduled vacation in 1976, and WE WILL make Guadalupe Rivera, Rigoberto Febres, Miguel Carrasquillo, and Luis Nigaglioni whole for the reductions in their rates of pay, plus interest.

WE WILL reinstate Miguel Carrasquillo to his position as leadman or, if that postion no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to any seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

CROWN CORK DE PUERTO RICO, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

IRWIN H. SOCOLOFF, Administrative Law Judge. On charges filed October 29 and December 27, 1976, and February 17, 1977, by Union Independiente de Trabajadores de la Crown Cork (the Independent Union), against Crown Cork de Puerto Rico, Inc. and S.I.U. de Puerto Rico, Caribe y Latinoamerica a/a S.I.U. of North America, AFL–CIO (Respondent Employer and Respondent Union), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 24, issued a consolidated complaint dated March 23, 1977, alleging violations by the Respondents of Section 8(a)(1), (2), and (3), Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act. Respondents, by their answers, denied the commission of any unfair labor practices. On March 24, 1977, the Regional Director Ordered that Case 24–RC–5775 be consolidated with the above-referenced unfair labor practice cases for purposes of hearing and decision with respect to the issues raised by the Petitioner's objections to conduct affecting the results of the election in that case, as well as disposition of 213 challenged ballots.

Pursuant to notice, a trial was held before me in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, on April 25 and May 16 through May 26, 1977, at which all parties were represented by counsel and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce evidence. Thereafter, the parties filed briefs which have been duly considered.

On the entire record in this case, and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Crown Cork de Puerto Rico, Inc. is a Delaware corporation engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of metal cans, bottle caps, and related products at its plant located in the city of Carolina, Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. During the year preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Respondent Employer purchased goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were transported and delivered to its plant directly from points in the United States located outside the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. I find that Crown Cork de Puerto Rico, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

S.I.U. Puerto Rico, Caribe y Latinomerica a/a S.I.U. of North America, AFL–CIO and Union Independiente de Trabajadores de la Crown Cork are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent Union S.I.U. was certified on August 17, 1973, as the collective-bargaining representative of the Crown Cork production and maintenance employees working at the Carolina, Puerto Rico plant. Thereafter, Crown Cork and S.I.U. entered into a collective-bargaining agreement, containing union-security and checkoff provisions, which was to expire on August 12, 1976. In May 1976, certain employees formed the Independent Union and on May 17 that union filed a representation petition seeking an election among the unit employees (Case 24–RC–5775). On August 2, the Regional Director issued a Decision and Direction of Election in the contractual unit.

Immediately preceding the scheduled expiration of their contract, on August 12, Respondent Employer and Respondent Union executed a "Stipulation" whereby they agreed to extend the contract, including the union-security and checkoff provisions, until such time as the representation proceedings before the Board were resolved "in a final and binding manner." The stipulation further provided for increased payments by Crown Cork to the contractual "Welfare Plan," from $6.50 per week per employee to $55 per month per employee, because of "the substantial increase there has been in the cost of medical-hospital expenses."

In this proceeding, the General Counsel contends that, by the execution and maintenance of the contract extension, including its union-security and checkoff provisions, notwithstanding the existence of a real question concerning representation, the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (2) and Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act. In addition, the General Counsel asserts that Respondent Employer engaged in unfair labor practice conduct by making coercive statements to employees; creating the impression of surveillance of employees' union activities; engaging in acts of assistance to the S.I.U. and changing employee shifts, rates of pay, job classifications, benefits and working conditions in order to encourage support for the S.I.U. and discourage support for the Independent Union.

On September 24, 1976, Respondent Employer discharged employee Heriberto Padua, an officer of the Independent Union. Thereafter, the great majority of the unit employees engaged in a strike. The General Counsel contends that Padua was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act and that the ensuing strike, in protest of the discharge and other unlawful acts of Crown Cork, was an unfair labor practice strike. Respondent Employer claims that Padua was discharged for cause and that the strike was economic in nature. Also at issue is whether Crown Cork violated the Act by threatening to discharge the strikers and by refusing to reinstate them on their unconditional offer to return to work.

An election was conducted on October 29, 1976. The Independent Union's objections to conduct affecting the results thereof are based, principally, on the alleged unfair labor practices summarized above. Resolution of the challenged ballot issues revolves almost entirely about a determination of the eligibility to vote of strike replacements.

B. Facts and Conclusions

1. Formation of the Independent Union and Respondent Employer's knowledge thereof

In early May 1976, at a meeting attended by 90 to 100 individuals (of the 130 to 140 unit employees then working for Respondent Employer), the Independent Union was formed. The following employees were elected as members of the board of directors:

Luis Nigaglioni	President
Heriberto Padua Soto	Vice President
Rigoberto Febres	Secretary
Miguel A. Carrasquillo	Treasurer
Pedro Diaz	Sub-Secretary
Esteban Arroyo	Sub-Treasurer
Ruben Feliciano	Member-at-large
Armando Vegerano	Member-at-large
Francisco Fernandez	Member-at-large

Two days later, Nigaglioni and Fernandez met with Respondent Employer's supervisor, Personnel Manager Ana Aponte, and advised her of the formation of the Independent Union and the identity of the members of the board of directors. Nigaglioni stated that the new union was formed because of a lack of service by the S.I.U. and employee dissatisfaction with the contractual medical plan. Aponte said that she would forward the information to the Crown Cork president, Arturo Diaz Cataldo.

As noted, the newly formed union filed a representation petition with the Board on May 17, 1976. Some 2 weeks later, President Diaz initiated a meeting with the members of the board of directors and assured them that he, Diaz, would work with whichever union won the election. In June, Diaz again met with the directors to express his anger about certain machinery breakage which, Diaz believed, had been caused by intentional acts.

2. Coercive statements; acts of assistance; discriminatory conduct

Employee Francisco Fernandez, a member of the board of directors of the Independent Union, testified that, in late May or early June, President Diaz approached him outside the plant and told him that there were some 15 or 20 workers who were "harming the plant." Diaz stated that those individuals, who he named, desired to remove the S.I.U. as bargaining representative despite the fact that that union was "working all right," and, therefore, he, Diaz, wanted to get those employees out of the plant. Diaz further stated that, in particular, he wanted to remove Independent Union President Nigaglioni from the plant. Fernandez also testified that, in late August, at the request of Supervisor Bernardo Matos, Fernandez met Diaz and Matos at a local restaurant. At that time, Fernandez asked Diaz why he, Fernandez, had been reassigned to the night shift. Diaz replied that Fernandez was one of the most important leaders at the plant and that the other workers would listen to him. Therefore, Diaz wanted Fernandez to encourage the night-shift employees to retain the S.I.U. When Fernandez said that, as a member of the Independent Union, he could not campaign for the S.I.U., Diaz stated that the newly formed union was "a bunch of Communists" and that Diaz' primary goal was "to get Nigaglioni out of the plant" because that employee had the entire plant in turmoil.

Respondent Employer's witnesses, Diaz and Matos, contradicted each other with respect to the foregoing incidents. Thus, Diaz denied that he had had any meetings outside the plant with Fernandez since 1974. Matos, an entirely confused and unreliable witness, confirmed the fact of the August meeting but claimed that no conversation occurred since, according to Matos, Fernandez left the meeting immediately after he arrived. Fernandez impressed me as a credible witness and I find that the conversations with Diaz occurred substantially as he testified. I conclude that Respondent Employer, through President Diaz, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by creating the impression of surveillance of employee-union activities and by threatening to discharge employees because of their support for the Independent Union. Crown Cork violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act by soliciting an employee to encourage other employees to support the S.I.U. rather than the Independent Union.

Fernandez further testified that, during the month of August, Plant Superintendent Francisco Gonzales summoned Fernandez from his home to the plant in order to receive a telephone call in Gonzales' office. The caller was Respondent Union's executive secretary, Suarez Lazu, who asked Fernandez to meet with the Union's president, Keith Terpe, at the S.I.U. officer. After completing the telephone conversation, Fernandez was informed by Gonzales that "it was all right, that he knew and Mr. Arturo Diaz Cataldo knew about this meeting and that I should go, that they would pay my day even if I was absent." Gonzales further stated that he and Diaz wanted Fernandez to help them "so that they do not get the S.I.U. out" and Gonzales reminded the employee that he, Fernandez, had been the spokesman for the S.I.U. in 1973, when that union was challenged by the Teamsters. Finally, Gonzales told Fernandez "that as long as I would help them, I was all right at the plant." Gonzales, in his testimony, denied that the above-related incident occurred.

Gonzales was not, in my judgment, a reliable witness. His testimony was, in certain instances, self-contradictory and inconsistent with his prehearing affidavit. Based on those factors, as well as demeanor impressions, I have assigned little weight to his testimony. I find, based on Fernandez' testimony, that Respondent Employer, by its plant superintendent, Gonzales, unlawfully assisted Respondent Union by encouraging Fernandez to visit the S.I.U. offices during working hours and without loss of pay.

Guadalupe Rivera was hired by Respondent Employer in 1967 as a first-shift fingerlift operator. In February 1974, he was promoted to the position of first-shift leadman and, as a result, was granted a 25-cent-per-hour wage increase. In March 1975, Rivera was reassigned to his former fingerlift operator position but, nonetheless, he continued to be paid at the leadman rate although he no longer performed those duties. On July 19, 1976, Rivera was suddenly transferred to the third shift (the night shift) and he ceased receiving leadpay (the 25 per cent per hour). About the same time, Respondent, contrary to its past practice of permitting Rivera to work during his scheduled vacation periods, and thereby earn double pay for those weeks, informed Rivera that he would be required to take a vacation. Rivera testified that when he saw Diaz about the vacation matter, in August, Diaz stated that "the law now required it." Diaz then handed Rivera a $100 check, as a loan, and stated that he knew that Rivera was "in sympathy" with the Independent Union. According to Rivera, Diaz further stated that the employees "should be careful, we should think it over carefully, not to let ourselves be led by bad leaders who could lead us down wrong paths . . . and that we were being advised by a Communist law firm; that he knew Mr. Escrebano and that that's why he was telling me this."[1] Diaz testified that he could not recall making the statements attributed to him by Rivera.

Based on Rivera's credited testimony, I find and conclude, as alleged in the complaint, that, in August 1976, Respondent Employer, through President Diaz, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by creating the impression of surveillance of the union activities of its employees. In addition, I reject Respondent's argument that its 1976 refusal to allow Rivera to work during his scheduled vacation period was based on the requirements of local law. Rivera was permitted to work during such periods in 1974 and in 1975 when the same law was in effect and, under its provision, allowing an employee to obtain an exemption from the law's requirements through the Puerto Rico Department of Labor. When Rivera saw Diaz about the matter, Diaz clearly related his position concerning the supposed requirements of the law to his claimed knowledge of Rivera's union sympathies. In light of that factor, and the absence of satisfactory explanation for Respondent's sudden change of its practice of permitting Rivera to work during scheduled vacation periods, I find and conclude that Respondent Employer, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, refused to allow Rivera to do so in 1976, and thereby earn double pay for that period, because of his Independent Union sympathies.

The General Counsel also contends that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act when it transferred Rivera to the third shift and ceased paying him 25 cents per hour leadpay. Likewise, it is asserted that when, on June 21, 1976, Respondent transferred employee Esteban Arroyo, a member of the board of directors of the Independent Union, from the first shift (where he had worked since the date of his hire, March 16, 1972) to the third shift, it did so for discriminatory reasons. It is also alleged that, on July 19, 1976, Respondent unlawfully reclassified and reduced the pay of Rigoberto Febres, the secretary of the Independent Union, and Miguel Carrasquillo, the treasurer.

For the 5-1/2-year period preceding July 1976, Febres worked for Respondent as a shipping and receiving clerk. On July 15, he received a letter from Personnel Manager Aponte, stating:

> As you are aware, the position of "Shipping & Receiving Clerk" is not negotiated by the collective bargaining agreement, this being a position of a confidential nature and which belongs to the office personnel.
> Our management is not interested in unionizing this position in a new contract and you being the person who for years have performed this position, you being a union member, we give you preference in case you want to become part of our office personnel.
> If you agree, we shall be pleased to give you the opportunity, otherwise, we shall be forced to give > you a new classification within the unionized positions which you are prepared to perform.

[1] Escrebano was one of the lawyers representing the Independent Union.

> We hope that you may see what is best for you and give us your answer, in writing, tomorrow, July 16, 1976, in the morning hours.
> If we don't receive a reply from you, we shall believe that you are not interested and we shall immediately proceed to reclassify you.

After reading the letter, Febres told Aponte, "I knew this was going to happen." Aponte replied, "This is the way they work over here." Febres requested additional time to consider the matter and that request was denied. When he then refused a changed status, he was, on July 19, assigned to the position of fingerlift driver and his pay was reduced by 25 cents per hour. Despite the assigned reason for Respondent's action with respect to Febres, he was, shortly after his reclassification, replaced as shipping and receiving clerk by a bargaining unit employee who was not required to terminate his union membership. I find and conclude that Febres' reclassification, and the pay reduction which he suffered, were in patent violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

Also on July 19, Miguel Carrasquillo was "terminated" as a leadman, and reduced in pay by 25 cents per hour. According to the notice furnished to Carrasquillo by Respondent Employer, the reason for the action was a "change in company policy." When Carrasquillo questioned his supervisor, Les Inwood, about the matter, he was told that "it was because the company no longer trusted me." Inwood refused Carrasquillo's request for greater specificity. At the hearing, Gonzales testified that he decided to reclassify Carrasquillo, and reduce his pay, because of customer complaints about the cans produced on the third shift. However, Carrasquillo worked as a leadman on the first shift. In light of Respondent's knowledge of Carrasquillo's position as an officer of the Independent Union; its demonstrated animus; the shifting and pretextual reasons which it has advanced to explain the demotion of that employee and the timing of the action, I find and conclude that Carrasquillo's reclassification and pay reduction were accomplished in violation of the Act.

Luis Nigaglioni was hired by Crown Cork in May 1973, as a general worker. Beginning November 1975, he was paid at the rate of $4.30 per hour. On May 17, 1976, following his election as president of the Independent Union, Nigaglioni was reclassified from "general worker" to "production worker," an action which is described in Respondent Employer's personnel files as a "promotion." However, Nigaglioni testified that, despite the classification change, his duties remained the same. When Nigaglioni received his paycheck on August 15, he discovered that his hourly rate had been reduced to $4.05. Nigaglioni then approached Gonzales about the matter and was told that his pay was reduced by order of Diaz. Gonzales further told Nigaglioni: "Luis, so that no more problems arise, I don't want any more meetings at the plant because Mr. Arturo doesn't want them." Nigaglioni then asked if his pay had been reduced because of the Independent Union and Gonzales replied that he did not want any more problems at the plant, and he would not allow any more meetings of the Independent Union there.

Gonzales, in his testimony, attributed the August pay reduction of Nigaglioni to a change of duties which allegedly occurred on May 17, when Nigaglioni was, as noted, reclassified. Since Nigaglioni credibly testified that the May 17 "promotion" did not result in any change of duties, I find that the assigned reason for the pay reduction does not explain that action. Rather, in all the circumstances, including Diaz' statement to Fernandez that he, Diaz, wanted to "get Nigaglioni out of the plant" because of his activities on behalf of the Independent Union, I find and conclude that Respondent Employer reduced Nigaglioni's rate of pay in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. I further conclude that Gonzales, in orally promulgating a rule prohibiting in-plant union meetings which, as stated, applied only to the Independent Union, acted in violation of Section 8(a)(2).

In late May or early June, Francisco Fernandez, a member of the Independent Union's board of directors, was transferred from the first shift to the second shift. According to Gonzales' uncontradicted testimony, the transfer occurred at the request of the employee. I thus conclude that the allegation of a discriminatory transfer of Fernandez has not been sustained. In August, Fernandez, then in charge of the storeroom, was assigned an additional duty, to mop the storeroom floor. Previously, that task, among others, was performed by unit employees, on an optional basis, on Saturdays, at a time-and-a-half rate. The record evidence suggests that Fernandez' work activities were not materially changed by the additional assignment and, on that basis, I find no violation of the Act in that regard.

In early August, Harold Abrams, director of industrial relations of Crown Cork and Seal Co., Respondent Employer's parent corporation located in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, arrived in Puerto Rico in order to verify rumors that the unit employees would strike upon the expiration of the contract. On August 4, Abrams and Diaz met with the members of the board of directors of the Independent Union and Abrams began the meeting by asking the employees if there would be a strike. Febres stated that there would not be a strike if "the discrimination" against the supporters of the Independent Union, including shift changes, pay reductions, and job reclassifications, stopped. Diaz assured the directors that, if given 2 weeks time, he would "fix everything up" and "put everything back to normal." Upon receiving that representation, the directors agreed not to strike.

On August 16, Esteban Arroyo was returned to the first shift. At the hearing, Diaz testified that that action was taken, "absolutely, as a result of the agreements reached at the August 4 meeting. On the other hand, Gonzales testified that he alone was responsible for the original transfers of Arroyo and Guadalupe Rivera, from the first shift to the third shift, and that the purpose was to place experienced employees on the third shift while new hires were trained on the first shift. According to Gonzales, when the training period was completed, he, Gonzales, without consulting Diaz, returned Arroyo and

Rivera to the first shift. I think it more likely, consistent with Diaz' testimony, that those employees were returned to the first shift in compliance with Diaz' agreement with the Independent Union to end "the discrimination" and "put everything back to normal." I find and conclude that the original transfers of Arroyo and Rivera, from the first shift to the third shift, were in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. I also conclude that Rivera's loss of leadpay at the time of his unlawful transfer to the third shift, and fully 16 months after he ceased performing the duties of a leadman, was accomplished for discriminatory reasons.[2]

3. The contract extension

In the weeks preceding the August 12 execution of the contract extension, Diaz met with Respondent Union's executive secretary, Suarez Lazu, on some three occasions. According to Lazu's testimony, he insisted, at those meetings, on increased Crown Cork contributions to the medical plan as a condition to signing the "Stipulation." Thus, Lazu testified that larger contributions were needed in order to meet the increased costs of maintaining the plan. Lazu later testified that such increased contributions were sought from all participating employers in order to improve the plan and eliminate problems. In any event, after initially resisting the substantially increased payments sought by the S.I.U., Respondent Employer relented.

There is considerable record evidence that, indeed, at least some increase in the size of employer payments to the plan was necessary in order to maintain then existing levels of medical service. While I accept Respondents' arguments in that regard, I find them nondeterminative of the issue before me.

On August 13, Respondent Employer posted on its bulletin board a letter, signed by President Diaz, which stated, inter alia:

> Yesterday morning, I was asked by my superiors to sign a STIPULATION extending the duration of the AGREEMENT between the COMPANY and the UNION until such date as the National Labor Relations Board resolved in a binding manner the cases pending consideration.
> The main reason for this decision was maintaining in effect for the membership the protection that the agreement gives them and particularly the Medical Plan, for which the Company agreed to pay a big increase, so that the service could be amplified. [Emphasis added.]

Also on August 13, Diaz met with Febres and Fernandez and showed them a copy of the "Stipulation." Febres stated that the members of the Independent Union would not accept it and he demanded that the "Stipulation" not be used as a basis for continuing the deduction of dues in favor of Respondent Union. Diaz shrugged and walked out.[3]

On August 27, Respondent Union circulated a leaflet among the unit employees, signed by Suarez Lazu, which stated, inter alia:

> Hereby we are informing all employees of Crown Cork as well as their relatives, that the Medical Plan of the S.I.U. continues to cover everyone like before. Moreover, we are making great efforts to improve the plan at all places where the employees of Crown Cork go to receive services.

The General Counsel contends that Respondents, by negotiating and executing the "Stipulation" and, thereafter, enforcing and administering the collective-bargaining agreement, including its union-security and check-off provisions, at a time when a valid question concerning representation had been raised, violated the neutrality requirements mandated by the Board's holding in Shea Chemical Corp., 121 NLRB 1027 (1958). Respondents assert that their actions were privileged under an exception to Shea Chemical, enunciated by the Board in G&H Towing Co., 168 NLRB 589 (1967). There, the Board held:

> Unlike the situation in Shea Chemical Corporation, relied on by the General Counsel, where the employer and a union with a claimed card majority negotiated a "complete two-year collective bargaining agreement," the parties here only extended the termination date of their existing contract from time to time so as to avoid a lapse in contractual relations while awaiting resolution of the representation question. No changes were made in wages or any other contractual terms during this period. There is no evidence that the parties engaged in any bargaining, or even introduced preliminary proposals. Thus, consistent with what we said in Shea, G&H pursued a neutral course by neither "bargaining collectively with the incumbent or any other union" nor "refusing to permit the incumbent union to continue administering its contract. . . ." We find no violation in the extensions of G&H's contract with the Seafarers.

Contrary to Respondents' contentions, I conclude that the instant matter does not present a G&H Towing type case. Here, preceding and following the execution of the contract extension, Respondent Employer engaged in numerous acts of support and assistance to Respondent Union, in violation of Section 8(a)(2), and acts of coercion and discrimination, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the statute. The extension of the contract with the favored union occurred in that context, and, thus, cannot be viewed as a neutral act designed to avoid a lapse in contractual relations. Moreover, Respondent Employer and Respondent Union, at a time when both knew that employee dissatisfaction with the medical plan

[2] Gonzales testified that he reduced Rivera's pay pursuant to a memorandum he received from Comptroller Jose Laureano. However, that memorandum, dated 2 days after the pay reduction, does not even address the subject of leadpay.

[3] One week later, Febres complained to Aponte about the continuation of dues deductions. She replied, "I got orders from upstairs."

was one of the primary reasons for the formation of the Independent Union, agreed to a doubling of Employer contributions to that plan and then informed the employees that the increased payments would permit improvement of the plan and amplified service. I thus conclude, regardless of the then existing financial needs of the welfare plan, that the contract extension, including the agreed-upon change in contractual terms, was designed to assist the S.I.U. By extending and enforcing the contract, as modified, beyond August 12, 1976, Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3), (2), and (1) and Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act.

4. The Padua discharge

Heriberto Padua was employed by Crown Cork as a quality control inspector from November 11, 1970, until he was discharged on September 24, 1976. In May 1976 he was elected vice president of the Independent Union. In late July or early August Padua posted a notice of an out-of-plant Independent Union meeting on the plant bulletin board. That notice was removed by Supervisor J. A. La Santa who told Padua that, by order of Diaz, employees were not permitted to post notices at the plant. Thereafter, La Santa filed a written report of the incident.

Respondent Employer asserts that Padua was discharged on September 24, due to "insubordination," a "lack of respect toward a superior," and a "threat of physical harm to a superior" arising out of an incident between Padua and Supervisor Jose David Carrasquillo which occurred on September 23. For the reasons stated below, I find and conclude that Respondent Employer discharged Padua because of his Independent Union activities, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

About 5:30 a.m. on September 23, as Padua was walking toward production line 1, a "jam" developed at line 2. Supervisor Carrasquillo yelled at Padua to go to line 2. According to Padua's credited, corroborated testimony he then told Carrasquillo that "there is no reason for him to shout at me like that. If he knew anything about cans he would have realized that that was mechanics' work and not of the inspector. And I told him, if you want me to help you, I can help you so that you will know about cans. I've been doing this work for 6 years and I can help you. But since you show a negative attitude, there is no way to help you do a better job." Carrasquillo accused Padua of insulting him and Padua responded, "Well, I'm telling you the truth, that you do not know anything about cans. I know about cans. If you feel insulted, that's the truth, that you don't know about cans." Carrasquillo told Padua that if he, Padua, persisted in telling Carrasquillo that, Carrasquillo would report him. Padua then said to Carrasquillo that "if the truth hurt him, to go ahead and make a report."[4] Later, Carrasquillo instructed Padua to report to Gonzales' office at 2 p.m. on the same day. When Padua did so, he was told by Gonzales that "he did not have my case, that Arturo Diaz Cataldo had my case . . . and he had nothing to do with it." Padua was then instructed to report at 11 a.m., the next day, to see Diaz.

Padua arrived at the plant at 11 a.m. on September 24 but was told by the security guard to wait outside. At 1 p.m., Supervisor Carrasquillo appeared and attempted to hand an envelope to Padua. Padua said that he would not accept it before seeing Gonzales. Carrasquillo and Padua then went to Gonzales' office, where "almost all the supervisors of the plant" had been gathered, and Gonzales read, and then handed to Padua, a discharge letter, stating:

> We have studied the report of Supervisor Carrasquillo to Mr. Francisco Gonzales, Superintendent of this Plant, in relation to your behavior during your work shift that ended the 23rd of September 1976.
> We have found that at 5:30 in the morning of that day, you engaged in three violations to the Rules of Conduct of this company, namely:
> 1) Insubordination
> 2) Lack of respect toward a superior
> 3) Threat of physical harm to a superior
> For the above reasons, I must notify you that we have decided to terminate you immediately from your employment at this company.
> Enclosed is your discharge check covering all your earnings with this company.[5]

When Padua asked Gonzales for an opportunity to explain what had happened, Gonzales refused and told Padua that Carrasquillo was a respectable man and Respondent Employer believed him, and believed the version of events contained in his report. Padua again asked for an opportunity to explain and was told by Gonzales that "There is nothing to explain. Just hand in your identification card and go out of the plant as soon as possible."

Although initially denied by Gonzales, the record evidence clearly reflects that Respondent Employer conducted no investigation of the Padua-Carrasquillo incident beyond a reading of the report submitted by Carrasquillo. Yet, there were many witnesses to that altercation. Diaz testified that he decided to discharge Padua pursuant to Crown Cork's July 22, 1975 rule providing for immediate dismissal of an employee who is disrespectful to a supervisor. However, in the past, first offense infractions of that rule have resulted in warning letters, not discharge, and then only after full investigation.

In light of Respondent Employer's knowledge of Padua's leading role in the formation and activities of the Independent Union; its demonstrated animus; its contemporaneous discrimination against other supporters of the Independent Union; the absence, contrary to past practice, of an investigation of the incident relied on to support the discharge and the refusal to permit Padua to explain his version of events, I conclude that Respondent

[4] At the time of the incident, Carrasquillo was a newly hired supervisor. Thereafter, according to Diaz, he was discharged for "failing to make the grade."

[5] The report filed by Carrasquillo with Gonzales stated that Padua had threatened to tear Carrasquillo's head off if he, Carrasquillo, filed a report.

seized upon the Carrasquillo-Padua incident as a pretext to justify a discharge motivated solely by union considerations and, thus, violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

5. The strike

On August 1, 1976, at a membership meeting of the Independent Union, the board of directors was authorized to call a strike if Respondent Employer continued to engage in discriminatory conduct. Among the specific cases of discrimination discussed at that meeting were those of Arroyo, Febres, Rivera, anc Carrasquillo.

On September 24, immediately after the Padua discharge, the strike began. Fernandez testified:

> When they came out, part of the protest was the discharging of Padua and the discrimination that was going on in the plant and the extension of the contract that they had done.

The following legends appeared on the picket signs carried by the strikers:

> We Do Not Want the SIU
> For a Repressive Employer, a Combative Employee
> Employer Breaks the Law—Violates the Law
> United Workers May Never Be Vanquished
> Angel, Padua, Nigaglioni—We Are With You

One day after the strike began, on September 25, Crown Cork sent telegrams to all striking employees stating that unless they immediately returned to work, they were subject to summary discharge for violation of the no-strike clause of Respondent Employer's contract with the S.I.U., as extended and modified by the "Stipulation."

On October 22, Nigaglioni delivered to Crown Cork the following application for reinstatement on behalf of all striking employees:

> Union Independiente de Trabajadores de Crown Cork, on behalf of all the employees presently on strike due to the unfair labor practices engaged in by the Company you preside, offers the immediate return to work of all its members presently on strike.
> UITCC guarantees the security of all the facilities, equipment and personnel of the Company from any intentional acts engaged in by its members.
> If our offer is not accepted, the strike will continue to all effects.

Some 27 strikers received telegrams from the employer, in February 1977, and thereafter, advising them to report to work. The remaining 105 strikers have not been offered reinstatement.

I find and conclude that the strike was, from its inception, an unfair labor practice strike. By threatening summarily to discharge unfair labor practice strikers, Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. By refusing to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers upon their unconditional offer to return to work, Crown Cork violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.[6]

6. The election

It is undisputed that, on October 29, the day of the election, Respondent Employer placed a camera in the area of its second floor administrative offices, pointed at and visible to a group of peacefully striking employees who were waiting in line to vote. The General Counsel contends that such a photographing of peacefully striking employees, absent a showing of justification, is unlawful (citing Gopher Aviation, 160 NLRB 1698 (1966)).

In Gopher, the Board held that the photographing of pickets is unlawful when undertaken for purposes of surveillance, but not when it is designed to serve a legitimate end. In the instant case, during the period between the formation of the Independent Union and the onset of the strike, Crown Cork experienced an unusual amount of breakage of parts and machinery vital to its production operations. Its industrial engineer, Vincent Dumbrowsky, credibly testified that those occurrences were not due to normal wear and tear but, apparently, were caused by intentional acts. Shortly after the strike began, Crown Cork's director of security, Edward Freskin, found an unfinished silencer for a 38 caliber weapon "jammed" into a lathe. In these circumstances, I find that Respondent Employer has demonstrated justification for use of its camera as a security measure. Accordingly, I find no violation of the Act in that regard.

7. Postelection assistance

On February 17, 1977, Respondent Employer reinstated 25 of the 132 striking employees.[7] On that day, the returning strikers were sent to the cafeteria where they were addressed by Gonzales, Plant Manager Pino and Respondent Union's agent, Delegate Enrique Rivera. Employees Eduardo Barreto and Angel Luis Andino testified that, at the meeting, Pino told the group that he was interested in production and not unions. Further, that while he, Pino, knew that the gathered employees belonged to the Independent Union, "the Union in the plant" was the S.I.U. Pino then introduced Rivera as the S.I.U. delegate and the latter spoke about the S.I.U. medical plan. One week later, Andino asked Pino why union dues were being deducted from his paycheck. Pino replied that the incumbent union was the S.I.U. and "in order to be able to work at Crown Cork, one had to belong to that union or be a part of management."

Neither Pino nor Rivera were called to testify about the events of February 17. Gonzales, in his testimony, could not recall being present at the meeting. Based on the testimony of Barreto and Andino, I find and conclude that, on February 17, Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(2) of the Act by informing the returning strikers that Respondent Union was their representative.

[6] Respondent Employer contends that the October 22 application for reinstatement was not unconditional. I find nothing in the wording of the application which would support that position. Nor were there contemporaneous acts or statements by the strikers at odds with the unconditional nature of their offer to return to work.

[7] On April 22, two more strikers were recalled.

Crown Cork again violated Section 8(a)(2) when, 1 week later, Pino repeated that assertion to Andino.

On May 10, 1977, Respondent Employer made a loudspeaker announcement directing all of its first-shift employees to attend a meeting in the cafeteria at 2 p.m. The employees were further instructed not to punch out their timecards until the meeting ended. At the ensuing meeting, attended by all the first-shift employees, the group was addressed by Supervisor Victor Morales, Delegate Enrique Rivera, and Guillermo Ryan, an employee of the Human Resources Development Institute.[8] Barreto and Andino testified that Morales and Ryan admonished the employees about absences. Then, Rivera distributed certain cards, bearing the S.I.U. name, which Ryan described as entitling the bearer to obtain medical services and, at certain stores, make discount purchases.

Morales, Ryan, and Rivera were not called as witnesses. Based on the testimony of Barreto and Andino, I find and conclude that, on May 10, 1977, Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(2) of the Act by instructing its employees to attend a meeting of Respondent Union, held at the plant during working hours, at which, in the presence of Crown Cork representatives, the S.I.U. announced the availability of additional benefits.

8. The objections

The Independent Union's objections 5 and 6 to conduct affecting the results of the election held on October 29, 1976, rely upon the unfair labor practice conduct found hereinabove to have occurred between the date the petition was filed and the date of the election. Since, during the critical period preceding the election, the Employer and the Intervenor engaged in unfair labor practice conduct in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (2), and (3) and Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act, I conclude that there is merit to the objections. If a majority of valid ballots had not been cast for the Petitioner, as determined, infra, the election would properly be set aside.

9. The challenges

The tally of ballots served on the parties after the election showed that 346 ballots were cast, of which 118 were for the Independent Union, 15 for the S.I.U. and there were 213 challenged ballots, a sufficient number to affect the results of the election. There were 190 challenges by the Petitioner on the ground, inter alia, that the voter was an unfair labor practice strike replacement and, therefore, ineligible to vote. Since it is undisputed that those voters were hired after the commencement of the September 24 strike as replacements for the strikers, and since I have found that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike, I conclude that the challenges to their ballots should be sustained. The remaining 23 challenged ballots are not determinative of the results of the election.[9] Since a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for the Independent Union, it should be certified as the collective-bargaining representative in the unit described in the Decision and Direction of Election.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondents set forth in section III above, occurring in connection with Respondent Employer's operations described in section 1 above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3), (2), and (1) and Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act, I shall recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Crown Cork de Puerto Rico, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce, and in operations affecting commerce, within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Union Independiente de Trabajadores de la Crown Cork, and S.I.U. de Puerto Rico, Caribe Y Latinoamerica a/a S.I.U. of North America, AFL–CIO are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By negotiating, executing, maintaining, and enforcing an extension and modification of their collective-bargaining contract beyond August 12, 1976, including union-security provisions, notwithstanding the existence of a real question concerning representation, Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3), (2), and (1) and Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act.

4. By discharging Heriberto Padua; reducing the wage rates of Guadalupe Rivera, Rigoberto Febres, Miguel Carrasquillo, and Luis Nigaglioni; changing the work shifts of Guadalupe Rivera and Esteban Arroyo; reclassifying Rigoberto Febres and Miguel Carrasquillo; refusing to permit Guadalupe Rivera to work during his scheduled vacation in August 1976, and refusing to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers upon their unconditional offer to return to work, Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

5. By soliciting an employee to encourage other employees to support Respondent Union rather than the Independent Union; encouraging an employee to visit Respondent Union's offices during working hours and without loss of pay; orally promulgating a rule prohibiting in-

[8] That organization, which "works with" the AFL–CIO, referred to Respondent Employer, in September and October 1976 strike replacements. Before and during the strike, Ryan was frequently seen at the plant attending to S.I.U. business.

[9] Respondents contend that at an October 14 meeting of the parties at the Board's offices in Hato Rey, the Independent Union, by oral agreement with the other parties and the Board agent, waived its right to challenge the ballots of strike replacements hired on or before October 8. Based on the testimony of Paul Schactor, an attorney for the Independent Union, I find that, at that meeting, the Independent Union maintained its position that the strike replacements were not eligible to vote. It agreed only that if those replacements were found eligible to vote at all, October 8 was the eligibility cutoff date.

plant union meetings which, as stated, applied only to the Independent Union; informing its employees that Respondent Union was their representative and instructing its employees to attend a meeting of Respondent Union, held at the plant during working hours, Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(2) of the Act.

6. By creating the impression of surveillance of the union activities of its employees; threatening to discharge employees because of their support for the Independent Union and threatening summarily to discharge unfair labor practice strikers, Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

IRWIN H. SOCOLOFF, Administrative Law Judge. On February 7, 1979, I issued my decision in this proceeding, finding that Respondent Employer and Respondent Union had engaged in activities violative of the National Labor Relations Act. Included among the statutory violations found to have been committed by Respondent Employer was its discharge on September 24, 1976, of Heriberto Padua, the vice president of the Independent Union. Thereafter, on July 19, 1979, the Board issued its Decision and Order Remanding "for credibility findings with respect to the Padua-Carrasquillo incident on September 23," which preceded the discharge.

As noted at page 13, lines 36–37 of my initial decision, my findings concerning the September 23, 1976 incident, between Padua and his immediate supervisor, Jose David Carrasquillo, were based on the "credited, corroborated testimony of Padua." Thus, Padua impressed me as an entirely forthright and honest witness and, in reliance on his testimony, as corroborated by Luis Pomar and Miguel Carrasquillo, observers of the event in question, I find that the September 23 incident transpired as reported in my initial decision. More particularly, I find that Padua did not use obscene language or threaten to tear the supervisor's head off. Jose David Carrasquillo's testimony to the contrary is not credited as I found Carrasquillo a confused witness who exhibited an uncertain memory of the events of September 23. I thus conclude that the later report filed by Carrasquillo with the plant superintendent, Francisco Gonzales, concerning the foregoing incident, contained, in part, false accusations against Padua. As Carrasquillo was, at the time, a statutory supervisor, knowledge of the falsity of those accusations is attributable to Respondent. In light of that factor, and for the reasons stated at page 15 of my initial decision, I again conclude that the Padua discharge was in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.[1]

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

[1] At fn. 4 of its decision, the Board observed that Plant Superintendent Francisco Gonzales testified that, after receiving the report from Carrasquillo, he attempted to investigate the matter by questioning employee Roberto or Gilberto Rodriquez about the exchange between Carrasquillo and Padua. Rodriquez did not testify at the hearing. For the reasons stated at p. 6, ll. 25–28 of my initial decision, I did not find Gonzales a credible witness. Moreover, with respect to this particular testimony, it must be noted that, in his pretrial affidavit, Gonzales claimed to have questioned an employee named Isandre, and no one else, about the Padua-Carrasquillo incident. Likewise, Gonzales' testimony at the hearing that, after receiving the report from Carrasquillo, he asked that supervisor for the names of witnesses to the incident, is inconsidtent with Gonzales' admission in his affidavit that he did not do so. Accordingly, I discredit Gonzales' contrary testimony and I again conclude that Respondent Employer conducted no investigation of the Padua-Carrasquillo incident beyond a reading of the report submitted by Carrasquillo.

Case 22–CA–8121

14 December 1984

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 27 August 1980 the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in the above-entitled proceeding.[1] On 26 January 1981 the Board issued an unpublished Order Denying Motion and Amending Decision and Order, in which it amended footnote 1 of the original Decision and Order to clarify the basis on which it affirmed the administrative law judge's credibility findings,[2] but denied the Respondent's motion for reconsideration in all other respects.

Thereafter, the Respondent filed a petition for review of the Board's Decision and Order in the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, and the Board filed a cross-application for enforcement. Subsequently, the Board filed a motion in the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals requesting permission to withdraw the record so that it could reconsider its Decision and Order in light of that court's decision in Red Oaks Nursing Home v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503 (1980), and its order in Edward A. Utlaut Foundation v. NLRB, 657 F.2d 272 (No. 80–1903 May 27, 1981), and to address certain other matters. On 9 November 1981 the court granted the Board's motion, and by letter dated 30 November 1981 the Board invited the parties to submit statements of position. The Respondent filed a statement of position and a motion to reopen the record.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the record as a whole in light of the Respondent's statement of position, its motion to reopen the record,[3] and the applicable decisions of the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals and makes the following findings.

As fully set forth in the judge's decision, which the Board adopted in its initial Decision and Order, the Union began an organizational campaign among the Respondent's employees in May 1977. By 18 May the Union had obtained at least 30 valid authorization cards among the 47 employees in the unit found appropriate. On that date the Union requested recognition from the Respondent and filed a petition with the Board for a representation election. By 6 June the Union had obtained and submitted to the Respondent a petition signed by 46 unit employees requesting the Respondent to recognize the Union as their bargaining representative. The election was held 5 August and resulted in 13 votes for and 31 against the Union. Between 22 June and the date of the election both the Respondent and the Union engaged in certain misconduct.

The Board found that the Respondent's misconduct constituted unfair labor practices which were so serious as to warrant the issuance of a bargaining order. It also found that the Union's misconduct did not affect the propriety of a bargaining order. On further consideration we are persuaded that some of the unfair labor practice findings were erroneous and that the remedial bargaining order was improvidently granted.

1. The Board affirmed the judge's finding that through a series of letters and oral statements to employees the Respondent engaged in "thinly veiled threats that because of unionization the Respondent would take action [consisting of plant closure, job loss, and other reprisals] to the detriment of the workers' employment." 251 NLRB at 1608. The theme of the letters was that the Union had a record of strikes and violence and could make no positive contribution to the employees or the Company. Although emphasizing the possibility of strikes and their doleful consequences at other plants, the Respondent's letters frankly admitted that despite the Union's past participation in strikes the Company did not know whether the Union would strike at this plant. In depicting the results of strikes at other companies, the Respondent cited

[1] 251 NLRB 1597.

[2] Although the unpublished Order directed that the initial Decision and Order be printed as amended, the amendment was omitted from the Board volume in which the Decision and Order subsequently was printed. Therefore, we hereby publish the footnote to be substituted for fn. 1: "The Respondent has exceptd to certain credibility findings made by the judge. Administrative Law Judge John F. Corbley died 7 November 1978, after the hearing in the instant case had closed before him, but before the issuance of a decision. Thereafter Chief Administrative Law Judge Thomas N. Kessel designated Administrative Law Judge Sidney J. Barban to prepare and issue a decision based on the record made before Judge Corbley. It is the Board's established policy to attach great weight to an administrative law judge's credibility findings insofar as they are based on demeanor. However, in contested cases the Act commits to the Board itself the power and responsibility of determining the facts as revealed by a preponderance of the evidence, and the Board is not bound by the administrative law judge's findings of facts, but bases its findings on a de novo review of the entire record. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). Judge Barban's credibility findings are based on factors other than demeanor, and, in consonance with the Board's policy set forth in Standard Dry Wall Products, supra, we have independently examined the record in this case. We find that there is no basis on the record in this proceeding for reversing his credibility determinations or his findings of fact based thereon."

[3] Because of our reconsideration of the existing record below, we find it unnecessary to conduct a further hearing.

instances in which the strikes ended with little or no economic gain to the employees and other instances in which the plants closed or production lines moved to other locations. However, reasons other than unionization or strikes were presented to explain the loss of jobs. Thus, the judge credited testimony that Executive Vice President Lee told employees that a sister company had moved to Puerto Rico after a strike which had resulted in the company's loss of government contracts. He told employees that he hoped such a loss of government contracts would not make the Respondent move to Texas.

We are often called on to determine whether statements warning employees of the adverse consequences of unionization are lawful predictions or unlawful threats. The statements made here were by and large neither. They were factual statements showing that there were possible harmful results from unionzation to be weighed against the possible benefits to employees. The Respondent informed the employees that the Union had taken employees out on strike at other companies and that certain adverse consequences had ensued; that strikers received no pay or benefits during a strike and could be permanently replaced; and that should the Union win the election and make unreasonable bargaining demands it would either have to drop those demands or strike. The Respondent did not tell employees if they selected the Union it would close the plant or take other reprisals. Instead, the Respondent specifically reassured employees it would bargain in good faith with the Union if it won the election and would take no reprisals in that event. We therefore find that in its overall preelection campaign the Respondent properly avoided threatening reprisals. See J. J. Cassone Bakery, 247 NLRB 220, 221–222 (1980).

However, the Respondent departed from the overall pattern in one instance and communicated to some employees what they reasonably might have regarded as a threat. This occurred when Production Manager Autera told employees that if the Union came in and a strike ensued the Respondent might move to Texas. These comments crossed the line of permissible persuasion as to the consequences of unionization because they were unaccompanied by any statement of objective facts that conveyed the Respondent's belief that such consequences were beyond its control. Ann's Laundry & Dry Cleaners, 268 NLRB 1013, 1016 (1984).[4]

Respondent also unlawfully solicited employees' grievances, promised them that without the Union their problems would be rectified within 9 months, and coercively interrogated two employees. These few 8(a)(1) violations, however, do not warrant imposing a bargaining order in the circumstances presented here.

The question which must be faced here, as in all cases in which an employer has rejected a union's valid majority showing by way of authorization cards and committed unfair labor practices, is whether "the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 614–615 (1969). This question must be answered in light of the facts of each case and with due regard for the principle that generally a secret-ballot Board-conducted election is the preferred method of ascertaining employee choice. Id. at 602. Therefore, we look not only to the seriousness of the unfair labor practices, but also to their extensiveness "in terms of their past effect on election conditions and the likelihood of their recurrence in the future." Id. at 614.[5]

Here, ascertainment of the causal relationship between the Respondent's unfair labor practices and the Union's election loss is difficult. For the preelection campaign was characterized not only by certain coercive statements by the Respondent but also by an extensive lawful campaign by the Respondent and by a countervailing campaign by the Union that included both permissible and impermissible tactics. The Union's misconduct consisted of the following threats to employees: (1) that if the Union lost the election it would file charges and hold up the proceedings indefinitely, impliedly with the aid of Members of this Board and Congressmen whom it "could control"; (2) that "nothing would get across" a union picket line and any male employee who attempted to cross might never see his wife again; (3) that if certain employees campaigned for the Respondent "there will be no holds barred" and "when the [Union] got in, positive, [those employees] were gone"; and (4) that another employee who said he would not vote

[4] Chairman Dotson would not view Autera's statements in isolation from the general tenor of the Respondent's message to employees—the truthful information that adverse consequences such as a plant relocation could follow a strike. Therefore, he would not find that Autera's comments constituted a thrat. See NLRB v. Shenanigans, 723 F.2d 1360, 1367–1368 (7th Cir. 1983).

[5] Although the Board's concern at the time it withdrew this case from the Seventh Circuit was the inadequacy of its articulated analysis of the need for a bargaining order under that court's holdings in Red Oak Nursing Home and Utlaut Foundation, supra, we cannot fail to take cognizance of the Seventh Circuit's recent decision in NLRB v. Shenanigans, 723 F.2d 1360 at 1370–1372, in which it vigorously reaffirmed those principles cited in the text above that dictate caution against too freely dispensing with elections.

for the Union would find it difficult to continue working for the Respondent no matter how the vote went and the Union would blacklist him and had other "ways of dealing" with him. These threats could have backfired on the Union and caused employees to want to have nothing further to do with it.[6] To the extent that employees were not adversely influenced by the Union's misconduct, they may have been influenced by the Respondent's legitimate arguments concerning the possible adverse effects of voting the Union in as bargaining representative. With all these factors operating on the employees' choice, it would be little more than speculation to conclude that the Respondent's unfair labor practices were the factor that decisively tipped the scales.[7]

The unfair labor practices were not extensive when considered as part of the general preelection atmosphere created in part by the parties' campaigning. Their precise effect on the election being uncertain, still less confidently could we predict from the nature of the violation that they are likely to recur.[8] The interrogations and the single implied threat of plant relocation were committed by individuals relatively low in the Respondent's management hierarchy.[9] Although their conduct is imputable to the Respondent in that employees reasonably may have believed that it was authorized by management, there is no evidence that what they did or said had specific authorization from higher levels. Those involved in unlawfully soliciting grievances and promising benefits were high management officials, the Respondent's vice president and an executive vice president of Sangamo Weston Inc., of which the Respondent is a division. Thus, their conduct may be presumed to be a calculated company tactic. However, neither the Respondent nor Sangamo Weston Inc. (which has been involved in many union organizing campaigns and in collective bargaining) has been found to have committed any unfair labor practices other than in the instant case. Given its history of apparent willingness to abide by the requirements of the Act although presented with opportunities to do otherwise, we see no indication that the Company will become a recidivist.

Finally, we note that the Respondent committed but one "hallmark" violation (Production Manager Autera's threat of plant removal to some employees) and relatively few "non-hallmark" violations (soliciting grievances, promise of benefit, and coercive interrogations). See NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, 632 F.2d 208, 212–213 (2d Cir. 1980). Accordingly, and for all of the above reasons, we find that the General Counsel has failed to establish that the Respondent unlawfully refused to recognize and bargain with the Union. We further find that the General Counsel has failed to establish that the Board's traditional remedies are inadequate to erase the effects of the Respondent's few unfair labor practices and ensure a fair election.[10] For similar reasons we find that the Respondent's unfair labor practices do not warrant a broad cease-and-desist order. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). Accordingly, we shall rescind our previous Order and substitute one that conforms to the findings and conclusions set forth above.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, EMR Photoelectric, a Division of Sangamo Weston Inc., Princeton Junction, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening to move its operations because its employees engage in activities on behalf of a labor organization or support a labor organization.

(b) Directly or indirectly promising employees benefits or improvement in their working conditions for the purpose of inducing employees not to join, remain members of, or otherwise support a labor organization.

(c) Soliciting employee grievances or complaints with an implied promise of in proving employee working conditions or granting benefits for the purpose of inducing employees not to join, remain

[6] Chairman Dotson would find that the Union's outrageous conduct was far more serious than that allegedly engaged in by the Respondent and in and of itself precludes granting a bargaining order.

[7] On objections filed by the Union, the Regional Director set aside the election and the Board affirmed his findings and recommendations directing a second election. However, the Regional Director dismissed the petition in the representation proceeding on issuance of the complaint in the instant case. Our observations concerning the actual effect of the unfair labor practices on the election outcome do not contradict the Board's finding in the representation case that the Company's conduct reasonably tended to interfere with the employees' freedom of choice in the election.

[8] We attempt to ascertain the likelihood of recurrence from the circumstances surrounding the original unfair labor practices and such other events as may have probative value. The Respondent's restraint from additional unfair labor practices during the pendency of this case tells us little about its likelihood to commit new unfair labor practices in the future.

[9] Ronald Klukososki, a leadman in the Respondent's employ who interrogated two employees, was not found to be a supervisor but to be an agent with apparent authority to speak for management. Production Manager Tony Autera, who made the remarks about possibly moving to Texas, was a subordinate to the general manager of the plant involved here. His supervisory status after January 1978 is in doubt.

[10] We therefore find it unnecessary to reach the Respondent's contentions that a bargaining order should be denied due to employee turnover and changes in managment, and we deny the Respondent's motion to reopen the record as moot. See fn. 3, above.

In concurring in the denial of the bargaining order remedy, Member Dennis relies solely on the reasoning set forth in the paragraph to which this footnote is appended and not on any reasons set forth earlier in this decision.

members of, or otherwise support a labor organization.

(d) Coercively interrogating employees concerning their union membership, sympathies, or activities or those of other employees.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, to form, join, or assist the Union, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any or all such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its operations in Princeton Junction, New Jersey, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed as to alleged violations of the Act not found hereinabove in this decision.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT threaten to move our operations because our employees engage in activities on behalf of or support International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, AFL-CIO-CLC, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT directly or indirectly promise employees benefits or improvement of working conditions for the purpose of inducing employees not to join, remain members of, or otherwise support a labor organization.

WE WILL NOT solicit employee grievances or complaints with an implied promise of improving working conditions or grant benefits for the purpose of inducing employees not to join, remain members of, or otherwise support a labor organization.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate employees concerning their union membership, sympathies, or activities or those of other employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

Case 19–CD–434

14 December 1984

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed 17 July 1984 by Hoffman Construction Company (Hoffman), alleging that the Respondent District Council and Respondent Local 751 violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing or requiring Hoffman and Contract Glass, Inc. (Contract) to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO, Local 1140 (the Glaziers). The hearing was held 5 September 1984 before Hearing Officer John W. Cunningham.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

Hoffman, an Oregon corporation, is engaged as a general contractor at its facility in Portland, Oregon, and at various jobsites in several States, where it annually purchases and receives goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which are shipped to it directly from States other than Oregon. Based on the foregoing, we find that Hoffman is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Contract, a Washington corporation, is engaged at its Redmond, Washington facility and various jobsites in the States of Washington and Alaska as a glazing contractor on commercial jobs. During the past year Contract has provided services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of Washington. From the foregoing, we find that Contract is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

It is not disputed, and we find, that Glaziers is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

A collective-bargaining agreement between International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Ironworkers and the National Contractors Association (NCA), of which Hoffman is a member, states that "[t]he Employer recognizes the Association as the sole and exclusive bargaining representative for all employees employed on . . . work coming under the jurisdiction of the Association." It contains a union-security clause and a grievance and arbitration procedure, as well as provisions regarding wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and both Respondents District Council and Local 751 pursued claims based on the contract. We find that Respondent District Council and Respondent Local 751 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. Mac Towing, Inc., 262 NLRB 1331 (1982).

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

Hoffman is the general contractor on the SOHIO Petroleum building in Anchorage, Alaska. It subcontracted the installation of glazed aluminum window frames, aluminum window walls, entrance doors, and miscellaneous metal work to Contract. Contract, using a system of its own design, prefabricated the glazed windows, pre-cut the compensating channels (that portion of the window assembly directly attached to the building), and had the material shipped to the jobsite. The job superintendant for Contract arrived at the job on 1 March 1984 and work on Contract's portion of the job began on 12 March or shortly thereafter.

As noted above, Hoffman, through its membership in NCA, has a collective-bargaining agreement with the Ironworkers International. Contract has a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 118 of the Painters and Allied Trades Union, but entered into a prehire agreement with Glaziers prior to the commencement of this job. Contract began its work with two employees from its home location and with persons hired through the Glaziers' hall. At times as many as seven glaziers were used on the job. By the time of the hearing the installation of the aluminum frames was over 99 percent complete.

[1] All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to adduce evidence bearing on the issues. The attorney for Respondents District Council and Local 751 stated that he was appearing specially, therefore he did not join in any of the normal stipulations; however, he did participate in the hearing, presenting a witness and cross-examining others. Hoffman filed a brief.

Around 12 March, when the material for the job arrived at the jobsite, Ernie Niece, Contract's job superintendent, was approached by a person later identified to him as the Ironworkers' steward on the job and asked if the metal belonged to Contract. When Niece replied that it did, the steward asked if Contract employees were going to install the metal. When Niece replied in the affirmative, the steward said that it was Ironworkers' work. When Niece countered that it was Glaziers' work, the steward said that he was going to see his business agents. Niece said, "Go ahead, do what you want" to which the steward replied, "Well, we could throw a sign on you."

About this time, Wayne Thomas, labor relations manager for Hoffman, received a telephone call from John Abshire, business manager of Respondent Local 751, expressing his concern about glaziers performing ironworkers' work. On 14 March a telegram was sent to Thomas stating, inter alia, that several requests for a meeting with Contract had failed and that Hoffman should take immediate action to resolve the issue before work began on 15 March.

Sometime after that LeRoy E. Worley, general organizer and president of Respondent District Council, called Thomas. The conversation was in the same vein as the earlier conversation between Abshire and Thomas. Shortly after this conversation Thomas received a letter from Worley dated 30 March which made a formal request for a copy of Hoffman's subcontract with Contract, asserting the request was necessary because of Hoffman's subcontracting of work which the District Council claimed was within its jurisdiction.

On the same date Worley also sent a letter to Thomas stating that he was instituting the grievance procedure concerning the subcontracting to Contract. Worley alleged the basis of the grievance was "the flagorant [sic] method of subcontracting this work in such a manner that the Ironworkers will not have an opportunity to perform their traditional work."

On 3 April Thomas replied to Worley with a letter asserting that Contract, the independent employer who had made the assignment of work, was not a party to the District Council's contract and, therefore, Hoffman questioned whether an arbitration to which Contract was not a party would be dispositive of the District Council's claim. Thomas went on to suggest that Worley contact the Glaziers to see if they would be willing to comply with past decisions of the Jurisdictional Disputes Board referred to in the District Council's contract.

On 15 May the following telephone message was received in Thomas' office in his absence:

> Will picket Thurs AM 17th all N.W. sites with Ironworkers. Pickets will say "Failure to process grievances of Ironworkers."

The next day Thomas called Worley who confirmed that he had made the call and said that he just wanted to get Thomas' attention.

Although Hoffman contested the arbitrability of the grievance, the grievance machinery proceeded and a hearing was set for 23 July. On 17 July Hoffman filed the instant charge. On 24 July the attorney for the Respondents sent a letter to the attorney for Hoffman asserting that no jurisdictional dispute was involved, but rather a dispute concerning the interpretation and application of the subcontracting clause of the agreement between Hoffman and the District Council, which should be arbitrated.

A hearing was held on the grievance in late August at which Hoffman raised the issue of arbitrability and asked the arbitrator to defer to the Board's processes. Briefs on the arbitration were not due until 3 weeks after the hearing herein.

Contract continued to perform the work with employees represented by the Glaziers and has not employed any employees represented by the Respondents on this project.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the construction, installation, and preparation of certain metal frames for glass and the installation of glass into the metal frames at the SOHIO Alaska Petroleum Company headquarters building in Anchorage, Alaska.

C. Contentions of the Parties

Hoffman, the only party to submit a brief, contends that the work in dispute should be awarded to employees represented by the Glaziers, citing employer preference, industry practice, economy and efficiency of operation, the past practice of Contract, and the skills of the glaziers.

The Glaziers contends that the work in dispute should be awarded to employees it represents because of their skills, area practice, employer preference, and economy and efficiency of operation.

Contract contends that the work in dispute should be awarded to employees represented by the Glaziers because of the glaziers' skills, economy and efficiency of operation, practice in the Anchorage area, and its collective-bargaining agreements with Glaziers and with other locals of International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO.

District Council and Local 751, although denying the jurisdiction of the Board on unspecified constitutional and due process grounds, appeared specially at the hearing and urged (1) mootness because the work in dispute is "99.9%" finished, (2) the nonexistence of a jurisdictional dispute because District Council and Local 751 never made a demand on Contract for the work in dispute, (3) the appropriateness of deferral to an arbitrator's decision on a grievance by the Respondents against Hoffman claiming a violation of a subcontracting clause in the collective-bargaining agreement between Ironworkers and NCA which binds Hoffman and the Respondents, and (4) the lack of any threats concerning the assignment of the work.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

There is no contention here that there is an agreed-on method for the voluntary resolution of the dispute inasmuch as the Respondents deny the existence of any dispute with Contract. In any event, Contract has not agreed to be bound by the revised Plan for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes in the Construction Industry. The Respondents do claim that the Board should defer to the grievance-arbitration procedure on their claim of a violation by Hoffman of a subcontracting clause in their agreement. Inasmuch as Contract is not a party to the collective-bargaining agreement between Ironworkers and Hoffman, and has not agreed to be bound by it, we find that there is no agreed-on method for resolution of the dispute and we decline to defer to the grievance-arbitration machinery of that agreement. Stage Employees IATSE (Metromedia), 225 NLRB 785, 787–788 (1976).

As to the mootness contention, the Board has long held that a jurisdictional dispute is not moot, in spite of the completion of the work involved, where there is evidence of similar disputes in the past or there is nothing to indicate that such disputes will not arise in the future.[2] The record is clear that glazing contractors will continue to install the type of work in dispute in the future in the Anchorage area and that the Respondents will continue to assert jurisdiction over the work involved. There is a real likelihood, therefore, that similar disputes will arise in the future. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is not moot.

As to the nonexistence of a demand on Contract by the Respondents, it is clear that an attempt to force the indirect assignment of work from employees of one employer (Contract) to employees of another (Hoffman) is within the reach of Section 8(b)(4)(D). Electrical Workers IBEW Local 3 (Western Electric), 141 NLRB 888, 894 (1963), enfd. 339 F.2d 145 (2d Cir. 1964). As for the alleged lack of a threat in support of any demand for the work in dispute, the Board has held that the filing of grievances, as here, against employers who have no control over the assignment of the work (i.e., Hoffman) applies indirect pressure on an employer in the assignment of the work, Pulp & Paper Workers Local 194 (Georgia Pacific), 267 NLRB 26 (1983), and is coercive within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(ii). Millwrights Local 102 (Frederick Meiswinkel, Inc.), 260 NLRB 972 (1982). In any event, there is unrefuted testimony that a steward of Respondent Local 751 threatened to "throw a sign" on Contract after claiming the disputed work.

As to the Respondents' attempt at the hearing to disclaim the work of Contract's employees, such tardy disclaimer is ineffective, particularly in light of the simultaneous pursuit of the grievance against Hoffman. See Laborers Local 910 (Brockway Glass), 226 NLRB 142, 143 (1976).

We find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreement

None of the labor organizations involved in this dispute has been certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of Contract's employees in an appropriate unit. The record does indicate that Contract has recognized Glaziers and currently has a collective-bargaining agreement with Glaziers covering the wages and working conditions of "all workmen . . . who are required to use any of the recognized tools of the trade covered by this Agreement," such being "tools and machines as is necessary in the performance of skilled glaziers and glass workers work." The agreement specifically includes the installation of metals related to storefront and window construction and unitized and prefabricated curtain wall systems. We therefore find that the collective-bargaining agreement is sufficient to cover the work in dispute. The record further indicates that Contract has no employees represented by the Respondents and has no collective bargaining with those Unions. Moreover, Contract is not a member of NCA with whom the Respondents maintain a collective-bargaining agreement. We therefore find that the factor of collective-bargaining agreements favors an award of the disputed work to the employees of Contract who are represented by Glaziers.

[2] Electrical Workers IBEW Local 581 (National Telephone & Signal), 223 NLRB 538 (1976), and cases cited at fn. 2.

2. Employer assignment, area practice, and preference

Contract has assigned the work in dispute to employees represented by the Glaziers and prefers this assignment. Other glazing contractors in the Anchorage area have used employees represented by the Glaziers to perform the same type of work on numerous occasions. Area practice, the employer's assignment, and Contract's preference all strongly favor the assignment to employees represented by the Glaziers.

3. Relative skills

Employees performing glazing work who are represented by the Glaziers are required to complete an apprenticeship program or to demonstrate their ability to perform glazing work which requires working to tolerances of one-eighth inch, handling glass by "feel" to prevent damage, an ability developed only through experience, and sealing joints of various types (glass to glass, glass to metal, metal to metal, metal to concrete) with various compounds to prevent moisture invasion. Employees represented by the Ironworkers do not work to such close tolerances. We find that this factor favors the award of the work to employees represented by the Glaziers.

4. Economy and efficiency of operations

It is more efficient to use a crew composed only of employees represented by the Glaziers rather than a composite crew composed of some employees represented by the Glaziers and some employees represented by the Ironworkers, or a crew composed of employees represented by the Ironworkers working under the supervision of Contract's superintendent and job foreman who are skilled in the glazing trade. This factor favors the award to employees represented by the Glaziers.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by Glaziers Local 1140 are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the collective-bargaining agreement between Contract and Glaziers, employer assignment, area practice, employer preference, relative employee skills, and economy and efficiency of operation. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO, Local 1140, not to that Union or its members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of Contract Glass, Inc. represented by International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO, Local 1140, are entitled to perform construction installation and preparation of certain metal frames for glass and the installation of glass into the metal frames at the SOHIO headquarters building project in Anchorage, Alaska.

2. Ironworkers District Council of the Pacific Northwest and International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Ironworkers, AFL–CIO, Local 751, are not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force Contract Glass, Inc. to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, Ironworkers District Council of the Pacific Northwest and International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Ironworkers, AFL–CIO, Local 751, shall notify the Regional Director for Region 19 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing Hoffman Construction Company or Contract Glass, Inc., by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

State Bank of India and Local 6, International Federation of Health Professionals, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL–CIO. Case 2–CA–19487

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

Upon a charge filed by the Union on 8 March 1983[1] the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint 18 March against the Bank, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act. Copies of the charge and the complaint were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

The complaint alleges that on 23 February following a Board election in Case 2–RC–19372, the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Bank's employees in the unit found appropriate.[2] The complaint further alleges that since 17 March the Bank has refused to bargain with the Union. On 23 March the Bank filed its answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint.

On 5 April the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 14 April the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Bank filed a brief opposing the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

In its response to the Notice to Show Cause, the Bank contends that the Board should deny the Motion for Summary Judgment and dismiss the complaint in its entirety because: (1) the Bank is a direct instrumentality of the Government of India and therefore is not an "employer" as that term is defined in the National Labor Relations Act or, in the alternative, is an employer over which the Board, in its discretion, should not exercise jurisdiction; (2) the Bank's objections to the election in the underlying representation proceeding are valid; and (3) the Board denied the Respondent due process in the representation case by failing to hold a hearing on the Bank's objections and by failing to consider the entire administrative record which was before the Regional Director in that case. Should the Board fail to dismiss the complaint, the Bank requests that the Board order a hearing on its objections or at least make a de novo review of the entire administrative record that was before the Regional Director.

The General Counsel asserts that all material issues have been previously decided. We agree with the General Counsel.

The record, including the record in Case 2–RC–19372, discloses that an election was held on 2 September 1982 pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows that of 83 eligible voters, 43 cast valid votes for and 34 against the Union; there were no challenged ballots. After conducting an investigation of the Bank's objections, the Regional Director on 15 October 1982, issued his Report recommending that the Bank's objections be overruled. The Bank filed exceptions to the Regional Director's Report. On 23 February the Board found no merit in the Bank's exceptions and certified the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Bank's employees in the stipulated unit.[3]

By letter dated 4 March the Union noted its certification by the Board and demanded that the Bank bargain with it. By letter dated 17 March the Bank's attorney notified the Union that the Bank considered the Board's certification of the Union to be wrong and that it would therefore decline to bargain with the Union. The Bank has refused at all times since 17 March to bargain with the Union.

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered and previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances, a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues that were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding.[4]

All issues raised by the Bank were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding. The Bank does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered and previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege any special circumstances that would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation pro-

[1] All dates are 1983 unless otherwise noted.

[2] Official notice is taken of the record in the representation proceeding, Case 2–RC–19372, as the term "record" is defined in Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 8, as amended. See LTV Electro Systems, 166 NLRB 938 (1967), enfd. 388 F.2d 683 (4th Cir. 1968); Golden Age Beverage Co., 167 NLRB 151 (1967), enfd. 415 F.2d 26 (5th Cir. 1969); *Intertype Co. v. ceeding.[5] We therefore find that the Bank has not raised any issue that is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Bank is a financial institution organized under the laws of India and licensed to do business in the State of New York, with a place of business at 460 Park Avenue, New York, New York. Annually, in the course and conduct of its business operations, the Respondent derives gross revenues in excess of $1 million, and it engages in interstate financial transactions in excess of $100,000 from its New York place of business.

We find that the Bank is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Certification

Following the election held 2 September 1982 the Union was certified 23 February 1983 as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by the Employer at its 460 Park Avenue, New York, New York facility including tellers, clerks, clerk-typists, messengers, bookkeepers, receptionists, secretaries, and machine operators, but excluding all officers, managerial and professional employees, confidential employees, India-based temporary and other temporary employees, maintenance employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Union continues to be the exclusive representative under Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. Refusal to Bargain

Since 4 March the Union has requested the Bank to bargain, and since 17 March the Bank has refused. We find that this refusal constitutes an unlawful refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By refusing on and after 17 March to bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in the appropriate unit, the Bank has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist, and to bargain on request with the Union, and, if an understanding is reached, to embody the understanding in a signed agreement, and to provide the Union on request information necessary for collective bargaining.

To ensure that the employees are accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of the certification as beginning the date the Respondent begins to bargain in good faith with the Union. See Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817 (1964); Burnett Construction Co., 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, State Bank of India, New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with Local 6, International Federation of Health Professionals, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

---

[5] In addition to its claim that the Board incorrectly failed to grant its exceptions in the underlying representation case, the Bank contends that the Board does not have jurisdiction over it because it is a direct instrumentality of the Government of India and therefore it is not an "employer" as that term is defined in the Act. The Board rejected this argument in State Bank of India, 229 NLRB 838 (1977), and that decision is controlling here. See also State Bank of India, 262 NLRB 1108 (1982).

The Respondent further contends that the Board denied it due process in the underlying representation proceeding because the Board did not have before it statements of witnesses on which the Regional Director relied in reaching his decision. We find no merit in this contention. See Frontier Hotel, 265 NLRB 343 (1982).

Member Dennis finds it unnecessary to rely on Frontier Hotel in rejecting the Respondent's due process contention. She relies instead on the failure of the Respondent's evidence, taken as true, to warrant setting aside the election.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit on terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement, and provide the Union, on request, information necessary for collective bargaining:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by the Employer at its 460 Park Avenue, New York, New York facility including tellers, clerks, clerk-typists, messengers, bookkeepers, receptionists, secretaries, and machine operators, but excluding all officers, managerial and professional employees, confidential employees, India-based temporary and other temporary employees, maintenance employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Post at its New York, New York facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

Upon a charge filed by the Union 26 May 1983[1] the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint 20 July against the Bank, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. Copies of the charge and the complaint were duly served on the parties to this proceeding.

The complaint alleges that about 28 April the Respondent, without notice to or bargaining with the Union, granted a wage increase to unit employees effective retroactively to 1 April. On 2 August the Respondent filed its answer to the complaint admitting in part and denying in part the allegations of the complaint.

On 17 October the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 19 October the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Bank filed a response.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

In its response to the Notice to Show Cause, the Bank contends that the Board should deny the Motion for Summary Judgment and dismiss the complaint in its entirety because: (1) The Bank is a direct instrumentality of the Government of India and therefore is not an "employer" as that term is defined in the National Labor Relations Act or in the alternative is an employer over which the Board in its discretion should not exercise jurisdiction; (2) there is now pending before the Board a related Motion for Summary Judgment which presents a threshold issue testing the underlying certification; and (3) the Respondent promised the wage increase to its employees in October 1982 and the increase was given as of a date the Bank traditionally has granted salary increases.

In his Motion for Summary Judgment, the General Counsel asserts that the Bank is raising issues which were raised and determined or could have been raised and determined in the underlying representation proceeding. We agree with the General Counsel.

In a letter dated 4 March, the Union noted its certification[2] by the Board and demanded that the Bank bargain with it. By letter dated 17 March, the Bank's attorney notified the Union that the Bank considered the Board's certification of the Union to be wrong and that it would therefore decline to bargain with the Union. The Bank has refused at all times since 17 March to bargain with the Union. On 28 April the Bank granted wage increases retroactive to 1 April to its employees in the unit described above without prior notification to, or consultation or negotiations with, the Union.

The Bank contends that the Board does not have jurisdiction over it because it is a direct instrumentality of the Government of India and therefore it is not an "employer" as that term is defined in the Act. The Board rejected this argument in State Bank of India, 229 NLRB 838 (1977), and that decision is controlling here.[3]

The Bank further contends that the pending technical 8(a)(5) proceeding would render premature a decision in the instant case. The Board has granted the Motion for Summary Judgment in Case 2–CA–19487, thereby rendering this contention moot.[4]

Finally, the Bank's contention that it gave the wage increase on the basis of an earlier promise is not a legally sufficient defense. Even accepting the Bank's evidence that the employees were promised a wage increase in April and that the timing of the increase was predetermined, the amount of the increase was discretionary and became a matter as to which the Bank was obligated to consult with the bargaining agent.[5]

We therefore find that the Bank has raised no issue which is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the basis of the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Company is a financial institution organized under the laws of India and licensed to do business in the State of New York, with a place of business

[1] All dates are in 1983 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] The Union was certified as the representative of the employees in the appropriate unit 23 February in Case 2–RC–19372.

at 460 Park Avenue, New York, New York. Annually, in the course and conduct of its business operations, the Respondent derives gross revenues in excess of $1 million and engages in interstate financial transactions in excess of $100,000 from its New York place of business. We find that the Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Unit and the Union's Representative Status

The following employees of the Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by Respondent at its 460 Park Avenue, New York, New York facility including tellers, clerks, clerk-typists, messengers, bookkeepers, receptionists, secretaries and machine operators, but excluding all officers, managerial and professional employees, confidential employees, India-based temporary and other temporary employees, maintenance employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit on 23 February, and the Union continues to be the exclusive representative under Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. The Refusal to Bargain

About 28 April the Respondent, without notice to or bargaining with the Union, granted a wage increase to employees in the unit.

We find the Respondent has, by this conduct, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSION OF LAW

By granting a wage increase to unit employees on 28 April 1983, without notice to or bargaining with the Union, the Company has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist and, on request, bargain collectively with the Union concerning wage increases for unit employees.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that the Respondent, State Bank of India, New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with Local 6, International Federation of Health Professionals, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the bargaining unit, by granting wage increases without prior notice to or bargaining with the Union, providing that the Respondent shall not be required to rescind any wage increase previously granted.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit concerning wage increases:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by Respondent at its 460 Park Avenue, New York, New York facility including tellers, clerks, clerk-typists, messengers, bookkeepers, receptionists, secretaries and machine operators, but excluding all officers, managerial and professional employees, confidential employees, India-based temporary and other temporary employees, maintenance employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Post at its facility in New York, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[1] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[1] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

Cases 31–CA–11999 and 31–CA–12381

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 13 January 1984 Administrative Law Judge Harold A. Kennedy issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the General Counsel has filed a brief in response.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions[1] and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[4]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, N & T Associates, Inc., d/b/a Aladdin Hotel and Casino, Las Vegas, Nevada, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Add the following as paragraph 2(b) and reletter original paragraphs 2(b) through (d) accordingly.

"(b) Expunge from our files all references to the layoffs, and notify all laid-off employees in writing that this has been done and that their layoffs will not be used as a basis for future action against them."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] On 19 August 1983 the General Counsel filed with the Board a motion to strike the Respondent's exceptions. In its motion the General Counsel asserts that the Respondent's statement of exceptions fails to meet the specificity requirements of Sec. 102.46(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. We hereby deny the motion. Member Hunter notes that when the Board's Office of the Executive Secretary received the Respondent's exceptions and brief it advised the Respondent's attorney that the brief exceeded the page limitation set forth in the Board's Rules and Regulations and that, as a result of this discussion and with the approval of the Executive Secretary's Office, the Respondent modified its brief. He further notes that during this discussion the Executive Secretary's office made no reference to the Respondent's statement of exceptions. In these unique circumstances, Member Hunter finds it appropriate to deny the General Counsel's motion to strike.

Member Zimmerman, while noting the lack of specificity of the exceptions themselves, nevertheless finds that the exceptions, coupled with the Respondent's brief and supporting arguments supplied therein, suffice to set forth those parts of the judge's decision that the Respondent claims are erroneous. Roofers Local 66 (Sierra Employees Assn.), 267 NLRB 601 (1983).

Chairman Dotson would grant the General Counsel's motion. He finds that the Respondent's statement of exceptions contests the legal conclusions of the judge but fails to except specifically to any part of the judge's decision or allege with any degree of particularity what error, mistake, or oversight the judge committed. Chairman Dotson finds that the Respondent's statement of exceptions is indistinguishable in terms of lack of specificity from the statements of exceptions the Board found did not comply with Sec. 102.46(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations in Ditch Witch of Illinois, 248 NLRB 452 (1980), and Aitoo Painting Corp., 238 NLRB 366 (1978). In light of the Board's heavy caseload and the corresponding need to narrow the issues for review so that the Board may expedite the review process, Chairman Dotson believes that the Board's minimal requirements for the filing of exceptions should be strictly enforced. Accordingly, Chairman Dotson adopts in the absence of exceptions, the findings, conclusions, and recommendations of the judge.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] Member Hunter adopts the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act based on certain threats made by Supervisor Dinino to employee Dalen. Member Hunter finds it unnecessary to pass on the judge's finding that such threats also violated Sec. 8(a)(4) of the Act since the finding of such additional violations would not materially affect the Order.

[4] The Order is modified to require that the Respondent expunge from its records evidence of its unlawful layoff of employees and that they be so notified in writing. See Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT lay off or otherwise discriminate against employees for filing or preparing grievances.

WE WILL NOT lay off or otherwise discriminate against employees for giving a statement to the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees for filing a grievance.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that laid-off employees will be recalled when one or more of them obtains other employment or when the recall rights of one or more of them expired.

WE WILL NOT tell an employee that he is on the "shit list," that he is on the "barbecue," or otherwise threaten him for going to the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer to Jess Atkinson, Harley Kerin, Maurice McBride, Joseph Washington, Ronald Achzet, George Nicholson, and Steven Dalen immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges; and WE WILL make them whole for any losses of earnings and benefits suffered because of our discrimination against them as a result of their union activity.

WE WILL expunge from our files all references to the layoffs, and notify all laid-off employees in writing that this has been done and that their layoffs will not be used as a basis for future action against them.

N & T ASSOCIATES, INC. D/B/A ALADDIN HOTEL AND CASINO

DECISION

HAROLD A. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on February 17 and 18, and May 2 and 3, 1983, on a consolidated complaint issued on October 28, 1982, by the Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board. The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) by laying off six employees on or about November 20, 1981; violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act by laying off another employee on or about August 6, 1982; and violated Section 8(a)(1) as a result of certain statements made by two of Respondent's officials. Certain of the statements also allegedly violated Section 8(a)(4).[1]

Respondent concedes jurisdiction, and many facts are not in dispute. Respondent admits in its answer a number of relevant matters, including the following:

1. Respondent N & T Associates, Inc., d/b/a Aladdin Hotel and Casino (Aladdin) is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. Respondent is a Nevada corporation with its principal place of business located in Las Vegas, Nevada, where it operates a hotel and casino. Respondent grosses over $1 million annually. Respondent annually purchases and receives goods or services valued in excess of $5,000 directly from suppliers located outside Nevada.

2. The Professional, Clerical and Miscellaneous Employees, Local Union 995, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At all times relevant, the following persons held the positions indicated and were agents and supervisors of Respondent: Connie Kennington, personnel director; John Grandi, director of building maintenance; and Chris P. Dinino, labor foreman.

4. During the relevant period Respondent was bound by a 1980–1983 collective-bargaining "Labor Agreement Between and Professional, Clerical and Miscellaneous Employees, Local 995" (G.C. Exh. 3).

5. A grievance was filed on or about November 12, 1981 (G.C. Exh. 2).

6. On or about July 30, 1982, certain employees prepared and submitted a grievance to the Union (which was later withdrawn).

7. On or about August 6, 1982, Respondent laid off six employees—Jess Atkinson, Harley Kerin, Maurice McBride, Joseph Washington, Ronald Achzet, and George Nicholson—and has not since that time recalled them.

8. On or about August 6, 1983, Respondent laid off Steven R. Dalen, Charging Party in Case 31–CA–12381, and has not since recalled him.

Respondent denies that the layoff of the six employees was unlawful—i.e., that they were laid off either because a grievance was filed in November 1981 or because they engaged in union or other protected concerted activities as alleged. Respondent also denies that its layoff of Dalen was unlawful—i.e., that he was laid off because of the July 1982 grievance, because of union or other protected concerted activities, or because employees filed charges or gave testimony under the Act as alleged.

Respondent also denies that it violated the Act through statements allegedly made by two of its supervisors and agents, John Grandi and Chris Dinino. Grandi allegedly made unlawful statements as follows:

1. On or about November 18, 1981, near the engineering section of Respondent's facility, impliedly threatened to lay off certain maintenance employees because of the filing of the [November 12, 1981] grievance and because one employee had engaged in other union or protected concerted activities (par. 8(a)).

2. On or about November 20, 1981, in Grandi's office at Respondent's premises, impliedly informed an employee that Respondent was laying off certain maintenance employees because of the union or other protected concerted activities of a particular maintenance employee (par. 8(b)(1)).

3. On or about November 20, 1981, informed an employee that Respondent would recall to work said maintenance employees when the employee who had engaged in union or other protected concerted activities had obtained other employment (par. 8(b)(2)).

4. In or during December 1981 or January 1982, a more precise date presently unknown to the General Counsel, in Grandi's office at Respondent's premises, during a discussion with an employee, impliedly refused to recall to work the maintenance employees laid off on November 2, 1981, and because a particular maintenance employee had filed the [November 12, 1981] grievance and because said employee had engaged in other union or protected concerted activities (par. 8(c)).

[1] A complaint issued on May 6, 1982, in Case 31–CA–11999, based on a charge filed by an individual named Harley Kerin on March 19, 1982. That complaint was superseded by the consolidated complaint that issued following the filing of charges by another individual, Steven R. Dalen, in Case 31–CA–12381 on August 9 and September 21, 1982.

Dinino allegedly made unlawful statements as follows:

1. On or about November 18, 1981, at Respondent's premises informed Respondent's maintenance employees that they were being laid off because an employee had filed numerous grievances during the past month (par. 9(2)(1)).

2. On or about November 18, 1981, in the hallway on the north end of Respondent's casino, informed an employee that Respondent had decided to lay off certain maintenance employees because one such employee had filed the [November 12, 1981] grievance and because said employee had engaged in other union or protected concerted activities (par. 9(a)(2)).

3. In early January 1982, a more precise date presently unkown to the General Counsel, during a telephone conversation with an employee, informed the employee that, as soon as the employee who had filed the [November 12, 1981] grievance had obtained a job with another employer, the other maintenance employees laid off by Respondent on November 20, 1981, would be recalled to work by Respondent (par. 9(b)).

4. In early March 1982, during a telephone conversation with an employee, informed the employee that Respondent intended to wait for 1 year before recalling to work the maintenance employees laid off on November 20, 1981, because the employee who filed the [November 12, 1981] grievance would then lose his seniority and recall rights under the terms of the Union's contract with Respondent (par. 9(c)).

5. On or about April 5, 1982, in back of Respondent's Performing Arts Theater, threatened an employee with layoff because Respondent believed that said employee had given testimony to the National Labor Relations Board in connection with Case 31–CA–11999 (par. 9(d)).

6. In or about mid-July 1982, and on other occasions, the exact dates being presently unknown to the General Counsel, at Respondent's premises, impliedly threatening an employee with discharge by stating that said employee was on the "shit" list and "on the barbeque," because Respondent believed that said employee had given testimony to the National Labor Relations Board in connection with Case 31–CA–11999 (par. 9(e)).

All of the alleged statements of Grandi and Dinino, according to the complaint, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The statements which Dinino allegedly made in April and in mid-July 1982 and on other occasions (par. 9(d) and (e)) also violated Section 8(a)(4) of the Act, according to the complaint, since they were made because employees filed charges or gave testimony under the Act (pars. 13(b) and (15)).

Background Summary of Case

Respondent operates a 1105 room hotel in Las Vegas, Nevada, which includes a casino, a cocktail lounge, a showroom, a theater for the performing arts, seven restaurants, and a convention center. Respondent's facilities, except for the hotel portion, were closed between July and October 1980. On October 1, 1980, Edward Torres became general manager and the facilities reopened. Respondent's maintenance department includes engineers, carpenters, painters, maintenance laborers, gardeners, and truckdrivers. Local 995 represents the maintenance laborers employed by Respondent. During all relevant times, John Grandi has been the chief engineer of the maintenance department; Chris Dinino has been the supervisor of the maintenance laborers and drivers; and Jess Atkinson was, until his layoff in November 1981, the union steward for the maintenance laborers.

Maintenance laborers move furniture and equipment, including slot machines, operate jack hammers and heavy equipment, dig trenches, remove carpeting, drive trucks and loaders, and perform general demolition and cleanup work. They also assist other trades by hauling their supplies, setting scaffolding, cleaning up, and hauling debris.

In October 1980, the maintenance department included nine laborers, plus the supervisor, Dinino. The laborers were Terry Atwood, Elmer Parolini, Robert Mayhall, Steven Dalen, Jess Atkinson, Joe Washington, Ronald Achzet, Harley Kerin, and Maurice McBride. Four new hires employed in 1981 were laid off in August of that year, but one of them, George Nicholson, was rehired 3 months later.

On November 20, 1981, Respondent laid off six laborers—Atkinson, Washington, Achzet, Kerin, McBride, and Nicholson. The laborers were laid off by seniority except Chris Dinino, who has been a management employee at all times relevant. Of the six, Atkinson had the most seniority. On August 6, 1982, Respondent laid off Steven Dalen, the laborer then working with the least seniority.

The General Counsel maintains that in addition to making various threats and statements, Respondent instituted the November layoffs in retaliation for a work assignment grievance which was filed by Jess Atkinson on November 12, 1981, and which was signed by Mayhall, Dalen, Atkinson, Washington, Achzet, Kerin, and McBride. The gist of the General Counsel's argument is that Respondent laid off five employees with less seniority than Atkinson in order to "get" Atkinson. The General Counsel also maintains that, in addition to threatening Dalen, Respondent laid off Dalen because in March 1982 Dalen provided an affidavit to the NLRB concerning the November layoffs and because he participated in a work assignment dispute on or about July 30, 1982. Respondent denies making the alleged statements and threats and maintains that the layoffs were part of a general reduction in the work force which was ordered by General Manager Torres without regard to, or knowledge of, the work assignment disputes or Dalen's contact with the National Labor Relations Board.

The Evidence

Thirteen witnesses testified, eight for the General Counsel, one of whom (Robert Mayhall) was recalled as a rebuttal witness, and five for Respondent, one of whom (Chris Dinino) was recalled as a surrebuttal witness. The testimony of the witnesses will be summarized in the order of their appearance.

Jess Atkinson, who was not employed at the time of the hearing, went to work at the Aladdin Hotel in April 1976. He said he became a full-time employee in 1977. His job at the hotel was also maintenance laborer. He had been laid off at different times but had been thereafter recalled except for the most recent layoff occurring on November 20, 1981. In 1981 Atkinson was designated shop steward for the hotel's maintenance laborers and gardeners.

Atkinson testified that November 11, 1981, Veterans Day, was a holiday for the laborers. He received a telephone call at home from a fellow employee who told him that maintenance engineers were performing laborers' work at the Aladdin. Specifically, Atkinson was told the engineers drove a truck to the Marina Hotel, picked up a dance floor, and delivered it back to the Aladdin. Atkinson drove to the Aladdin, noticed that the truck was not parked in the place where the laborers had last left it and that the truck contained a dance floor. Atkinson spoke to a security guard about who had driven the truck and they went to see John Grandi, the director of building and maintenance,[2] and asked Grandi why engineers had driven the truck contrary to the union agreement. Grandi became angry and asked who the "stool pigeon" was. Grandi told Atkinson that "if you don't have anything better to do, get out of my mother-fucking office and go play union elsewhere."[3] On the following morning Atkinson met with the other laborers, and it was decided that it would be in the best interest of the crew to file a grievance. The grievance (G.C. Exh. 2) was filed with the Union and, within a week, Respondent made a monetary payment to settle the grievance.[4]

Several days later, on or about November 18, Atkinson's immediate superior, Chris Dinino, approached Atkinson in the work area. Dinino appeared upset and said that Grandi was going to lay off all the laborers up to and including Atkinson, the most senior laborer, because of the grievance. At the suggestion of Dinino, Atkinson tried to talk to Grandi about the layoffs but without success. Atkinson "approached" Grandi about the layoffs as the latter passed through the work area, but Grandi replied that there was nothing to talk about. Atkinson and five other laborers, Maurice McBride, Joe Washington, Harley Kerin, Ron Achzet, and George Nicholson, were laid off on November 20, and on that date Atkinson asked Dinino if the layoffs were a result of the grievance that had been filed. Dinino replied, in part, "Well, you know, Mr. Grandi will cool off by a couple of weeks and we'll get this straightened out."[5]

Atkinson explaned on cross-examination that Respondent undertook some major renovation projects soon after the Aladdin reopened in October 1980. (Atkinson indicated that the casino was closed in 1980 and that it was around that time, he thought, that he heard that "Mr. Torres and Mr. Newton" had purchased the Aladdin.) According to Atkinson, the laborers helped to move, among other things, the baccarat tables, remodel four restaurants, move the marquee, redo the carpets in the casino and lobby area, and install a new health spa. Because the restaurants were completely gutted and moved, some temporary laborers were hired in 1981.[6] The restaurants opened sometime in the summer of 1981, on a staggered basis, and the new health spa was opened about mid-November that year. Atkinson estimated that he spent about 65 percent of his time working on the renovation projects while they were in progress. Atkinson said he operated a jackhammer, moved dirt by wheelbarrow, and performed other "renovation and clean-up" work.

Harley Kerin, on active duty with the United States Marines at the time of the hearing, testified that he was hired by Respondent on October 10, 1980, and was laid off December 26, 1980, and again on November 20, 1981. He was recalled within a couple of weeks after being laid off in December 1980, but he was not called back after being laid off in November 1981. Kerin testified that in December 1980 Respondent wanted to lay off Brian Hesse, who was at the time working under the supervision of Hesse's father, but had no legitimate reason to do so. "So what they did was," according to Kerin, "they laid off three other employees to get to Hesse"—Ron Achzet, Joe Washington, and Kerin. The laid-off employees, other than Hesse, were told, Kerin said, that as soon as Hesse got another job they would be recalled. Hesse obtained a job at Caesars Palace, and the other laid-off employees were immediately recalled.[7]

Kerin stated that he was a member of Local 995 and worked as a maintenance laborer while employed at the Aladdin. Kerin said he was told when hired that he would be "full-time" and was assigned to a crew to help with the remodeling of the hotel. He helped install carpeting and performed "mostly cleanup" work. Kerin recalled that others, including Nicholson, Neal, Leavitt, and Smith, were hired in early 1981 and that some of them were laid off in August of the same year.

Kerin said he was told of his November 29, 1981 layoff by Dinino on that date. There was talk earlier of the possibility of a layoff because of the filing of grievances. Said Kerin: "Chris Dinino had mentioned that if we don't quit filing them, that something is going to happen."[8] Kerin said Dinino told him and others in the break area around 1 or 1:15 p.m., on November 20, that they were being laid off "because our shop steward was filing grievances against the hotel for workers doing our job." Achzet asked Dinino at the time, Kerin testified, "if

[2] Grandi is in charge of the maintenance department, but was not Atkinson's immediate supervisor.

[3] Grandi's version of the confrontation was not too different, as indicated infra.

[4] Checks were made out to the two laborers with the most seniority, Bob Mayhall and Steve Dalen, but the money was divided among those who had signed the grievance.

[5] As indicated infra, Dinino denied making the statement. Atkinson stated that no grievance was filed over the November 20 layoff; someone at the Union had told him that "it's a right of management to decide . . . their working force."

[6] Nicholson, Neal, Smith, and Leavitt were identified as the temporary hires. All four were laid off in August 1981, but Nicholson was recalled shortly thereafter and laid off again on November 20, 1981.

[7] A number of witnesses testified that they understood the collective-bargaining agreement to provide that employees were to be recalled according to seniority, that recall rights expire after a year, and that an employee could accept another job without losing recall rights.

[8] Dinino denied making such a statement but agreed that Hesse had been laid off under circumstances similar to those described by Kerin. Dinino denied, however, that the November 1981 layoff was similar to the Hesse situation or related to a grievance.

it was going to be another Hesse situation," and Dinino agreed, "yes, it was."

Dinino sent Kerin to speak with Grandi on November 20 concerning Kerin's question about the length of the layoff. Grandi told Kerin that "he was sorry to see us go, but he wasn't going to let some smart-mouth punk tell him how to run his business. And as soon as he got another job, we would all be back to work again."

Kerin agreed that some of the remodeling of the hotel had been completed at the time of the November 20, 1981 layoffs but stated there was further remodeling work yet to be completed. At the time of the layoff Kerin said he was averaging about 20 hours of overtime every 2 weeks.

Kerin said he went to the Union to complain about the November 1981 layoffs, but he was unaware of whether the Union filed a grievance protesting the layoffs.[9]

Ronald Achzet, a member of the Union, testified that he was hired by Dinino on October 8, 1980. and was laid off on November 20, 1981. Two days earlier, on November 18, 1981, Dinino had told him and Kerin that "you guys are going to get laid off" because of grievances filed by Atkinson. Either Achzet or Kerin (Achzet was not sure which one) asked Dinino if this were another "Hesse situation," and Dinino replied that it was.[10]

Achzet testified that after the November 1981 layoff he had three conversations with Dinino in 1982. In early January 1982, he telephoned Dinino and asked whether the laborers were going to be recalled; Dinino said "yes," as soon as Atkinson had gotten a job. Achzet again called Dinino in March to ask about coming back to work. Dinino said that "they were going to wait for Jess Atkinson's recall rights to run out" and then the laborers would be called back without regard to seniority rights. On April 7 Achzet again inquired by phone whether the laborers would be recalled. Dinino responded, Achzet said, by telling "me that my name was on Grandi's desk, naming me in a suit that Harley Kerin had filed." Achzet understood Dinino to be referring to the charge leading to the instant case. Achzet asked if he could get his job back if he took his name off the suit. Dinino told Achzet that Achzet would have to talk to Grandi.[11]

George Nicholson testified that, sometime during the week prior to the November 20 layoff, John Grandi spoke with a number of the laborers just prior to quitting time. Grandi, according to Nicholson, said, "I hate to let a few good guys go to get to one guy." Although Nicholson did not understand at that time whom Grandi was talking about, he subsequently understood Grandi to be referring to Atkinson.[12]

Nicholson said he was hired by Dinino in January 1981 to do labor maintenance and was laid off in August with five or so others and again on November 20, 1981.

Steven Dalen was hired as a maintenance laborer in 1976 and laid off on August 6, 1982. He said he was a member of Local 995. He testified that on several occasions following the November 1981 layoffs Chris Dinino said to him, "If Jess [Atkinson] hadn't opened his big mouth them six guys would still be working." On another occasion, in December 1981 or January 1982, Dinino and Dalen walked into Grandi's office and Dinino asked Grandi when the laid-off laborers would return to work. Grandi replied, "Has Jess Atkinson got a job yet?"[13]

In 1982, toward the end of his employment with Respondent, Dalen and Bob Mayhall were concerned with the amount of work being required of them and asked Dinino when the six persons laid off in November 1981 would be recalled. Dinino replied, "after their recall rights expired he would hire new guys."

Dalen also testified that on the morning of April 5, 1982, Dinino approached Dalen and Bob Mayhall as they were working. Dinino told Dalen that Connie Kennington, Respondent's personnel director, thought that Dalen had provided a statement to the NLRB. Dinino then told Dalen he had better "watch it" or he "might still get laid off."

Later that day while eating lunch, Dalen was asked by Dinino to go with him and explain to Kennington that "the reason I didn't get laid off [in November] was because my wife was going to have twins."[14] Dalen met with Kennington and a Nevada Resort Association attorney, Vincent Helm, who he thought at first was an NLRB attorney, in Grandi's office. Dalen explained to them that "everybody"—i.e., "the carpenters, the painters, gardeners and all the other trades"—had been doing the laborers' work. Dalen stated that when he was asked whether he had gone to the NLRB he realized that the attorney present was not from the NLRB. He then refused to make further comment.[15]

[9] Respondent offered in evidence an affidavit of Kerin (R. Exh. 1), but I find no significant contradictions between it and his testimony.

[10] Achzet said he was among four employees laid off for 2 weeks on December 26, 1980. At that time Dinino stated that as soon as Hesse got a job the workers would return to work. Achzet said that there were two or so hired shortly after his recall in January 1981 and that there were layoffs around August 1981.

[11] Dinino denied the essence of Achzet's testimony. Dinino did recall one postlayoff phone conversation with Achzet. According to Dinino, Achzet called and said he understood that Respondent had undertaken a construction project and asked if he could come back to work. Dinino explained that Respondent was not hiring any more "maintenance Teamsters" because it had "construction laborers coming in . . . it was another situation all together."

[12] Robert Mayhall, a member of the labor maintenance crew, testified that Nicholson was present when the November 12 grievance was signed by a number of laborers but Nicholson did not sign it.

[13] Dinino's recollection of the conversation in Grandi's office is somewhat different. Dinino asked if he would be getting any new employees and Grandi said no, that there was not going to be any hiring for a while. It was possible, according to Dinino, that Grandi mentioned Atkinson, but if he did, it would have been because Grandi had, on occasion, inquired whether "any of the guys would be working or not."

[14] Both Grandi and Dinino testified (as did Dalen) that Dalen had been included on the list of employees to be laid off in November. Dalen's wife was pregnant, however, and Dinino was concerned Dalen would lose his medical coverage. When Dinino discovered that Terry Atwood, one of the employees who was to be retained, was on a disability leave, he persuaded Grandi to keep Dalen on until Atwood's return. Atwood returned in March 1982, but Dalen was not laid off until the following August.

[15] On cross-examination Dalen said, "I think Chris [Dinino] had asked me a few times if I had went down there [NLRB], and stuff." Dinino denied mentioning the NLRB to Dalen before the April meeting with Kennington and the Resort Association attorney took place. Dinino said "it was brought up back in April" that Dalen had gone to the NLRB. He

Dalen testified that on April 7, 1982, and on other occasions that Dinino had told Dalen, "no matter what happens, I was on the shit list." Dinino repeated the statement or a similar statement during the following months. Dalen recalled on cross-examination that Dinino also told him that he was on the "Barbecue."

Finally, Dalen testified that he filed a grievance on Friday, July 30, 1982, concerning a work assignment of laborers (running a forklift and driving a truck) to the stagehands. The grievance was later withdrawn by Dalen, however. Dinino was present and observed Dalen, Atwood, and Mayhall prepare the grievance but, Dalen conceded, Dinino did not actually read it. Later that evening Dinino called Dalen at home and told him to report to work the following day, a Saturday, to complete the disputed assignment.[16]

Robert Mayhall went to work at the Aladdin Hotel in 1975 and was still employed there at the time of the trial. He said he was currently a maintenance truckdriver and member of Local 995. Mayhall said he also operated loaders and other equipment. When not engaged in driving or operating equipment he works as a maintenance laborer.

Mayhall testified for the General Counsel on his case-in-chief and on rebuttal.[17] On his first appearance, Mayhall told of Jess Atkinson telling him and other members of the maintenance laborers' crew that two engineers had moved a dance floor on Veterans Day in November 1981. All of the members of the crew present, except for Nicholson, signed a grievance.[18] The company paid compensation, in the form of two checks, to Mayhall and Dalen, the most senior members, and the proceeds were divided among those who had signed the grievance.

Mayhall also recalled being told by Dinino a couple of days before the November 20, 1981 layoff of six laborers that "everybody was getting laid off up through Jess." Mayhall said Dinino also stated that "if Jess would have kept his big mouth shut and butted out, everybody would have kept their jobs." A few weeks later Dinino told Mayhall that the laid-off workers would not be recalled for a year while they still had seniority rights.[19]

Mayhall testified that he complained to Dinino on March 24, 1982, that other employees were performing the laborers' work. About the same time mention was made about the fact that the six laid-off workers would not be recalled for a year. Dinino told Mayhall that if he did not keep his "mouth shut" he would lose his job. Mayhall overheard several conversations during which Dinino had told Dalen that Dalen was on the "barbecue." Mayhall also heard Dinino tell Dalen that Connie Kennington was aware that Dalen "was one of the ones" who had filed a charge with the NLRB and that Dalen was on the "shit list." Asked on cross-examination for details of the conversation he overheard, Mayhall testified:

> Chris had gone into Connie's office with a lawyer or somebody and he come out of the office and got Steve and told Steve that they knew that he was one of the ones that went down and filed the charges on them at the Labor Board.

When Dalen was laid off in August 1982, there were no maintenance laborers as such working at the Aladdin. Terry Atwood, another maintenance truckdriver, Mayhall (who was on vacation at the time), and other bargaining unit employees were doing the maintenance laborers' work. Mayhall agreed on cross-examination that around August 1982 there was a substantial layoff, involving engineers, carpenters, painters, and gardeners.

Steven Burrus, the business representative for Local 995, testified that he spoke with Grandi and Dinino a number of times after the November 1981 layoffs. He said no grievance was filed concerning the layoffs, but he tried to "settle it informally between the parties and get people back to work."

Burrus went to the Aladdin in late November or early December to meet Grandi pursuant to an appointment but was able to speak with him there only by telephone. Grandi was abrupt and asked Burrus if he got a job yet for Atkinson. Burrus stated that Grandi said to him, "You son of a bitch, what are [you] going to do for me?" Grandi also told Burrus that "unless you get this guy a job, there isn't anything going to happen." Burrus said he saw Grandi again at the Aladdin in April 1982, and Grandi again asked if Burrus had got Atkinson a job.

Burrus said his meetings with Dinino were in the summer months. Dinino would also ask whether or not Atkinson had a job yet. Burrus recalled that Dinino, a union member, attended a union meeting and remarked: "Unless you guys quit putting out some heat, you're never going to get anywhere with Grandi."[20] said there were "no hard feelings," and it had nothing to do with Dalen's layoff. Dinino said he sent Dalen in to talk to Kennington and Helm "about the situation, about his family, the insurance and that." He was not sure if he told him it was the hotel attorney. Kennington testified, however, that she introduced the attorney as the attorney for the Resort Association.

[16] Dalen indicated on cross-examination that Mayhall had told him that stagehands were doing "our work" and that Mayhall was more upset at Dinino than Dalen was. According to Dalen, Mayhall "was mad" and yelled to Dinino: "You know why I'm mad." Dalen took the grievance to the union office on Friday afternoon but later called the Union and told Business Representative Burrus "to rip it up" as Dalen had been called in to perform the work. Dalen also telephoned Mayhall, who had begun a vacation that weekend, and told him that he had done the work.

Dinino also testified about the incident. He said the stagehands had always used the forklift. He said he gave the keys for the truck and forklift to the stagehand crew that day and argued with Mayhall about the stagehands' use of the forklift. Dinino went to the union hall that day seeking to clarify matters and, after talking with the stagehand crew chief, called Dalen and told him to go in and do the work. Dinino said he did not mention the incident to Grandi.

[17] Mayhall was recalled on rebuttal to testify concerning laborers' work performed by construction laborers and other crafts following the November 1981 layoffs. Such rebuttal testimony is summarized in a footnote at the end of the summary of Dinino's testimony.

[18] As previously noted, seven members of the maintenance labor crew signed the November 12 grievance. Terry Atwood and Elmer Parolini also did not sign the grievance but were not laid off. Mayhall also was retained, although he signed the grievance.

[19] Mayhall testified that the November 1981 layoff came after two restaurants had been completed and while work on a third and a health club was in progress. He stated that the layoff came unexpectedly but conceded that Dinino had indicated that layoffs would come when the construction work was completed.

[20] Grandi claimed on cross-examination that he had explained to Burrus that there was nothing that could be done for the laid-off laborers. Grandi denied that he had ever met Burrus face-to-face before the trial or that he had been asked to attend a meeting with Burrus.

Terry Atwood, a member of Local 995, was employed by Respondent at the time of trial as a truckdriver. He testified concerning a conversation he had with Dinino sometime in March 1982. Dinino said that Respondent would never rehire the six laborers who had been laid off in November 1981, and that Respondent would wait until the laborers' recall rights had expired before it would hire more employees. Following Dalen's layoff (in August 1982) Dinino told Atwood that Dalen would never be rehired because Dalen had filed charges with the NLRB. In November 1982 Dinino told Atwood that Atwood would be terminated if he testified during the NLRB trial.[21]

John Grandi testified that he came to the Aladdin Hotel when Ed Torres took over the hotel in October 1980. He said he worked as a consultant at first and became an employee of the hotel at the beginning of 1981.

Grandi identified himself as the director of building and maintenance and chief engineer of the maintenance department. He reports directly to Torres. Chris Dinino, the laborers' foreman, reports to Grandi as do supervisors of other groups (painters, engineers, carpenters, gardeners, and a locksmith). Grandi stated that all new construction "goes through" him as well as Torres and the hotel's architect. All maintenance employees work under Grandi.

Grandi testified that Torres began major renovations in 1980. The casino was rearranged, requiring moving of the "21" tables, slot machines, and baccarat. Three restaurants "were completely torn out" and replaced. A new health club was also constructed. The health club, one of the last projects, was finished around October 1981. A new 150-room addition to the Camelot building was constructed by a contractor and finished around April 1982. Considerable demolition work was required in connection with the remodeling, and the laborers performed it "mostly." The laborers were also involved in the construction of the Camelot addition, primarily in cleanup.

Grandi explained that during the renovation Dinino would ask for more laborers. Grandi would speak to Torres, who would say, "go ahead and get the work done." Dinino would call the Union and hire laborers to work on a temporary basis. According to Grandi, the laborers were hired to work "just until the work was done, and they knew about it, a lot of them knew about it."

Grandi testified that he thought that four laborers were laid off around August 1981 after work on the restaurants (except apparently for the Saber Room, the new Chinese restaurant) had been completed.

According to Grandi, Torres spoke to Grandi about the possibility of a layoff in early September 1981. Torres told Grandi that it is "the worst time of the year around here, and . . . let's cut down." Grandi had an assistant (Al) prepare a list of all employees in the department, by craft, and submitted the list to Grandi later in the month. Torres and Grandi went over the list and, according to Grandi's direct testimony, Torres told Grandi to cut down the number of employees in maintenance as follows: engineers, including electricians—36 to 25; painters—6 to 4; carpenters—6 to 3; laborers—9 to 3, plus a driver.

Grandi asked for an opportunity to go over the list and make a "breakdown" so he could cover 24-hour shifts with engineers and still comply with the seniority rights of employees. Torres agreed, and Grandi then advised his assistant to reschedule the work of the engineers, utilizing no more than 25. Thereafter, Grandi reported to Torres that he could cut the number of engineers to 22, painters to about 3 or 4, carpenters from 6 to 3, gardeners from 6 to 4, and laborers "down to 3 and 1." Torres replied, "fine, get it started" but later agreed to delay the layoffs because electrical and other work needed to be done on the health club and on the new Chinese restaurant. Torres would not delay the layoffs beyond November, however, and the layoffs began on November 21—strictly by seniority.

Grandi stated he consulted with each group boss and made up schedules for each craft. Grandi and Dinino conferred on the layoff of laborers and "cut the crew down to Steve Dalen," which left only two laborers. This would mean that Dinino, who could be kept on because he was in charge, Terry Atwood, and Bob Mayhall would be the only laborers retained. Grandi agreed to keep Dalen on at that time because his wife was expecting, or already had, a baby, and Atwood was out on disability (M.I.C.).

Grandi recalled that a grievance was filed in November 1981 over the fact that he allowed two engineers to drive a truck on a holiday to pick up merchandise. Grandi was unsure what the engineers had picked up. Grandi denied the grievance had any bearing on the layoff of workers that month. He remembered that Union Steward Jess Atkinson came to the hotel that day and complained about the engineers using the truck. Grandi said he told Atkinson: "Haven't you got anything better to do than sit on your ass in the parking lot watching that truck going back and forth? I said, if I made a mistake, I will pay for it. Now, get your ass out of here."

Grandi told Connie Kennington later, when the grievance was filed, that "we goofed" and "we have to pay for it."

Grandi acknowledged that he saw Atkinson on the day of the layoff, November 20, 1981, and told him that it was "Mr. Torres' doing" and there was nothing he could do about it.

Grandi said he also talked with Harley Kerin in November 1981. Kerin asked about the layoff and mentioned that he might go back into the Marine Corps. Grandi said he advised Kerin to take a job if he could find one. That was the only conversation he had with Kerin, Grandi said.

Asked if he ever stated in George Nicholson's presence that he hated to let a few good guys go to get one, Grandi said he "never said such thing." Grandi also denied telling Steve Dalen that laid-off workers would be recalled if Jess Atkinson got a job. He said Dalen was laid off in August 1982 because Atwood had come back and had been "steady" on the job. He stated that other employees were laid off about the same time.

Grandi denied ever meeting Union Business Agent Steven Burrus. Grandi said he only spoke to Burrus by phone at the request of Connie Kennington, and on that occasion told him there was nothing he could do about the (November 1981) layoffs. Grandi denied telling Burrus that employees would be recalled if Atkinson got a job.

Grandi acknowledged that Connie Kennington told him around April (1982) that Dalen had made a complaint to the NLRB "about the stagehands or something." He said the complaint, however, "had nothing to do" with his layoff. Grandi stated that Mayhall was laid off for only about 2 weeks and was recalled. There have been no other laborers hired since November 1981, he said.

Grandi agreed on cross-examination that the number of laborers grew during the renovation in 1981, from 4 or 5 to around 13. Only one of six gardeners was actually laid off in November 1981. Two carpenters listed on Respondent's Exhibit 2 had quit around November and were not laid off, he said. Two carpenters and two painters were hired about the same time to perform some retrofitting work. Also, Parolini was not laid off as he was considered a truckdriver and not a laborer. Grandi's affidavit stated that Torres wanted four laborers (not three) and a truckdriver to be retained.[22]

Connie Kennington has been personnel director and paymaster at the Aladdin since Torres took it over and reopened it on or about October 1, 1980. Kennington had worked at the hotel previously between December 1978 and March 1980. The hotel had been partially closed down in July 1980.

Torres promptly undertook "a massive reconstruction program." A new casino, four new restaurants, the Bagdad Showroom, and a new health club were among the projects undertaken. Two of the restaurants, the Continental and Hickory, were finished in May 1981, another (the Fishery) was completed in August 1981 and the House of Chan was opened early September 1981. The health club was completed in October 1981.

Kennington said there were maintenance laborers, including Foreman Dinino, on board when the hotel reopened on October 1 or shortly thereafter. Additional laborers were hired in 1981. A number of employees were laid off in August or early September 1981, including laborers Nicholson, Neal, Leavitt, and Smith because construction "was winding down." Kennington acknowledged that construction continued on a new 150-room addition to the Camelot section which was being built primarily by a "subcontractor." The work on the health club begun around August 1981 also continued. George Nicholson, who was laid off in August, was recalled in November to help finish the health club. Maurice McBride was transferred into a laborer's classification from the warehouse on November 5, 1981, she said. The layoff of six laborers came on November 20, 1981. Kennington testified that only one other maintenance worker, construction carpenter George Briscoe, was laid off between November 1981 and July 1982.

Kennington said the controller of the hotel, Toni Spratt, told her around the end of October 1981 that Torres wanted to cut back in personnel. She thereafter regularly prepared and submitted every other week so-called monthly status reports showing the number and classification of all personnel in the hotel. She recalled seeing Torres about 2 months later, at the end of the year, when he commented that he had let a lot of people go "in order to survive." Kennington stated that there had been reductions in every department since January 1981. She gave the number of employees at Aladdin in January 1981 as 1828, in January 1982 as 1703, and 1147 in January 1983. Maintenance employees numbered 68 in January 1981 and 37 in January 1983.[23]

Kennington recalled receiving the November 12, 1981 grievance from the Union and telephoning Grandi concerning it. Grandi told her at the time that he had thought "Engineers and Teamsters are all one" but that she should settle it. Two checks were then drawn for "a little over a hundred dollars" (based on 8 hours of holiday pay) each for Steven Dalen and Bob Mayhall to dispose of the grievance. Kennington testified that there was no grievance filed either in connection with Dalen's layoff in August 1982 or the layoff of six laborers in November 1981.

Kennington also testified concerning an April 1981 meeting in Grandi's office when Dalen met Nevada Resort Association Attorney Vince Helms, Aladdin's counsel at that time. The charge Harley Kerin had filed with the NLRB was being investigated, and Helms had been told earlier that Dalen's job had been saved because Dalen's wife was expecting twins and Atwood was out on leave. Helms had inquired of Dinino if Dalen was aware of being so "lucky" and would verify the information. Dinino thought Dalen would and arranged for Dalen to come into the meeting. Kennington acknowledged at the trial that Dalen was apparently confused during the April 1981 meeting as to Helms' employer when Dalen stated that he had already been to the NLRB and given a statement. When he realized that Helms was not from the NLRB, Dalen declined to respond to further questions and left. Kennington maintained that both she and Helms had explained to Dalen at the outset who Helms was. Helms explained his purpose in talking to Dalen and told Dalen he was free not to answer questions if he preferred.[24]

[22] Grandi was not an impressive witness. At times he was vague, and much of his testimony was contradictory. He claimed to have no recollection of dates. He gave different times on construction of the health club and the number of employees to be cut in given crafts varied.

[23] A number of documents were introduced through Kennington, including R. Exh. 4 (copies of checks delivered to Dalen and Mayhall to settle the November 12, 1981 grievance); R. Exh. 5 (list of maintenance laborers laid off after January 1981, with hire and termination dates); R. Exh. 6 (status reports); R. Exh. 7 (list of persons laid off [except "short term"] between October 1980 and January 1983); and R. Exh. 8 (Atwood's leaves of absence).

[24] No doubt Dalen was initially confused who Helms was, but I credit Kennington's account that the attorney was correctly introduced, first by her and then by himself.

James Edward Byrne, assistant controller of the Aladdin, identified and explained a summary and two graphs, Respondent's Exhibits 9, 10, and 11, that he had prepared to show when capitalized labor costs were incurred, on a monthly basis, during the calendar years 1981 and 1982 at the Aladdin. Byrne's documentation shows the breakdown of costs involved in making changes in the casino: concourse carpeting; county inspection repairs; a projected (but not contructed) hotel highrise; construction of a health club, parking lot, storage warehouse, a 3-story "highrise," and the renovation of the Bagdad Show Room; four "gourmet" restaurants and Camelot rooms. A little over $425,000 was expended in 1981 and only about $95,000 in 1982. The casino changes, which cost approximately $130,000, and the renovation of the restaurants, which cost $181,598, were completed in October and September 1981, respectively. Most of the work on both projects was performed in the first 6 or 7 months of that year. County inspection repairs (approximately $24,000) were spread over the period January 1981 to May 1982, but most ($16,044) were performed in 1982. Construction of the health club (approximately $48,000) took place in the last 6 months of 1981. Renovation of the Bagdad Room, at a cost of approximately $30,000, took place primarily between February and May 1982, although $6,475 had been spent for that purpose in January 1981. The Camelot rooms were renovated between July 1981 and April 1982 ($24,273). Most of the work performed on the three-story highrise (approximately $25,000) was done between March and May 1982. The concourse carpeting was not a significant project ($4,022), and most of it was performed in July 1982. The parking lot ($5,874) and storage warehouse ($544) were not major projects and had been completed by November 1981. The graphs show capitalized labor costs were the highest in April 1981 when the restaurants were being renovated. Construction of the health club caused labor costs to peak again (at a lower level) in November 1981. In 1982 labor costs peaked in March 1982 when work was being performed on the three-story highrise, 150-room addition.[25]

Edward Torres said he had been the general manager of the Aladdin since October 1980. He said he "very actively" oversees everything in connection with operation of the hotel. Prior to his takeover the hotel had employed between 2200 and 2800 persons.

Torres stated that "the place" was run down when he took over. "It was closed for four months" and there "had been no management for about 18 months."[26] Torres undertook to do extensive remodeling. The casino was rearranged, banquet facilities were improved, and rooms remodeled. Construction of a 150-room addition was awarded to J. R. Porter, a general contractor. Some of the remodeling work was contracted out (e.g., drywall, plumbing), and some of it was performed by hotel employees (e.g., electrical, painting).

Torres said he keeps himself apprised of the staffing and labor costs. He receives figures every 2 weeks from Controller Toni Spratt and sometimes also will check (with Connie Kennington) to get a daily count in a particular department if he sees "too many people standing around."

Shortly after Labor Day 1981 Torres began meeting with department heads in order to reduce staff. He met with Grandi and told him that there was to be no more remodeling; Grandi was to finish up what he was doing and start cutting down the number of employees. Grandi submitted a list of names in different departments but asked for, and was given, more time in reducing the number of laborers as there was cleanup work to do "around the place, particularly the health club, that was still a mess." By November Torres thought Grandi was "dragging his feet" and directed Grandi to "cut now." As he recalled it, Torres told Grandi to reduce the number of maintenance laborers to three laborers and one truckdriver. Torres wanted cuts made across the board but indicated that layoffs were focused on laborers because in remodeling laborers finish their work first. Laborers, he said, are used at the hotel "mostly" to "haul a lot of stuff."

Cuts were made in other departments in 1981, and even further cuts were made in 1982. "The bottom fell out in April 1982," and business dropped even further in the summer months. Torres said he told Grandi at that time he wanted to go down to "rock bottom" in all departments. He thought around 11 engineers were laid off around June 1982.[27] Business picked up some in 1983, Torres said, and some additional help (maids, porters, registration, and food service) was added. The number of employees increased in 1983 from 950 to about 1022.

In discussing layoffs, Torres said the names of individuals were not mentioned. No mention was made of any grievance or the fact that an employee presented a problem. Torres said Grandi never referred to an employee being involved in NLRB investigation. Steven Dalen's name was unknown to him, Torres said. Torres stated that he decided the number of persons to be laid off, and the department heads "implemented it."

Christopher (Chris) Dinino described himself as a working foreman and "supervisor for the laborers and Teamsters driver." He stated his position is covered by the collective-bargaining agreement between the hotel and Local 995. He said he has been a member of Local 995 for about 11 years. His supervisory status is not disputed.

Dinino said he was hired to supervise the maintenance laborers on the day the hotel reopened. Renovation of the hotel began immediately. Dinino explained that maintenance laborers basically "assist" other trades—"clean up their messes," "set up the scaffolding," "a lot of demolition," "expediting . . . warehouse and transport." There are two labor classifications, jackhammer and driver, which call for premium pay.

[25] Byrne testified that the labor expenses are capitalized when spent on construction or major rebuilding of an asset. He explained that the timecards of employees performing the work were the source of the data used in preparing R. Exhs. 9, 10, and 11 and that "the transactions were reviewed by our independent auditors." I credit the evidence given by Byrne.

[26] Apparently only the casino, restaurants, and entertainment facilities were closed down as Torres said the hotel itself was "open for business at all times."

[27] Torres testified on cross-examination that Grandi was still "dragging along" in 1982 and gave Grandi "numbers" in May or June that year. Asked on cross-examination if the maintenance department had not employed new people in 1982, Torres said if it did they would have been temporary hires to finish up a job.

Dinino said he had hired additional members for the maintenance crew, after getting Grandi's approval, by calling the Local Union. He said he would advise the Union the type of work to be done and explain that it would be temporary. Dinino would interview prospects and explain to them the work would be temporary. Dinino said he had hired Kerin and Achzet in October 1980 and later four others, Nicholson, Smith, Neal, and Leavitt. Dinino stated he also had replaced people "because people didn't show up for work or whatever." Nicholson, Smith, Neal, and Leavitt were laid off in August 1981 because the restaurants were finished, and less manpower was needed. Dinino indicated that the layoffs were taken "for granted" as he had explained the temporary nature of the employment.

In November 1981 John Grandi, Dinino's superior, told Dinino that the health club was done, "it's slowing down," and that the crew was being reduced to the driver, himself, and two others. Grandi told him, Dinino said, "Mr. Torres decided we just didn't need that many laborers there, so he wanted to cut it to the bare minimum." Dinino said he spoke to Grandi shortly thereafter about saving Steve Dalen from the layoff because his wife was expecting twins and Terry Atwood was "on a leave of absence, for NIC." Dinino asked that Dalen be kept on until Atwood returned to duty, and Grandi agreed.

Dinino stated that he spoke about layoffs with the laborers crew during the week prior to the November 1981 layoff. Some employees asked if the layoffs were related to the grievance that Jess Atkinson had filed that month. Dinino specifically denied telling Atkinson, Achzet, and Dalen that the layoffs were occurring because of the grievance filed by Atkinson. He also denied telling Atkinson that Grandi would cool off in a couple of weeks and that everything would be straightened out. Dinino said he told Atkinson that "Mr. Torres was cutting back to a certain amount of men, and that was all that I knew."

Dinino acknowledged that the laborers compared the November 1981 layoff to the previous layoff of Brian Hesse (also appearing in the transcript as Heese). Said Dinino:

> Yes, it was the situation where these guys were under the impression that because of Jess's grievance that John, or management, was getting back at the crew just to get Jess out. That was the general talk.
>
> And the reason they were comparing this with the Hesse situation was that Brian Hesse had been let go at a time, and other people at a time, when Mr. Torres had changed his policies. When he took over the hotel there was a situation of relatives in departments, and he more or less, he cut that out.
> And in our department he ran into a problem because of the seniority situation. Brian was up the ladder a little bit, and his father was running the department, and Brian was working for his father, and Mr. Torres didn't want that.
> So Brian—a couple of guys and Brian left for awhile, then Brian got relocated, and the crew came back, and that was all I know about that. And that's what they were comparing that to, that situation.

Dinino said he discussed the situation with Kerin but told him the November 1981 layoff was not the same. Dinino testified: "I told him I didn't think it was like that. I says it's a straight lay off status situation. The job is over with, and we had to be cutting back."

Dinino said he talked to Achzet over the telephone around March 1982, when the hotel was starting a new project, but only told him that the hotel was not hiring any maintenance laborers. Dinino stated that it was "general knowledge" that persons laid off have a "year hire back rights," but he denied ever telling Achzet, Dalen, Mayhall, or Atwood that the laid-off laborers would not be recalled for a year.

Dinino stated that he had told Dalen that he was lucky that he was still working but never stated to Dalen that the other laborers would still be working if Atkinson had kept his mouth shut and not filed a grievance. He also denied making a similar statement to Mayhall.

Grandi would ask whether Atkinson and other employees had got a job, Dinino acknowledged. Dinino also acknowleged that Grandi could have asked, with Dalen standing in the doorway of Grandi's office, whether Atkinson had got a job or not. Grandi regarded it, however, as just "idle talk."

Dinino stated that Dalen was laid off around September 1982, shortly after some painters and carpenters were laid off. Carpeting of the concourse, in the casino area, was nearly complete at the time, Dinino recalled. Dinino acknowledged that it was known in April 1982 that Dalen had given a statement to the NLRB and that Dalen had been involved, with Mayhall, in a work assignment dispute concerning the use of a forklift by stagehands about 2 weeks before Dalen's layoff. Dinino indicated, however, that neither of these facts was involved in the decision to lay off Dalen. Torres had directed further cutbacks, and Grandi had made the decision to lay off Dalen. There were "no hard feelings" over Dalen giving a statement to the NLRB, and Grandi had not told Torres about the work assignment dispute. Dalen was ultimately assigned to perform the disputed work, was paid for it, and no grievance was filed in this regard.

Dinino denied telling Dalen in April 1982 that Connie Kennington thought he had gone to the NLRB and that he should watch his step or he would be laid off. Dinino acknowledged that he would use the term "barbecue" (as a joke) but denied that he told Dalen he was on the barbecue or on the "shit list." Dinino also denied telling Mayhall that he would be fired or laid off if he testified in an NLRB proceeding.

Dinino was not a persuasive witness. His testimony was vague and indicated uncertainty at times. Asked on cross-examination what he said to Shop Steward Atkinson when he first told Atkinson of the impending layoff, Dinino said, "I don't remember the conversation." He said he did remember "basically" the conversation he had with Atkinson on the day of the layoff:

> He asked me why there was a layoff, and I told him because of Mr. Torres. And he says, well, that doesn't seem right, we've got a lot of work to do around here. I says that's all I can tell you, that's all I know, talk to John if you've got any more questions.

He said he had "basically the same conversation with" Kerin the same day, adding—"[h]e probably brought up the deal about Jess. The same thing Jess said. You know. And I told him there's no substance to that."

Asked why more maintenance laborers were laid off in 1981 than persons in other crafts, Dinino said the hotel needed carpenters and electricians to perform retrofitting to provide the hotel with fire protection. But later, under further cross-examination, he conceded he did not know when the retrofitting was done. "The dates," he said, "don't mean a thing to me."[28]

Dinino acknowledged on cross-examination that he knew Dalen had provided a statement to the NLRB because Dalen had told him—"after I'd mentioned it to him." Dinino said he had sent Dalen in to "explain the situation why he wasn't laid off" to the then hotel attorney, Vincent Helms, and Connie Kennington, and "he came back out all upset." Dinino said it was "general knowledge" that "we'd all" given statements to the NLRB, but, he said, "I don't think John [Grandi] never knew he gave a statement."

[28] Robert Mayhall, who has continued to work at the Aladdin, testified on rebuttal concerning maintenance laborers' work that he had observed other crafts perform at the hotel after the 1981 layoffs. Shortly after the November 1981 layoffs, four carpenters helped move slot machines for 2 days. Beginning around Christmastime 1981, while Dinino was hospitalized, Grandi directed that gardeners assist Mayhall and Steve Dalen in performing laborers' work (tearing out tiles, carpeting, and removing furniture) in the old Camelot building. Such work continued for 2 or 3 months. Also in early 1982, Mayhall observed engineers and carpenters tear out walls and carry ovens and other items out of the old Chinese kitchen. In March 1982, construction carpenters were hired and assigned by Dinino to help Mayhall and Atwood move 300 chairs. Construction laborers helped the maintenance laborers crew move files out of the underground parking area over a period of 2 or 3 weeks. Construction laborers and carpenters were assigned by Dinino to help maintenance laborers take out furniture, walls, and carpeting from the Bagdad Room. Construction laborers helped move slot banks and assisted, up to around July 1982, the maintenance laborers move things to and from a new warehouse facility. Carpenters were used in June or July 1982 to move 700–800 slot machines. After Dalen was laid off in August 1982, a butcher was assigned for a month to drive a truck hauling meat back and forth between the Aladdin and El Rancho Hotel. Also, after Dalen's layoff, Mayhall observed laborers from the El Rancho Hotel (affiliated with the Aladdin) move items over a 2- or 3-week period between the El Rancho and the Aladdin.

Testifying on surrebuttal, Dinino said he did hire construction laborers in March 1982. He said he had wanted to get a head start in furnishing the lower floors of the new, 150-room "lowrise" addition that got into trouble with the Construction Laborers' Union for having brought in maintenance laborers before the building was finished. The Union, however, agreed to the use of a composite crew, consisting of both maintenance laborers and construction laborers, which worked in the lowrise for 4 to 6 weeks. A composite crew was also used for a very short time in moving files and in the Bagdad Room. The construction laborers also helped out the gardeners for a month or 6 weeks and then were laid off.

Analysis

1. The alleged unlawful statements

a. John Grandi

The record convinces me that John Grandi, as George Nicholson testified, approached Nicholson and other employees one afternoon a few days prior to the November 20, 1981 layoff and stated in substance that he hated to let "a few good guys go" to get one. I reject Grandi's assertion that he never made such a statement. It is clear from the record that the employee Grandi was referring to was Union Steward Jess Atkinson and that he was the object of special attention because he took the initiative in preparing and filing the November 12 grievance protesting the use of a "company vehicle" by engineers in transporting and unloading of a dance floor.[29] Such a statement on the part of Grandi constituted a threat and a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Paragraph 8(a) of the complaint was thus established.

I am persuaded that on November 20, 1981, the day Respondent laid off six employees, Grandi told Harley Kerin, in response to Kerin's inquiry about the duration of the impending layoff, that Grandi was sorry about the layoff but that a "smart-mouth punk" was not going to tell him how to run his business; also, that when he (the "punk") got a job, the others could return. Kerin correctly understood that Grandi was referring to Atkinson, even though his name was not mentioned. Kerin's testimony was more persuasive than Grandi's denial and sustained the allegations of paragraph 8(b)(1) and (2).

I am satisfied that Grandi stated to Chris Dinino, in the presence of Steve Dalen in late December 1981 or at the beginning of 1982 and in response to Dinino's inquiry concerning the recall of persons recently laid off: "Has Jess Atkinson got a job yet?" Dalen's testimony to this effect was credible, and I accept it as correct. Neither Grandi nor Dinino directly contradicted Dalen. Grandi acknowledged there could have been a conversation on the subject but did not remember it. Dinino acknowleged that there was a time when he spoke to Grandi about hiring new people while Dalen waited in a doorway. Dinino said Grandi's response was that there would be no hiring for a while and acknowledged that Grandi "could very well" have asked whether Jess had got a job. The allegations of paragraph 8(c) were established.

b. Dinino

The several allegations of paragraph 9 of the complaint that assert that Dinino made a number of unlawful statements to employees between November 1981 and July 1982 were also established. Jess Atkinson testified that Dinino told him on or about November 18 that the labor crew was being laid off up to and including Atkinson over the grievance that he had filed the previous week. Kerin testified that something would happen if grievances did not stop and, shortly thereafter, on November 20, 1981, Dinino announced that the layoffs were taking place because the union steward had been filing grievances "for workers doing our job." Achzet also testified Dinino explained the "guys" were being laid off because of grievances filed by Atkinson. Grandi denied making such statements to Atkinson, Achzet, and Dalen, but I find the testimony of the workers more credible than that of their foreman, Chris Dinino. Paragraph 9(a)(1) was established.

Robert Mayhall testified that a couple of days before the November layoff that Chris Dinino stated to him, while the two of them were working on the carpeting of the ramp that goes into the Camelot building from the north end of the casino, that "everybody was getting laid off up through Jess" and that everyone would have had their jobs if Atkinson had "kept his big mouth shut and butted out." I reject Dinino's assertion that he "didn't make such a statement like that" and find, therefore, that pargraph 9(a)(2) was sustained.

The credible testimony Ronald Achzet gave concerning two telephone conversations he had with Dinino in early 1982 established 8(a)(1) violations as alleged in paragraphs 9(b) and (c) of the complaint. Dinino had told Achzet and Harley Kerin earlier in November 1981 that they were being laid off because of the grievances filed by Jess Atkinson. After being laid off, Achzet telephoned Dinino about possible recall of the laid-off workers the following January and again in March 1982. Dinino responded in the January conversation that Achzet could return "as soon as Jess Atkinson had gotten a job" and told Achzet in March that "they were going to wait for Jess Atkinson's recall rights to run out, which would be a year." Dinino acknowledged having one conversation with Achzet after the November layoffs but denied stating that recalls would not occur for a year, adding that everyone laid off knew that he had "a year hire back rights."

The testimony of Steve Dalen sustained the allegations of paragraphs 9(d) and (e). Dalen said he wrote down the date, April 5, 1982, as the day he was called into a meeting with Connie Kennington and Resort Association Attorney Vincent Helms, about 10 days after he had gone to the NLRB with Harley Kerin. Dinino had told Dalen to go into the meeting and explain that he would have been laid off earlier except for the fact that his wife had been pregnant with twins. Dalen said he explained in the meeting with Kennington and the attorney that others—carpenters, painters, gardeners, and persons in other trades—had been doing "our work." When he was asked if he had gone to the NLRB, he said he "realized who these guys were" and thereafter made no further response to them. Bob Mayhall, who was at the NLRB when Dalen and Kerin visited the Board's office (on March 26), knew that Dalen had given a statement, but Dalen told no one else except possibly his wife.

Dalen testified that he thought Dinino had asked "a few times" if he had gone to the NLRB but had not written down such incidents as he had other events. Dalen recalled, however, that 30 or 40 minutes prior to his meeting with Kennington and the Resort Association attorney, around 10:30 a.m., that Dinino had told him behind the Performing Arts area, where Dalen and Mayhall were unloading chairs from a truck, that Dalen had "better watch" it; that he "might still get laid off"; and that Connie Kennington thought he had gone to the NLRB. Dalen said he took Dinino's words to be a threat—that he should not "testify anymore" or "defend the six people that got laid off." Two days later Dinino told Dalen that he was on the "shit list" and repeated it or another statement—that he was "on the barbecue"—several times thereafter, even up to the time "just before [he] was laid off."

Dinino stated that Dalen's testimony concerning what Dinino had told him in early April 1982—that Kennington thought Dalen had gone to the NLRB and that he should watch out or be laid off—was "ridiculous." While conceding that he had been known to use the word "barbecue" as a joke, he denied ever telling Dalen that he was on the "shit list" or would be laid off for going to the NLRB. Dinino was equivocal about how he knew that Dalen had given a statement to the NLRB; he maintained that it was "general knowledge" that "we had given statements" and that Dalen had told him that he had given a statement "after I'd mentioned it to him." Dalen's testimony was more credible than Dinino's, and I therefore credit the former.

The statements Dinino made to Dalen in early April 1982 and later just prior to his layoff in August of the same year constituted threats and were made, I find, because Respondent believed Dalen had given a statement to the NLRB and might continue to cooperate with that agency. Such statements violated Section 8(a)(4) as well as Section 8(a)(1) as alleged.[30]

2. The layoffs

The disciplining of employees for filing grievances violates the Act. General Motors Corp., 233 NLRB 47 (1977), enfd. 616 F.2d 967 (6th Cir. 1980); Pere Marquette Lodge, 237 NLRB 855 (1978); Ernst Steel Corp., supra. Moreover, the discharge or layoff of employees in order to discriminate against a particular employee is discriminatory as to all such employees. See Arnoldware, Inc., 129 NLRB 228 (1960); Englewood Lumber Co., 130 NLRB 394 (1961); Northwestern Publishing Co., 144 NLRB 1069 (1963), enfd. 343 F.2d 521 (7th Cir. 1965); and Givaudan Corp., 225 NLRB 1272 (1976).

The record persuades me that the grievance Atkinson prepared and signed by him, along with other maintenance employees, on November 12, 1981, triggered the layoff 8 days later, on November 20, 1981, of six employees—Steward Jess Atkinson, Harley Kerin, Maurice McBride, Joseph Washington, Ronald Achzet, and George Nicholson.[31] There is convincing evidence that [30] The General Counsel requests in his brief that I find Respondent made other unlawful statements not specifically alleged in the complaint, but I decline to do so. Such findings would be similar to those made herein, would be cumulative, and would serve no useful purpose.

[31] Respondent treats Dalen as one of six persons laid off in November 1981, contending that his departure was simply deferred because at the time Atwood was on medical leave and Dalen, whose wife was expecting, was kept on to take Atwood's place. Atwood returned to duty, however, on March 12, 1982, and Dalen was not laid off thereafter until August 6, 1982. Respondent maintains that McBride should not be considered as part of the November 1981 layoff as he was "reinstated shortly

Respondent's layoff of the six men was conceived as an effort to make it appear to be a legitimate reduction in force—i.e., in accord with seniority rules—but was actually an act of retaliation against Atkinson for filing the November 12 grievance.[32]

Both Dinino and Grandi, whose statements were attributable to the Respondent,[33] were quite explicit, as several maintenance laborers credibly testified, in stating that the November 12 grievance filed by Atkinson was the reason for the November 20, 1981 layoffs.

Atkinson testified that Dinino told him that he and other maintenance laborers less senior to Atkinson were going to be laid off because of the grievance. Kerin and Achzet both testified that Dinino threatened a layoff over the filing of grievances. On November 20 Dinino told Kerin and Achzet that the layoffs were occurring because of grievances and agreed that "another Hesse situation" was taking place. Dinino indicated to Dalen after the layoff that Atkinson was responsible for six people being out of work by opening "his big mouth" and that the Company was waiting for their recall rights to run out. Mayhall also heard similar messages from Dinino. Dinino told Atwood in March 1982 that Respondent would not recall the laid-off workers but would let their recall rights expire.

Grandi, the head of Aladdin's maintenance, told Kerin, in effect, that all were being laid off because of Atkinson's "smart mouth" and no one would be recalled until Atkinson got another job. Grandi also told Nicholson that a few persons were being let go to get "one guy." Grandi made statements to Dinino in front of Dalen and to Union Business Agent Burrus that indicated no one would be recalled until Atkinson obtained other employment.

While Dinino and Grandi denied telling employees that the November 1981 layoffs were connected with the November 12 grievance filed to protest a work assignment, I credit the employee witnesses over the testimony given by the two officials of Respondent. Both Dinino and Grandi were equivocal witnesses, and each exhibited animus toward work assignment disputes. Grandi conceded that he was upset with Steward Atkinson on Veterans Day 1981 when the latter complained about the engineer's use of a truck and admitted ordering him to get his "ass out of here." Dinino threatened employees a few days before the November 1981 layoffs because of the filing of grievances. Dinino acknowledged that employees in November 1981 were comparing the layoffs, which included the steward who filed the grievance, to "the Hesse situation" wherein seniority had also presented an obstacle. Contrary to Dinino's testimony, I do not believe he took issue with the analogy the employees had drawn but frankly agreed with them that it was applicable to their layoffs. And, as in the Hesse situation, Respondent did not recall the persons laid off in November 1981 (with the exception of McBride) while Atkinson remained unemployed. Grandi told Nicholson that the layoff was to get one person and also remarked to Dalen that the persons who were laid off would be recalled if Atkinson got a job. Grandi's comment to Union Business Agent Burrus about finding a job for Atkinson is consistent with the hotel's plan not to recall the laid-off workers (within a year) unless Atkinson found other employment.

I reject the notion that General Manager Torres was oblivious to the names of individuals who might be laid off and whether they filed a grievance or presented a problem to the hotel. It strains credulity to believe that a person who watches costs so closely as Torres does would have been unaware who was protesting work assignments and giving statements to the NLRB.[34]

I also reject Respondent's assertion that the decision to lay off specifically Atkinson, Washington, Kerin, Achzet, Nicholson, and Dalen had been made at least 6 weeks prior to the November 11 confrontation. Perhaps consideration was given in September 1981 to make cutbacks in the future as some of the renovation work was winding down. I have no doubt, however, but what the protest and resulting grievance over the use of a truck by the engineers to move a dance floor on November 11 brought about the layoff of maintenance laborers Atkinson and five other less senior to him (except Dinino). After the November 1981 layoff, Respondent used other crafts to perform maintenance laborers' work. The number of maintenance employees actually increased after the layoff. In early 1982 construction laborers were hired and utilized to perform functions that would have otherwise been done by maintenance laborers. There is no doubt about the fact that the cutback of maintenance laborers was out of proportion to the layoff of other crafts.

after the November 20th layoff." R. Exh. 5 shows McBride was hired March 15, 1978, and laid off as a laborer on November 20, 1981, and reinstated December 9, 1981 (with subsequent as well as earlier layoffs and reinstatements). Respondent's list of layoffs, R. Exh. 7, does not list McBride. I am convinced, in any event, that McBride was part of a sham layoff which was calculated to make it appear appropriate to reach Steward Atkinson. The amount of backpay due McBride, albeit small in amount, should be determined in the compliance stage.

[32] Of course where layoffs are motivated by employees' protected activity, as is the case here, that ends the inquiry, even though there may have been an economic reason for them. See Teamsters Local 357 v. NLRB, 365 U.S. 667 (1961).

[33] I reject Respondent's assertion that Dinino's remarks are not imputable to Respondent. The maintenance laborers regarded Dinino as a spokesman for management, even though such determination need not be based on his supervisory status. See Helena Laboratories Corp., 225 NLRB 257 (1976), modified on other grounds 557 F.2d 1183 (5th Cir. 1977); also Aircraft Plating Co., 213 NLRB 664 (1974). The record establishes that he was a supervisor and an agent of the management of the hotel. The record does not portray Dinino as a person "plagued by conflicting loyalties," as Respondent contends. The "Montgomery Ward doctrine"—that "the Board has generally refused to hold an employer responsible for the antiunion conduct of a supervisor included in the unit, in the absence of evidence that the employer encouraged, authorized, or ratified the supervisor's activities or acted in such manner as to lead employees reasonably to believe that the supervisor was acting for and on behalf of management," Montgomery Ward & Co., 115 NLRB 645 (1956), enfd. 242 F.2d 497 (2d Cir. 1957), cert. denied 355 U.S. 829 (1957)—has no application in the instant case. There is no evidentiary basis here for concluding that employees regarded Dinino as being "a fellow employee" or as "one of themselves" as was the situation in Montgomery Ward. The evidence is to the contrary. Not only did the employees regard Dinino as aligned with management, management considered him as one of its own and protected him from the November 1981 layoff on that basis.

[34] The supervisor's knowledge of unlawful activity is attributable to the respondent in any event. See Panchito's v. NLRB, 581 F.2d 204 (9th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Fremont Mfg. Co., 558 F.2d 889 (8th Cir. 1977); and Montgomery Ward & Co., supra.

I thus agree with the General Counsel that the real reason for the November 1981 layoff was to get rid of Atkinson and that Respondent's claim that the layoffs were made only for economic reasons was pretextual. General Manager Torres himself testified that he "didn't really get concerned until April 1982 because business was still fairly good" up to that time.

Respondent's economic defense has more validity as to Dalen's layoff, but still falls short. At the time of his layoff Respondent's renovation program was at an end or nearly so, and other employees were laid off about the same time. The record nevertheless persuades me that Dalen was laid off because of his protected activities—for giving a statement to the NLRB and his participation in the preparation of a grievance on July 30, 1982.

Respondent did not establish that Dalen would have been discharged in the absence of such protected activities. See Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), and NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

Certain of Respondent's authorities deserve comment. None of them require dismissal of the allegations relating to the layoffs in this case, however, as Respondent suggests. In Regency at the Rodeway, 255 NLRB 961 (1981), the administrative law judge (whose decision was modified in respects not relevant here) was persuaded that the decision to reduce two employees was made prior to the onset of their union activities and for valid reasons. The judge was persuaded that one employee was discharged in fact "for reasons of economy" (by a supervisor who was under pressure to reduce the staff and, later regretting it, hired a replacement to "blunt the employee hostility") and the other employee for misconduct. The dismissal of two probationary employees in Rio Grande Valley Gas Co., 151 NLRB 489 (1965), was found lawful by the trial examiner because he was persuaded that both were let go "strictly on the basis of their work, with no knowledge of the supervisor's union animus or the identity of the employee who had filed charges against the employer." The 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) charges in Kinter Bros., Inc., 172 NLRB 199 (1968), were dismissed because the trial examiner was not convinced that the respondent employer had either laid off or reduced the hours of work of a meat wrapper (who later rejected offers to return to work) because she had testified in a hearing or engaged in union activity. In American Display Mfg. Co., 259 NLRB 21 (1981), the layoffs were occasioned by a customer's request that the production and delivery of a large order be delayed. Most of the layoffs were determined by seniority and others were made for valid reasons (i.e., Luquis, because she had given notice of an intention to quit; Nieves, because of a mistake as to her seniority and without any discriminatory intent; and Pinto, because of absenteeism). In General Electric Corp., 256 NLRB 753 (1981), the administrative law judge dismissed the complaint, including allegations that all of the electricians on a project had been dismissed because the shop steward brought in the union business agent to demand a public apology by the site manager for accusing the shop steward of pilfering. The judge found that the layoffs were for business considerations and were not pretextual. A finding that the layoffs were made in an attempt to get rid of the steward "on the state of the record" in the case "would be mere speculation," the judge said.[35]

Respondent's officials admittedly knew after April 5, 1982, that Dalen had provided a statement to the NLRB. Dinino reminded Dalen on a number of occasions from that day forward until laid off that his continued employment was not to be taken for granted: Dinino warned Dalen that he was on the "shit list" or that he was "on the barbecue." Dalen's time ran out when he, Mayhall, and Atwood protested Dinino's allowing the stagehands to use the truck on July 30. Within a matter of days Respondent moved to lay off Dalen. What Dinino stated to Terry Atwood after Dalen's layoff—that Dalen would never work again at the Aladdin because he had filed charges with the NLRB—leaves no doubt about the fact that the affidavit that he gave to the NLRB was significantly involved in the decision to lay him off and was reason enough not to ever rehire him.[36]

I find that the statement Dalen gave to the NLRB motivated Respondent in laying him off on August 12, 1982, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(4) of the Act.[37] I also find that Dalen's layoff, like the layoffs made in November 1981, were in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by

(a) Threatening to lay off maintenance employees because of the filing of a grievance.

(b) Telling employees they are being laid off because Steward Jess Atkinson had filed a grievance.

---

[35] Respondent contends in its brief, citing General Electric Corp., that the protected activity which the complaint relates to the layoffs was so insignificant that no discriminatory animus can be found. Says Respondent: "The stakes raised by the two grievances were [too] nominal compared to the costs of unlawful retaliation for the financially troubled Aladdin." But the work dispute protests (as well as Dalen's NLRB affidavit) were obviously taken quite seriously by Respondent, and its representatives articulated as much to its employees.

[36] Atwood testified that Dinino also threatened him with termination if he testified in a Labor Board proceeding. The General Counsel has requested that I find such statement also violative of the Act. Respondent has objected to such request on the basis that the statement was beyond the complaint. I decline to make the finding, however, as it would be cumulative and would provide no basis for any further relief.

[37] Sec. 8(a)(4), which proscribes discrimination because an employee "has filed charges or given testimony under the Act," has been given a broad interpretation. See NLRB v. Scrivener, 405 U.S. 117 (1972), where the Supreme Court held an employer in violation of Sec. 8(a)(4) for discharging employees who, like Dalen, had signed affidavits but had not filed charges or testified prior to their dismissal. The complaint herein alleges that Dalen's layoff was occasioned by "filing charges or giving testimony under the Act," but it is apparent that Respondent was not misled by such pleading.

(c) Telling an employee that laid-off workers would be recalled when the employee who filed a grievance, Steward Jess Atkinson, obtained other employment.

(d) Stating in the presence of Steve Dalen in effect that there would be no recall of maintenance workers while the employee who filed a grievance, Steward Jess Atkinson, was unemployed and subject to a recall.

(e) Telling employees that they were being laid off because of grievances filed by Steward Jess Atkinson.

(f) Telling an employee that maintenance employees are being laid off because Steward Jess Atkinson had filed a grievance.[38]

(g) Telling an employee over the telephone that employees would be recalled when the employee who filed a grievance obtained other employment.

(h) Telling an employee over the telephone that Respondent would recall laid-off maintenance employees after Steward Jess Atkinson's recall rights expire.

4. Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act by

(a) Threatening an employee by telling him that an official thought he had gone to the National Labor Relations Board and that he should watch it and might still get laid off.

(b) Telling an employee known to have given a statement to the National Labor Relations Board that he was on "the shit list" and "on the barbecue."

5. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by laying off Jess Atkinson, Harley Kerin, Maurice McBride, Joseph Washington, Ronald Achzet, and George Nicholson, because a grievance protesting the assignment of work to engineers was filed.

6. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act by laying off Steven Dalen because he gave a statement to the National Labor Relations Board and because he participated in the preparation of a grievance protesting the assignment of work to stagehands.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain corrective action to effectuate the policies of the Act. Having found that Respondent laid off Jess Atkinson, Harley Kerin, Maurice McBride, Joseph Washington, Ronald Achzet, George Nicholson, and Steven Dalen in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer full and immediate reinstatment to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, as well as payment of backpay for earnings lost by them as a result of the discrimination against them. Backpay shall be computed with interest as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950); Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962); and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). The fact that Dalen's layoff also violated Section 8(a)(4) of the Act does not require any additional relief as to him. Sinclair Glass Co., 188 NLRB 362 (1971), enfd. 465 F.2d 209 (7th Cir. 1972).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[39]

ORDER

The Respondent, N & T Associates, Inc., d/b/a Aladdin Hotel and Casino, Las Vegas, Nevada, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Laying off employees or otherwise discriminating against them for filing or preparing grievances.

(b) Laying off employees or otherwise discriminating against them for giving a statement to the National Labor Relations Board.

(c) Threatening to lay off employees for filing a grievance.

(d) Telling employees that laid-off employees will be recalled when one or more of them obtained other employment or when the recall rights of one or more of them expire.

(e) Telling an employee that he is on the "shit list," on the "barbecue," or otherwise threatening the employee for going to the National Labor Relations Board.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act:

(a) Offer Jess Atkinson, Harley Kerin, Maurice McBride, Joseph Washington, Ronald Achzet, George Nicholson, and Steven Dalen immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Las Vegas, Nevada place of business copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[40]

[38] The violations referred to in subpars. (e) and (f) are essentially the same although based on statements made by Dinino to different employees.

[39] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[40] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER DENYING MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION AND TO REOPEN THE RECORD

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 30 April 1984 the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding,[1] in which the decertification petitions were reinstated and the case remanded to the Regional Director for further processing. Thereafter, on 9 May 1984 the Union filed a motion for reconsideration and to reopen the record. On 24 May Petitioners filed an answer to the motion.

The Union urges in its motion that the Board's decision was in error in referring to the absence of any evidence that the Employer and the Union agreed to continue to bargain on a multistore basis after the expiration of the recent agreement. The Union asserts that, rather, the Employer entered into a multistore contract with the Union following the Employer's withdrawal from multiemployer bargaining. This contract was allegedly executed on 14 February 1983, 2-1/2 months after the petitions were filed and a month after the hearing in this case. The Union moves to reopen the record to receive this exhibit, which the Union asserts covers the same Employer's stores covered by the multiemployer contract, including the two stores that are the subject of the decertification petitions.

The Union asserts that the record was silent as to this recent contract because under existing Board law "a unit appropriate in a decertification election must be coextensive with either the unit previously certified or the one recognized in the existing contract unit," citing W. T. Grant Co., 179 NLRB 670 (1969); Goldeen's Inc., 134 NLRB 770, 775 (1961). The Union states that in view of the prior multistore, multiemployer association bargaining history established on the record, and since the hearing was held prior to the expiration of the then existing contract, the most recent agreement "which had not yet been negotiated" was not presented into evidence at the hearing. Further, referring to Goldeen's, supra, it notes that the Board refused to direct an election in a single employer unit based on a decertification petition following a dissolution of a multiemployer association, because it was unable to say that the single employer unit was the currently recognized unit. Here, the Union argues, the Board incorrectly inferred that the parties had not negotiated, let alone reached agreement on, a multistore contract. The Union contends that the existence of the current agreement covering the multistore unit should serve as a bar to the instant decertification petitions. We are not persuaded by the Union's arguments, and for the reasons set forth below, which further clarify our previous decision in this case, deny the Union's motion for reconsideration and to reopen the record.

It is undisputed that the Employer timely withdrew from multiemployer bargaining and that the decertification petitions for two of the Employer's stores were timely filed with respect to the expiring multiemployer agreement. Thus, there was no contract bar to the processing of the petitions. Further, as our initial decision finds, the Regional Director erroneously relied on the multistore bargaining history which had transpired under the multiemployer bargaining in dismissing the petitions. As we stated, once the Employer properly withdrew from that bargaining arrangement the considerations for grouping its eight represented stores together no longer existed. There was no prior Board certification of the eight-store unit, no particular geographical cohesiveness, and, in fact, the multiemployer contract had been applied to new stores of the Employer on an individual basis, upon a demonstration of union majority. In these circumstances, we found that upon the timely withdrawal from the multiemployer bargaining, and in the absence of a multistore contract or multistore recognition by the Employer shown on the record, the single-store units sought by the petitions were presumptively appropriate.

We believe that the result reached in our prior decision was correct and, contrary to the assertion of the Union, that it does not do violence to Board law regarding the scope of units in decertification elections. Although in the usual case, where only single employer bargaining has occurred, the previously certified or currently recognized unit for decertification is easily identifiable as the appropriate one, here the recognized unit and hence the proper unit for decertification is in a state of transition. We are unwilling to hold that during this period the employees are deprived of their statutory right to select, or to refrain from selecting, a bargaining representative. Thus, upon the Employer's timely withdrawal from the multiemployer association, the

Union has a presumption of continued majority status among the Employer's employees;[2] the Employer is free, as we indicated in our prior decision, to make a reassessment of the scope of the appropriate bargaining unit, particularly where, as here, the multistore grouping under the prior multiemployer agreement was not one which the Board would originally certify; and the employees should likewise be free to utilize the Board's processes, including the right to file a decertification petition in an appropriate unit to question the Union's continued representation. There is no doubt that a petition filed by another labor organization seeking certification on a single-store basis would raise a question concerning representation and would have been processed. So, too, the timely filing of the decertification petitions on behalf of the employees at two separate stores, in which the Union had a continued presumption of majority status, properly raised a question concerning representation in those presumptively appropriate units.[3] To hold otherwise would subordinate the rights of the employees under Section 9(c)(1) of the Act to those seeking representation.[4]

ORDER

Accordingly, the reinstatement of the petitions was proper in our view, and the Union's motion for reconsideration and to reopen the record is denied.

[2] Jim Kelley's Tahoe Nugget, 227 NLRB 357 (1976) (Member Walther dissenting); see also NLRB v. Silver Spur Casino, 623 F.2d 571 (9th Cir. 1980). Member Hunter notes that the record shows that the Union here demonstrated a majority at each location. On this basis, he agrees that a question concerning representation exists here. He therefore finds it unnecessary to reach the question of whether a presumption of majority status survives an Employer's withdrawal from multiemployer association bargaining and he does not pass on the continued validity of the above-cited cases.

[3] As previously noted, Member Hunter relies on the Union's having demonstrated a majority at each location as supporting a question concerning representation.

[4] To the extent this result is inconsistent with that in Goldeen's Inc., supra, that case is hereby overruled.

Airtron, Division of Litton Systems, Inc. and Patricia Kenyon. Case 22-CA-10877

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 3 September 1982 Administrative Law Judge Robert T. Snyder issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Airtron, a Division of Litton Systems, Inc., Morris Plains, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by discharging employee Pat Kenyon. The General Counsel established a prima facie case of a violation by showing that Kenyon engaged in protected concerted activities, that the Respondent had knowledge of and expressed displeasure with Kenyon's activities, and that the discharge followed soon after the protected activity. Further, the Respondent failed to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place in the absence of the protected conduct. As found by the judge, the Respondent seized on Kenyon's alleged release of confidential information as the basis for the discharge. In fact, as the judge further found, Kenyon did not make the alleged disclosure. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent's discharge of Kenyon violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. We need not pass on the judge's discussion, based on an arguendo assumption, of the ramifications if Kenyon had revealed the Respondent's information.

Subsequent to the judge's decision, the Board issued Our Way, Inc., 268 NLRB 394 (1983), in which it overruled T.R.W. Bearings, 257 NLRB 442 (1981), relied on by the judge, and returned to the principles set forth in Essex International, 211 NLRB 749 (1974). Nonetheless, as the Respondent's rule prohibited solicitation during "working hours," we find under Our Way that the rule was presumptively invalid. Further, since the Respondent failed to clarify its presumptively invalid rules, its maintenance was unlawful.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT T. SNYDER, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to a charge filed on May 22, 1981, by Patricia Kenyon (Kenyon), a complaint in this proceeding was issued on July 6, 1981, alleging that Airtron, Division of Litton Systems, Inc. (Airtron or Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act in that within the six months prior to the filing of the charge and thereafter to date,[1] including in March 1981, Respondent has maintained, and enforced, an invalid no-solicitation rule, and that on May 19, 1981, it discharged Kenyon because she engaged in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or mutual aid or protection. Respondent filed an answer denying the substantive allegations of violations of the Act. Full hearing was held on May 13, 1982, after the record opened briefly to consider and grant an adjournment request on March 17, 1982.

On the entire record in this case, from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after having considered the briefs filed by the General Counsel[2] and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is a Delaware corporation. The unincorporated division involved in this proceeding has its principal office and place of business in Morris Plains, New Jersey, where it maintains a facility engaged in the business of manufacture, sale, and distribution of microwave components, laser crystals, simulated jewelry, and related products. At all times material herein, Respondent annually caused to be manufactured, sold, and distributed from the Morris Plains facility products valued in excess of $50,000, of which products valued in excess of $50,000 were shipped from the facility in interstate commerce directly to States of the United States other than the State of New Jersey. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Respondent employs several hundred employees at the Morris Plains, New Jersey facility, including office and plant clerical employees and a complement of production employees. They are not organized.

Respondent admits that about June 25, 1979, it promulgated the following rule:

> It shall be considered a violation of company rules for an employee to:

[1] General Counsel clarified that by the allegation related to the maintenance of the no-solicitation rule he did not intend the language therein describing the rule's promulgation on June 25, 1979, as an element of the violation but was only attacking the rule's maintenance within the 10(b) period.

[2] The motion to correct the transcript filed with the General Counsel's brief is hereby granted; the corrections it embodies have been physically made on the original transcript, and the motion as approved has been physically attached to the transcript with a notation thereon noting its adoption.

v) Solicit or canvass for any purpose without Personnel approval, such as selling chances or merchandise during working hours.

According to Personnel Manager Paul Csigi, the rule was in effect in 1981—it had never been rescinded but neither had it been enforced by the Company. In 1979, on a review and update of company personnel policies which had commenced in 1978, Respondent mailed summaries of company policies as they appeared in policy manuals to all employees at their homes and provided them to all new employees as they were thereafter employed. Rule v is contained in a memorandum to all employees dated June 29, 1979, and entitled "Up-date of Airtron Policies #3." Rule v is one of a series of 23 rules specifically set forth in this memorandum and preceded by the heading "Disciplinary Action—all employees 6/25/79" and the statement "Airtron recognizes the necessity of establishing and maintaing regulations for the acceptable conduct of employees and to provide for fair, constructive and consistent disciplinary action whenever an employee fails to observe such company rules and regulations."[3] The list of disciplinary rules is immediately followed by a description of what Respondent agrees may be characterized as a "progressive disciplinary policy," that is, a policy permitting but not requiring, depending on the infraction, a series of progressively more severe disciplinary measures from verbal warning to written warning, suspension, and, finally, discharge, normally to be meted out by the supervisor but, in the case of serious offenses, with consultation of the industrial relations (personnel) director to ascertain the appropriate disciplinary action.

With respect to the no-solicitation rules' enforcement, the evidence appears to bear out Personnel Managers Csigi's assertion that it was not enforced, at least until March 1981.[4] Before that date, all nature of solicitations of employees, both before and during working time, to sell raffle chances, combinations or numbers in sports pools, home products, and food stuffs and even one to sign a petition to replace an employee used soda machine dispensing drinks in paper cups with one dispensing canned sodas,[5] were conducted with managerial and supervisory knowledge and consent and even, in some respects, with their participation, and without any attempt to enforce the rule.

A few months before the Airtron personnel policy memorandum containing the disciplinary rules was issued to employees, another memorandum, titled "Update of Airtron Policies—No. 2" and dated April 26, 1979, was issued. Among other subjects, it dealt with Respondent's sick pay policy for hourly, weekly, and salaried employees. That policy provided, inter alia, for an accumulation of a maximum number of paid sick days by months and years, and permitted the accrual and payment of unused sick days on certain occasions and in accordance with a certain formula for hourly and weekly employees. This memorandum also contained a policy related to storm closings. The gist of it, relevant to this proceeding, was that on those occasions that the Company found it necessary to close the plant and suspend normal operations, lost time up to two continuous days per emergency for hourly and weekly employees would be paid from their accumulated sick pay but any such lost time would not affect the good attendance bonus. There is good reason to believe that the implications of this storm closings policy did not make much impression on the employees, generally, at the time this policy was adopted and made known.

On Thursday, March 5, because of a snow storm, the plant closed at 2 p.m. and all employees, except for a few who were permitted to finish certain work tasks, were sent home. Kenyon, who worked from 8 a.m. to 4:45 p.m., had asked to remain at work but had been denied permission to do so. By memorandum dated Monday, March 9, Personnel Manager Csigi notified all employees as follows:

> Due to snow storm closing Thursday, March 5, 1981, any lost time will be paid from accumulated sick pay as per storm closing policy.
> Should you not wish to be paid from sick pay please notify your supervisor who will notify the Payroll Department.

Among other employees, Kenyon's lost time was made up from her accumulated sick pay.

Employee Kenyon, one of two accounts payable clerks, employed since January 15 1979, after thinking over the Company's policy, came to the conclusion it was not fair and that she was going to do something about it. Sometime after the March 9 notice, she went to Csigi's office, stood in the doorway, and told him, "Paul . . . I think the storm closing policy stinks." According to Kenyon, he replied, "I agree with you, Pat, it's unfair." Kenyon continued: "And, I said, 'I'm really upset about it.' I said, 'I'd like to start a petition.' And he said, 'Go ahead.'" She then left Csigi's office.

Csigi agreed that Kenyon's testimony relating this conversation was accurate for the most part. He disputed Kenyon's version of his response, claiming he said, "Fine, do what you have to do." This conveys, in substance, the import of Kenyon's version of his last response. Csigi did not specifically dispute his personal agreement with Kenyon's opinion that the policy was unfair. Even if he had, I credit Kenyon that Csigi, in fact, voiced agreement with Kenyon. I conclude that Csigi, who started in his position for Respondent as recently as October 1, 1979, was the most truthful of Respondent's witnesses, and took care to testify as accurately as possible. He was not asked about his initial response to Kenyon on direct and, I conclude, consciously avoided disputing Kenyon's attribution to him of his initial response to her while on cross-examination.

[3] Omitted from the list of disciplinary rules is any mention of the alleged ground for the discharge of Kenyon on May 19, 1981, on which Respondent relies; to wit, disclosure of confidential financial information outside the accounting department. This ground is unrelated to Rule r), another among the 23 disciplinary rules promulagted on June 25, 1979, which prohibits disclosure to any person or organization of confidential information which would weaken the competitive position of the Company.

[4] All dates hereinafter shall refer to 1981 unless otherwise noted.

[5] This undated petition, handwritten on blank paper and signed by 141 employees, including Kenyon, was initiated by employee Paul Jacobs at some unspecified time between January 1979 and March 1981.

Shortly after her talk with Csigi, Kenyon initiated a petition designed to convey the employees' dissatisfaction with Respondent's storm closing policy. In contrast to the soda machine petition, Kenyon arranged to have the petition typed on Airtron letterhead. It stated the following in capital letters:

> We feel strongly that the storm closing policy as it is now written penalizes the hourly and weekly employee. When the announcement was made on March 5th that Airtron was closing the building at 2 p.m., nothing was mentioned at that time that the employees who were being sent home would not be paid for the remainder of the day. Those who wished to stay and complete the work day were not given the opportunity to make that decision for themselves. In effect, Airtron locked us out and is now using one of our benefits to pay us.

Kenyon divided up the solicitation with Paul Jacobs. Hers is the first signature. A total of 92 signatures of employees were obtained and take up three full columns below the typed petition and 1-1/3 columns on a second attached blank page. They included names of employees in all plant locations, including production employees. Jacobs solicited primarily the production workers. According to Kenyon, and not disputed by Respondent, she personally solicited roughly half of the signatures during her own work breaks including lunchtime and while on worktime both at her own work cubicle, in the cafeteria, and while on work trips through the plant.

On March 13, Kenyon and Jacobs took the completed petition to Csigi's office. The employees handed the petition to Csigi and told him they would like Donald Lepore, president of Airtron, to see it and requested that they get some sort of answer. Csigi said okay. The same day, Kenyon received a 6-month evaluation of her work performance from Edward Griffin, cost accounting manager and her immediate supervisor. She saw but was not given a copy of her review, which described her performance as "fully satisfactory." Following her work review, she told Griffin she had started a petition to protest Respondent's storm closing policy and had turned it in to Csigi. Kenyon testified Griffin responded, "Pat, why?" Kenyon then testified she explained why, that "we felt it was unfair to the employees to have their sick time docked." Griffin did not deny making this statement, and I credit Kenyon.

Kenyon was a highly credible witness. Her answers on direct and cross-examination were invariably direct, responsive, and thoughtful and, when she was asked to repeat on cross-examination conversations she had testified to on direct, she did so consistently, accurately, and confidentially. Not once did she lose her composure even when placed under stress by a vigorous cross-examination. Her explanation as to what on the surface appears to be a discrepancy between her testimony and pretrial affidavit was typical of her direct, intelligent, and trustworthy demeanor. Respondent's counsel pressed her to admit to a conflict between her affidavit in which she denies ever being warned or reprimanded as an employee and her trial testimony in which she related an incident which occurred in early April following the submission of the petition to Csigi and the conversation with Griffin. According to Kenyon, Griffin called her into Respondent's board room. They were alone. He told her, "Pat, Mr. Lepore was very upset over the petition. He thought it was an extreme action, no more petitions, Pat." Kenyon testified she replied, "I can't say that," to which statement Griffin did not respond.

During cross-examination, when asked whether she had ever received a reprimand for circulating the petition, Kenyon testified that she had when Griffin spoke to her as described above. Later, when given an opportunity, which she sought, to explain the apparent discrepancy with her sworn pretrial statement, Kenyon stated that, at the time she gave the affidavit to the Board agent, they were discussing her work performance reviews and the statement in her affidavit related to such reviews and the time before the petition was started, and further, that until questioned as to whether the early April meeting with Griffin constituted a warning or reprimand she was not even sure it could be so termed. I find this explanation totally satisfactory and more than sufficient to negate Respondent's claim implied in its brief at pages 6–7 that Kenyon's credibility as a witness was thereby impeached.

Griffin acknowledged on cross-examination that at the early April meeting he held with Kenyon he told her the company president thought the petition was an extreme action but denied he also told her that company president was upset or that he also said no more petitions. Griffin also acknowledged he was aware at the time that Kenyon had instigated the petition. In this conflict, I also credit Kenyon. In spite of Griffin's denial on cross-examination, I find that Griffin believed that his own evaluation was affected by Kenyon's actions, that what Kenyon had done was a reflection on his supervision, and that he sought the opportunity of the meeting with Kenyon to attempt to foreclose any further concerted conduct on her part. It further appears, and I infer, that the meeting was not Griffin's own idea. Griffin's own supervisor, Vice President of Finance Robert Guglielmi, had informed Griffin of Company President Lepore's displeasure with Kenyon's conduct. Furthermore, during the same time frame that Griffin spoke with Kenyon, he was also meeting individually with each of the employees he supervised to review with them the subject of a two-page memorandum issued to all supervisors by Personnel Manager Csigi under date of March 24, dealing with the storm closing policy, and which Csigi had thereafter discussed with the Airtron supervisors at several group meetings in order to advise them how to present the subject matter to the individual employees.

After first reporting the filing of the petition by a group of Airtron employees who felt the closing of the plant the previous Thursday locked them out and resulted in the removal of a benefit when they were paid out of sick pay, the memorandum went on to described the policy as fair and laid out the thinking behind it. It further reported that the policy had been distributed to all employees on April 26, 1979, and to all new hires after that date, and to date "has not once been questioned through any channel of communication, i.e., group meetings, communicator, supervisor, etc." The memorandum went on:

> By presenting a petition, these employees bypassed the most important link in the chain of command, the supervisor. All of our policies are subject to revision. By communicating their opinions to their supervisor, employees have a voice in this policy revision.
> Many employees expressed the feeling they did not have the option of staying and working because they did not have sick time. We must make it clear that we close the plant for the safety of all involved, and we will allow people to remain in the plant only if the work they are doing cannot be interrupted, such as someone in the middle of a coating run, and only if there is adequate supervision.

The memorandum concluded by asking each supervisor to speak to those people who signed the petition and make the points previously discussed which were then enumerated. Among them was the item that the supervisors should encourage employees to bring problems to their supervisor.

In his individual meetings with employees, among other things, Griffin stated he told them "that the petition as received, that they were looking for—the lines of communication should be directly from their—from them to their supervisor and from the supervisor up above; that there is an open door policy which we can follow."

The other senior accounts-payable clerk besides Kenyon at the time, Rita Petrozzo, corroborated Griffin's testimony on the individual supervisory meetings with respect to the storm closing protest petition. Petrozzo, who was called alone into Griffin's office several weeks after the petition had been turned in, in late March or early April, reported, inter alia, that Griffin had advised her that in the future "you were to come to your supervisor with any problems." It also appears that all Airtron employees who signed the petition were individually addressed by their supervisors in accordance with the memorandum.

Kenyon and Petrozzo shared a cubicle which opened on a large room in which approximately eight other accounting personnel were employed. As senior accounts-payable clerks they paid invoices for materials that Airtron purchased and filed paid bills. This work entailed matching invoices to purchase orders and checking into any problems which arose with the various transactions. Kenyon, in particular, picked up the purchase orders every morning in the receiving department.

Just outside their cubicle were filing cabinets which housed purchase records for the current and immediately preceding fiscal years, 1981 and 1980. The records included copies of the suppliers' invoices and vouchers evidencing payment for the merchandise. Files for earlier years starting with 1979 were stored in a separate loft area above the stock room. Stored in these cabinets were the records, among others, of the cost borne by Respondent of an annual weekend spent by Respondent's key 25 executives those 8 or 9 who reported to Company President Lepore and their first-line deputies—and their spouses (called the Plan 1 meeting) reviewing the financial plan for the next year, setting targets, and socializing. For the past 3 years, the weekend meeting had taken place in May at hotels in various resort areas. In 1979, it was held at Shawnee on the Delaware, in 1980 at Hershey, Pennsylvania, and in 1981 it was scheduled for Atlantic City, New Jersey. The 1979 trip cost the Respondent roughly $14,000, the 1980 trip cost the same, and the 1981 trip cost approximately $18,000. The filed material for the 1979 and 1980 weekends comprised single vouchers evidencing Respondent's payment of the total hotel invoices.[6]

The evidence establishes that Kenyon, as well as Petrozzo and other accounting personnel, and others who asked for permission for a particular purpose, usually reviewing their own expense reports, and including Ed Bukofsky, manager of the purchasing department, had access to these accounting files, both current and those stored in the loft. The evidence also shows that Kenyon probably filed the vouchers relating to the 1980 Plan 1 trip to Hershey, Pennsylvania, but that the invoices relating to the Plan 1 meeting did not come to her for payment but to someone else in the accounting department, since she arranged payment of job cost invoices related to materials purchased by Airtron, and not those related to such fixed indirect costs as freight and utilities, and often executive trip invoices were forwarded directly to the personnel department or the company president's office.

None of the accounting files were marked confidential and they were not locked. Also, as earlier noted, no policy or rule distributed to employees prohibited disclosure of financial information to unauthorized personnel or those who would not normally deal with the information, although according to Robert Guglielmi, vice president of finance, when hired, accounting employees were informed that all financial information was confidential.[7]

Late on Monday, May 18, Joseph LaSchiavo, vice president of manufacturing, told Guglielmi that he had learned from Ed Bukofsky that production employees on the shop floor were circulating information about the cost of the management trip and they had received it from Mattie Kitchen, a receiving clerk who worked in an area adjacent to the production area. The 1981 weekend Plan 1 meeting at Atlantic City the weekend of May 16 and 17 had just been held.

[6] The record is unclear as to whether the individual participants filed expense reports covering their attendance and proportion of hotel expenses incurred at the conference.

[7] I credit Kenyon's testimony that she did not recall ever having been told before the day of her discharge that she could be discharged for passing on confidential information and that she was not made aware of any such prohibition and never gave any thought to one. Employee Petrozzo also had never been formally advised that the executive Plan 1 meeting information was confidential although it may have been stated in some informal way. Thus, it appears that whatever effort Respondent made to alert accounting employees at their hire to restrictions on financial dislcosure was not effective or memorable. This is confirmed by Respondent's failure to include this restriction in its extensive list of disciplinary rules initially distributed in 1979.

Kitchen was called in Tuesday morning, May 19, by Bukofsky, her supervisor. According to Kitchen, Bukofsky told her he knew that she had information concerning a trip, that the company president was very annoyed about it, and that it was really none of her business what Lepore did for the executives. He proceeded to ask how she had gotten that information and Kitchen said she had no access to any information such as that in her purchase orders and that the information had been revealed to her.[9] This ended the interview.

Bukofsky did not testify. Apparently, his meeting with Kitchen had been directed by higher authority. That morning Guglielmi and Griffin met together and arranged to question Kenyon and Petrozzo to determine if they had disclosed the information to Kitchen.

Kenyon was called in first. According to Guglielmi, he asked her if she had given out any information concerning the meeting and she indicated that she had not. According to Griffin, who was also present, Guglielmi referred to cost information and Kenyon denied giving it out. Guglielmi also stated that a breach of financial information was cause for termination. According to Kenyon, she was called in to Griffin's office just after her mid morning break around 10 a.m. Guglielmi told her that Mattie Kitchen was shouting her mouth off about the company trip. Mattie claimed there was information given to her by accounts payable about the cost of the trip. He then asked if she knew anything about it. Kenyon replied, "Well, I might have been bitching to Mattie about the fact that management goes on these trips while the employees make diddlybob." Guglielmi then told her that giving out confidential information is a reason for dismissal. He asked if she understood that and Kenyon said yes.[9] She was then told she could leave.[10]

As related by Kenyon, during the prior week, before the weekend management trip, while on her daily visit to the receiving department to pick up purchase orders, she had a conversation with Kitchen during which the subject of the management trip came up. Kenyon had been discussing a serious personal problem and Kitchen offered her the use of a trailer she had in Pennsylvania. At some point their talk turned to the upcoming management trip, a subject of general knowledge among the employees, and Kenyon made the remark she readily disclosed to Guglielmi and Griffin. Kenyon denied that she disclosed or ever learned the cost of the 1981 trip[11] or that she revealed the specific dollar cost of any prior management trip. Kitchen, who also testified about the conversation as a witness called by Respondent, said that prior to the Atlantic City trip, while in her office, Kenyon said "that they were going on a trip again and—the executives, and she also proceeded to tell me about a trip that they had taken prior to that, and the cost of the trip."

I do not credit Kitchen's testimony that Kenyon told her the cost of a prior year's Plan 1 meeting. Kitchen was an extremely hostile witness to the General Counsel and revealed as well an evident concern with the security of her own position with Respondent which she had held for 10 years, 9 years as receiving clerk. On Respondent's direct examination of her, Kitchen characterized her initial conversation with Bukofsky on May 19 as a reprimand, first explaining on cross-examination that this meant she had been scolded and then later changing this to having been told that if ever anything like that would happen again she could lose her job. Thus, if Kitchen is to be believed, her long-term career with Respondent had been placed in jeopardy. She revealed that, when she appeared under subpoena by the General Counsel on the hearing date which was ultimately adjourned, she informed then counsel for the General Counsel she would plead the fifth amendment, and that later, when contacted by counsel for the General Counsel who later tried the case, she had Csigi tell the counsel she would not meet him. When she ultimately did meet him she asked if Csigi had told him she would not see him and stated that she did not need to tell him anything when asked to fill him in on some of her statements.[12]

Aside from the conflict in Kitchen's testimony to which I have already alluded, Kitchen also varied her testimony on the matter of her meeting with management which immediately followed the initial questioning of Kenyon and Petrozzo.

Kitchen testified that after her talk with Bukofsky early that day, later in the morning of May 19, she was called to Griffin's office. When she arrived, Guglielmi, Griffin, Bukosky, and Csigi were present. Gugliemi asked her where she had received the information. She said she was not there to get anybody into any problem or cause any friction, but after being questioned again she said there was only one person who came to her

[9] Kitchen's testimony in this regard does not fully corroborate Guglielmi's assertion that he had been told the cost of the management meeting had come from accounts payable. Kitchen herself did not reveal the source of whatever it was she disclosed on the plant floor on her initial questioning by Bukofsky. Thus, management's decision to immediately question the senior accounts payable clerks could not have been based on any accusations by any other employee.

[9] In spite of this reply, Kenyon credibly testified she was not previously aware of this ground for discharge.

[10] Petrozzo, next questioned, denied talking with Kitchen or ever learning the cost of the management-supervisor weekend.

[11] Since it had not yet taken place, the cost had not yet been determined and certainly no invoice had yet been prepared.

[12] Apparently, Kitchen had provided an affidavit to the General Counsel during the investigation of the case, although it was not produced during the hearing. Kitchen did acknowledge, however, that her affidavit did not contain her testimony in which she revealed for the first time on cross-examination that Kenyon called her on May 19, before her meeting in Griffin's office, to ask her not to tell them that she had given her any figure, that they were going to fire her, a claim which, in the face of Kenyon's later denial on rebuttal, I also do not credit. Kenyon's ackowledgment that she talked with Kitchen by telephone at the plant from time to time does not detract from Kenyon's credibility on this matter as asserted by Respondent in its brief, but rather serves to buttress what I have previously described as her open and responsive demeanor. Kitchen, in contrast, claimed that she had nothing to hide about this dispute, yet she not only failed to disclose this alleged telephone contact from Kenyon to the Board agent who took her affidavit but also to Bukofsky and Guglielmi, and only informed Respondent's counsel on the eve of the trial.

office to pick up paperwork. She did not mention any names, and then was excused. On cross-examination, Kitchen said that Guglielmi's initial question was, "I want to know if there was a figure revealed." Kitchen responded, "Yes, there was." Kitchen said she knew what was being referred to after her earlier questioning by Bukofsky. Kitchen on the witness stand could not recall the figure because she tried to put it out her mind. She also did not think that she revealed the figure to anyone and no one present at her interrogation revealed a figure to her. However, she was certain that the figure Kenyon disclosed to her concerned the Shawnee on the Delaware trip in that Kenyon actually used those words to described the particular trip with reference to which she revealed the cost. That Plan I trip had been taken in 1979. Kitchen also agreed that when Kenyon spoke with her the week before her discharge she basically complained that while management goes on these trips the employees did not get benefits and wages, yet she did not disclose this complaint to Bukofsky or Guglielmi on May 19, even though Bukofsky had asked her what had happened.

After Kitchen was questioned, Kenyon was brought back in. Present this time were Guglielmi, Griffin, and Csigi. As related by Kenyon, Guglielmi said, "Pat, Mattie Kitchen has been spoken to again, and she gave your name as the person who gave her the information." He then said, "I have no alternative but to fire you, to let you go." Kenyon responded, "I can't believe it—it's her word against mine. Are you going to take her word against mine?" Guglielmi said, "You admitted to bitching to Mattie about the trip," to which Kenyon responded she had but she did not know any dollar amount. She added she had not done any filing for approximately a month and did not even think that those bills were filed yet. At this point Guglielmi said, "Well, Pat, I believe this has to do with last year's trip." He said Mattie had said that she said, "If they spent that much money last year, just think what they'll spend this year." Kenyon replied, "Dennis had been doing all the filing and I didn't do any. I don't know any dollar amount." She then noted, "Well, I said I have been told that if I initiated that petition I would be fired, or a witch-hunt would occur." Guglielmi denied that and then confirmed her firing. Kenyon then refused to sign a separation notice.

Three other witnesses testified about Kitchen's interview and Kenyon's exit interview, Guglielmi, Griffin, and Csigi, and their testimonies differ in certain respect from Kitchen's and Kenyon's and, more significantly, differ from each other's.

In a very significant respect, Guglielmi's version differs from Kitchen's version of her interview. Guglielmi testified, as against Kitchen's denial, that Kitchen revealed the cost of the trip. Further, according to Guglielmi, Kitchen did not disclose which trip Kenyon had been talking about, although Kitchen was sure it had to do with the 1979 one. And Guglielmi did not question Kitchen as to which trip it was, although he assumed it was the 1980 Hershey trip. Subsequently, during cross-examination, Guglielmi said he did not recall whether Kitchen or Kenyon told him the cost but one of them did.

Griffin agreed with Kitchen in his recollection that during her interrogation no amount had been revealed. But Griffin also testified that Kenyon at neither of her meetings on May 19 admitted that she revealed a dollar amount to Kitchen.[13] Thus, according to Griffin, no figure came up at any of the employee meetings that day. Here, he differs significantly from Guglielmi.

Csigi was firm in his recollection that Kitchen did not provide a figure and, further, that at no time was she asked for one. This corrborates Kitchen's testimony but conflicts with Guglielmi's. Csigi corroborated Kitchen's earlier testimony that Guglielmi asked her where she got the information but added that, in line with Kitchen's later recital and Guglielmi's, Kitchen was asked if cost information was given, adding that "we never at any time asked her the amount."

I credit Kitchen and Csigi that Kitchen was not asked for the cost information she claimed Kenyon had revealed to her although she was pressed as to whether Kenyon had told her the cost of a trip which was not otherwise identified.

Guglielmi claimed that at her first interview Kenyon denied having had a conversation with Kitchen but that at her second interview she admitted she was having some personal problems the previous week and had given the cost information to Kitchen. On cross-examination, Guglielmi added for the first time that in the second meeting with Kenyon she told him that she had been complaining to Kitchen that management gets to go on these trips and "we don't and we make diddlybob." At this point in his cross-examination, Guglielmi started fencing with the General Counsel, refusing at first to answer a direct question as to whether he had this information regarding Kenyon's complaints before he fired her, then rephrasing his earlier answer now characterizing Kenyon's "dibblybob" remark as complaining about people going on a staff meeting, then swearing he did not recall Kenyon's statement, and finally denying she had ever made it. I conclude that Guglielmi's testimony is essentially unreliable, calculating, and less than forthright and I do not credit him. Aside from the inherent contradictions in Guglielmi's testimony I find incredible his statement that, after having been informed at her first interview that revealing financial information was grounds for discharge, Kenyon would later at her second interview admit she had done so. For the reasons earlier stated regarding Griffin's lack of candor on the witness stand[14] and his bias resulting from his belief in responsibility for the storm closing petition and the "disclosure" of executive meeting information because both originated in his department in the person of Kenyon, I likewise do not credit Griffin's testimony, in so far as it may be said to corroborate Guglielmi's, in spite of its ambiguity, that Kenyon admitted revealing a cost figure to Kitchen at her second interview.

[13] Griffin's testimony on this point is somewhat unclear. At first, under cross-examination, he claimed Kenyon at her second interview admitted that she spoke with Kitchen and did not remember the amount she had told her. Then Griffin responded negatively when asked if Kenyon did not admit that she revealed a dollar amount to Kitchen.

[14] At one point Griffin started to relate a meeting which took place on May 19 in Guglielmi's office among Guglielmi, Bukofsky, and himself before any employees were called in. Later, on cross-examination, Griffin called this meeting a "mistake," stating that it never had been held and that he had been confused. His earlier testimony as to his managerial meeting reveals no confusion whatsoever.

Cisigi testified that he had been told by LaSchiavo and Lepore on May 18 that information about the meeting had been leaked and that they were to find out what happened. He was later brought in with Bukofsky for Kitchen's interview and remained when Kenyon was recalled. All he could recall about Kenyon's second interview was that she said she had given out the information to Kitchen. Later, on cross-examination, he defined this information to mean her admitting to discussing the plan meeting with Kitchen but denying that she revealed a specific dollar cost amount. Although Csigi did not recall Kenyon revealing complaints to Kitchen about management going on trips and employee wages were diddlybob, he did not deny that it may have been said by Kenyon. Csigi also recalled on cross-examination Kenyon asking "Why are you taking Mattie Kitchen's word against mine." Csigi's testimony here, to the extent of his recall, corrborates Kenyon, and I credit it.

Cisigi also acknowledged that, in spite of Respondent's progressive discipline policy, Kenyon's denial, and Kenyon's clean record and satisfactory rating, she was immediately discharged for discussing confidential information concerning the trip.

Cisigi also did not testify about a third meeting before Kenyon's discharge when, according to Guglielmi, Kenyon had been asked to leave the room after her second interview, Csigi was brought in for the first time to discuss Kenyon, and then on the basis of his recommendation to Csigi a decision was made to fire Kenyon and she was recalled and told of the decision. I conclude that there was no third meeting with Kenyon, and that, as testified to by Kenyon and implicitly acknowledged by Csigi, Kenyon was immediately discharged on Kitchen's word at the conclusion of the second interview.

Analysis

There are two issues posed in this proceeding. The first concerns Respondent's no-solicitation rule. Was that rule maintained and enforced within the 10(b) period? As a subissue, Respondent raises whether the complaint allegations regarding the rule, not specifically alleged in Kenyon's charge, constitute a fatal variance form the charge.

There is no question but that Respondent had codified in 1979 a rule prohibiting solicitations for any purpose without personnel approval during working hours and the rule had thereafter never been rescinded. It is also clear that Respondent, when it suited its purpose, was not timid about alerting employees to the fact that company rules had, from time to time, been distributed to all employees and new hirees thereafter. Witness Personnel Director Csigi's March 24, 1981 recommendation to all supervisors discussing and justifying Airtron's snow closing policy. Like the snow closing policy, the no-solicitation rule had been prepared and distributed at a time, in 1979, when the Company was undergoing a review and update of its personnel policies and manuals.

Since the rules as written "is reasonably susceptible to an interpretation by employees that they are prohibited from engaging in protected activity during periods of the workday when they are properly not engaged in performing their work tasks (e.g., meal and break periods)" it "tends unlawfully to interfere with and restrict employees in the exercise of their Section 7 organizational rights."[15] In T.R.W. Bearings, supra, the Board obliterated the distinction between rules banning solicitation during "working time" and "working hours," finding the latter as ambiguous as the former.[16] Absent some clarification to employees that the restriction does not apply to organizational activity conducted during break periods and mealtimes the rule must be found to be presumptively invalid. Respondent having failed to clarify its presumptively invalid rule, its maintenance is found to be unlawful.

Respondent argues that since its promulgation the rule has not been enforced or observed, and there is no basis to conclude, as urged by the General Counsel, that Respondent violated the law by enforcing it. Yet, by its own considerable reaction to Kenyon's storm policy petition, Respondent has revealed an intention to prevent the solicitations of other employees to protest company policies dealing with terms and conditions of employment. Such an effort bespeaks an enforcement of the rule to prohibit protected concerted activity whether or not the rule itself is specifically invoked in support of Respondent's efforts.

There can be no other interpretation of Griffin's injunction to Kenyon to refrain from such activity in the future after voicing the chief executive officer's displeasure at her "extreme action." Even Griffin's initial questioning of Kenyon's motive when she first disclosed what she had done on the occasion of her job review tends to show the employee that such conduct is questionable at best. When Griffin's later injunction is coupled with the pattern of identical individual employee interrogations of the petition signatories devoted solely to the subject of the petition as described, it is virtually impossible to avoid the conclusion that it enforced the no-solicitation rule in such a manner as to resolve the ambiguity inherent in the rule and make clear that its intent was to prohibit all protected concerted solicitations whether on the employee's own time or actual worktime. Respondent's attempt to distinguish Csigi's memorandum and Supervisor Griffin's questioning wherein they sought to emphasize the proper chain of command, as against an outright prohibition, is elevating form over substance. The clear import of their remarks is that in the future the way to complain about a working condition is to see your supervisor, not join with other employees to petition for relief. In spite of the apparent subtlety of this approach, the Employer's basic aim is not lost on the employee recipient. The instruction to all employees to direct future work concerns and remarks to their supervisor and not to fellow employees is an independent coercive limitation on employee rights,[17] even apart from its relationship to Respondent's outstanding no-solicitation rule.[18]

Contrary to Respondent's claim at page 11 of its brief, the no-solicitation rule may thus be viewed as part and parcel of the unlawful restrictions it has placed on the exercise by employees of protected rights. It is also clear, contrary to Respondent's urging on the same page of its brief, that the relationship between Kenyon's charge and the complaint is more than sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the Region did not act on its own initiative in alleging the rule as violative of the Act, both as maintained and enforced.[19] The nexus between Kenyon's testimony regarding her own interrogations and the Respondent's expressed concern with the employees' exercise of Section 7 rights provides direct evidence of the relationship between the charge and the no-solicitation rule.

I come now to the issue as to whether Kenyon's discharge was motivated by her engagement in protected concerted activities. I have little difficulty in concluding that it was.

Kenyon's key role in drafting and spearheading the circulation, signing, and submission to management of the protest petition is undisputed. On two separate occasions she identified herself to management representatives as the originator of the petition, and she signed it before all others. In turning it in, Kenyon and Jacobs requested a direct meeting with the company president to discuss it.

The petition caused such a stir that Respondent took the unprecedented action of convening special sessions between its personnel director and supervision to plan a formal response and had its personnel director prepare a detailed memorandum to counter the impact of the employees' activity not only with respect to the policy in issue but, more importantly, with respect to the concerted procedure and manner the employees' utilized to raise their complaint. Respondent's fear was twofold. First, the change in the storm closing policy sought by the signatories could be costly. The employees sought pay for the remainder of any day in which they were sent home. Barring that, the employees sought rentention of their accrued sick pay. Modification of the storm closing policy in either respect could involve outlays of thousand of dollars. Second, and what I consider to be the heart of the matter, group action such as manifested with regard to the petition, unless nipped in the bud, could encourage employees to continue their concerted dealing and even expand it to include consideration of retaining union representation and engaging in collective bargaining in the long run.

The highest authority in Respondent's hierarchy made known his extreme displeasure with Kenyon's action and in the same conversation in which Kenyon was made aware of his feelings about the matter she was told to cease such activity in the future. Significantly, Kenyon emphatically stated her refusal to comply. The consequence was that Respondent was faced with the possibility of future solicitations and concerted conduct spearheaded by an employee who had demonstrated her independence from employer domination and intimidation.

The incident between Kenyon and Kitchen which arose not more than a month later provided a convenient and ostensibly nondiscriminatory basis for Respondent to rid itself of Kenyon's irritating and potentially costly presence. I am convinced that Kenyon's alleged disclosure of confidential financial information was a pretext shielding Respondent's true discriminatorily motive.

There a number of facets of the incident which lend weight to this conclusion. The first is that, while Respondent appears to rely on a breach of an alleged well-recognized ethical principle, it thought so little of the principle that it failed to include it among the numerous disciplinary rules it created and distributed on the 1979 personnel policy review even though it included a rule prohibiting financial disclosure to achieve ends admittedly not related to Kenyon's alleged activity. The offhand manner in which it sought to alert employees to the prohibition of disclosure of financial information on their hire also says a great deal about the lack of seriousness with which Respondent dealt with the matter before it ever sought to invoke the rule in Kenyon's case. It is also apparent that Respondent, in effect, created a new disciplinary rule during Kenyon's initial interview when Guglielmi alerted her to it and stated it was grounds for discharge. In this connection, Respondent made what amounted to an on-the-spot decision that Kenyon's alleged conduct was not going to be subject to its otherwise generally applicable policy of progressive discipline.[20]

The manner in which Respondent investigated the incident and concluded its investigation also demonstrates its patent falsity. The employee, Kitchen, who had circulated the information about the Plan 1 meeting and on whose word management relied in firing Kenyon was not even asked the figure she had been given so as to provide some concrete factual underpinning for the alleged disclosure. Also, an ambiguity was allowed to remain as to which management trip costs had been disclosed, Kitchen believing the trip under discussion was the 1979 one and Guglielmi assuming the disclosure re-

[17] R. J. Liberto, Inc., 235 NLRB 1450, 1453 (1978), citing Jeannette Corp., 217 NLRB 653, 656 (1975), enfd. 532 F.2d 916 (3d Cir. 1976).

[18] The consistent evidence of employer permissiveness toward benign solicitations, even those involving working conditions with a nominal employer cost such as the soda machine petition, rather than supporting Respondent's claim of nonenforcement, just because of the disparity of treatment when a matter of substantial employer outlay is involved, services to highlight Respondent's coercive and intimidating reaction to the employee exercise of Sec. 7 rights.

The written rule may thus be said to have been construed and interpreted by Respondent as limited to prohibitions against employee solicitations constituting the exercise of protected concerted activity of more than a de minimus nature. On this ground alone Respondent's citation of Detroit Plastic Molding Co., 209 NLRB 763 (1974), wherein the Board dismissed a complaint alleging the unlawful maintenance of invalid no-solicitation rules because their maintenance was so minimal and isolated, misses the mark. The instant rule was maintained and enforced in its narrow and unlawful aspects.

[20] While, admittedly, that policy was not applicable to every offense, not even Airtron's 1979 statement of disciplinary policy by its terms excluded any infraction from its coverage.

lated to the trip in 1980. Furthermore, an employee who, in management's characterization, had been "shouting her mouth off" was credited in the absence of any other proof of disclosure of specific figures against an employee who readily admitted her griping, but who consistently denied the disclosure of actual costs, and the facts show others had access to the information.[21]

The conflicts among Respondent's management personnel further reveal the effort that was made to justify Kenyon's release. Among Respondent's executives, Vice President Guglielmi stands alone in insisting that Kenyon revealed a cost figure and admitted having disclosed it to Kitchen, as against the denials and ambiguous responses of Cost Manager Griffin and the consistent denials of Personnel Manager Csigi. Guglielmi's discredited assertion that there was an interim managerial conference to determine Kenyon's fate also supports this conclusion. In the face of Kenyon's denials, but after disclosing her continued dissatisfaction with Respondent's benefits for employees, she was summarily released.

It is also apparent that the employees generally were aware that a certain number of executives and their spouses spent a weekned away at the Company's expense once a year. Even though the precise overall cost would be unavailable to them, it would hardly seem to be beyond the estimating power of any of them to conclude that Respondent's funding of the weekend reached five figures.[22] Thus, Respondent's stated concern with figures seems to have been picayune and over trifling and, therefore, its response to the matter was wholly out of proportion unless some other motive was at work.

I conclude that Respondent's real concern when it learned from Kenyon at her first interview, and, I believe, from Kitchen as well, that Kenyon had griped and bitched about employee treatment to Kitchen was that the same employee who had started the petition was not getting involved, at least to the extent of making known her feelings to a fellow employee, in a matter of dissatisfaction with employee benefits generally, not limited to loss of pay on storm closings, in contrast to the benefits management and higher supervision enjoyed. That expression of concern could reasonably lead to further group conduct of the nature represented by the anti-storm closing policy petition. This motive is exhibited most clearly in Bukofsky's statement to Kitchen on May 19, when he told her the company president was very annoyed and it was really none of her business what Lepore did for the executives. Kenyon's interests were getting too close to the bone now. She had previously revealed her unreliability in refusing to refrain from involvement in future employee work-related solicitations and her present conduct reaffirmed this attitude.

Yet, Respondent did not rely on Kenyon's griping as grounds for her discharge,[23] but rather it took its stand on the alleged improper disclosure. In the foregoing discussion, I have concluded that Respondent seized on the alleged confidential disclosure during the Kenyon-Kitchen interchange as the best way it then had available to it to remove Kenyon from its work force.

Assuming, arguendo, that Respondent had a reasonable basis for believing Kitchen that costs were disclosed and that such disclosure provided lawful grounds for discharge, Respondent's good-faith belief does not shield it from the consequences of its error in attributing such misconduct to Kenyon.[24] Having found that Kenyon did not make the alleged disclosure, Respondent cannot defend its action on the basis of its good-faith belief that she did.

Furthermore, assuming, arguendo, that Kenyon had revealed the actual cost of a prior executive weekend meeting, a conclusion contrary to the findings of fact contained herein, that conduct would also have been protected.

It should first be made clear that this is not a case of employee disloyalty. Kenyon did not release company information to third parties to the disadvantage of Respondent's business.[25] The specific company rule prohibiting such disclosure was not invoked and is not applicable here.

Respondent argues that the cost of the Plan 1 meeting is confidential because, in the words of Vice President Guglielmi, "the cost of all our expenditures that we make, the cost of anyone's expense report, the cost of anyone's salary, is confidential information." Guglielmi then asserted that, had Kenyon revealed her own or another's salary to another person, that would be revealing financial information and cause for immediate discharge.[26] Yet, as pointed out earlier, Respondent had no formal rule prohibiting any such disclosures. There was nothing about the location, appearance, or accessibility of the files in which the information was stored which would reveal that they had a special status. A variety of personnel had immediate access and others, with a simple request, had the filing cabinets readily available to them. I also conclude that the nature of the information

[21] On Respondent's own terms, the extreme disparity in treatment accorded the two employees—Kitchen receiving not even a reprimand for passing along confidential financial information and Kenyon being summarily fired for the same offense—show that other factors contributed to the making of Respondent's judgment, surely unrelated to Kenyon's satisfactory work record. It is not enough to respond, as Guglielmi did, that Kenyon had access and originated the deed. It was not Kenyon who circulated the information on the plant floor. Some fault surely had to be borne by the receiver and circulator of the prohibited material if Respondent was to act in an evenhanded manner. Kitchen's appreciation for her good fortune was readily apparent on this record.

[22] Respondent's reliance on employee Petrozzo's testimony at p. 18 of its brief that, in a conversation with Kenyon just before the May 1981 Atlantic City executive weekend, a statement was made that "you spend all this money on weekends, but when you want a chair or something decent in the office you have to really fight to get it" as supporting Kenyon's disclosure of dollar cost is not convincing just because of employee ability to infer the general cost.

[23] Consequently, there is no need to examine whether Kenyon's conversation with Kitchen, standing alone, rises to the level of protected concerted activity, a matter both counsel have addressed in their respective briefs.

itself was not such as to provide a basis for reasonable employee belief in its privacy.[27] Thus, and for all the foregoing reasons, I am prepared to distinguish Clinton Corn Processing Co., 253 NLRB 622 (1980), relied on by Respondent, in which the Board affirmed, without opinion, an administrative law judge's decision in which he concluded that employee disclosure of the company's confidential wage structure to a third-party labor organization was not protected.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce and in an activity affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. By maintaining, distributing, and enforcing its Company Rule v appearing under the heading "DISCIPLINARY ACTION—all employees 6/25/79" in its June 29, 1979 "Update of Airtron Policies #3" to all employees and by advising its employees that they should refrain from circulating petitions of any kind, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. By discharging Patricia Kenyon because she engaged in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid and protection, Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The unfair labor practices described above are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

In addition to the usual cease-and-desist order and notice posting, my recommended Order will require Respondent to offer Patricia Kenyon unconditional reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and to make her whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits she may have suffered by reason of her unlawful discharge, computed in accordance with the formula stated in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977); see generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[28]

ORDER

The Respondent, Airtron, Division of Litton Systems, Inc., Morris Plains, New Jersey, its officers, agents, sucessors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging employees, or refusing to reinstate them, in consequence of their participation in concerted activity for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid and protection.

(b) Distributing, maintaining in effect, and enforcing Company Rule v appearing under the heading "DISCIPLINARY ACTION—all employees 6/25/79" in its June 29, 1979 "Update of Airtron Policies #3" to all employees, and advising its employees that they should refrain from circulating petitions of any kind.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) Offer Patricia Kenyon immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make her whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits she may have suffered by reason of her unlawful discharge in the manner set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Withdraw and abolish its Company Rule v set forth under the heading "DISCIPLINARY ACTION—all employees 6/25/79" in its June 29, 1979 "Update of Airtron Policies #3" to all employees, and notify its employees of said withdrawal and abolition in writing.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Morris Plains, New Jersey offices and facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[29] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[27] Gray Flooring, 212 NLRB 668 (1974). Kenyon's understanding that invoices for executive trips were often forwarded directly to personnel or the company president's office provides an insufficient basis for a contrary conclusion. In any event, even if this procedure evidenced a certain managerial sensitivity toward the information, sensitivity is not the equivalent of confidentiality, particularly where employee knowledge of the approximate cost of the trip would easily be inferred. On the record before me, employer sensitivity is much more akin to embarrassment or discomfort that employees would be able to contrast, as did Kenyon, their more meagre benefits against the perquisites of management.

[28] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[29] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT discharge, or fail or refuse to reinstate, any employee in consequence of his or her participation in concerted activity for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid and protection.

WE WILL NOT distribute, maintain, and enforce Company Rule v set forth under the heading "DISCIPLINARY ACTION—all employees 6/25/79" in its June 29, 1979 "Update of Airtron Policies #3" to all employees, and advise our employees that they should refrain from circulating petitions of any kind.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE HEREBY NOTIFY YOU that we have withdrawn and abolished Comany Rule v described above.

WE WILL offer Patricia Kenyon immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges previously engaged, and WE WILL make her whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits she may have suffered by reason of her unlawful discharge, with interest thereon.

AIRTRON, DIVISION OF LITTON SYSTEMS, INC.

United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, Local 1357 and Elizabeth Murphy. Case 4–CA–12427

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 27 October 1983 Administrative Law Judge Marion C. Ladwig issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions as restated below, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

In adopting the judge's finding that the Respondent Union reprimanded Murphy, required her to take a psychiatric examination, and ultimately discharged her in reprisal for her activity in support of a May 1981 strike against the Respondent, we note the prominent and outspoken role that Murphy played during that strike. A shop steward for the Respondent's office employees, Murphy was a leader of the strike and conducted the picket line in front of the Respondent's offices. She was also quoted in the local newspaper accusing the Respondent Union's president, Wendell Young, of being a hypocrite for not meeting the employees' contract demands. Additionally, the judge credited Murphy's testimony that after the strike, the Respondent's secretary-treasurer told her that President Young "said he was going to make an example of you, that nobody would ever strike against him again." Based on these findings, we agree with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent's subsequent actions against Murphy were in retaliation for her protected strike activity in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[3]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By discharging Elizabeth Murphy on 14 July 1981 for engaging in protected concerted strike activity, the Respondent engaged in an unfair labor practice affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

2. By issuing Murphy a warning letter in reprisal for her engaging in protected concerted strike activity, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

3. By threatening Murphy with reprisals for engaging in protected concerted strike activity, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By requiring Murphy to undergo a psychiatric and psychological examination as a condition of

[1] The Respondent excepts to the exclusion of a hospital record it sought to admit as evidence that Murphy sought medical treatment on 10 July 1981 for intoxication. The Respondent contends that this record is relevant to the charge that it unlawfully required Murphy on 4 August 1981 to undergo a psychiatric evaluation. We find that the proffered evidence is irrelevant and that the Respondent was not prejudiced by its exclusion. The issue is not the fact of Murphy's hospital visit but the Respondent's motivation in requiring the psychiatric evaluation. On this issue the Respondent was not precluded from presenting evidence. The judge permitted the Respondent's president Young to testify that he had heard of Murphy's hospital visit before 4 August and that it was a motivating factor in the decision to require her to take the psychiatric examination.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings. We have further considered the Respondent's contention that the judge has evidenced bias or at least the appearance of bias in this proceeding. We have carefully considered the decision and record and find these charges unsupported and without merit.

The judge found it unnecessary to rule whether the Respondent's actions against Murphy also violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. The General Counsel contends that the judge's findings are clearly sufficient to conclude that the Respondent violated that section. We agree and find that the Respondent's actions against Murphy discouraged union activity in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. See Radio Officers v. NLRB, 347 U.S. 17 (1954).

[3] The judge found that the Respondent's actions against Murphy also violated Sec. 8(a)(1) insofar as they were also in reprisal for Murphy's protest to Young after the strike was settled over an article he had written concerning the strike. The judge found that Murphy's protest concerned union business and was therefore protected concerted activity.

Chairman Dotson and Member Hunter do not adopt this finding for the following reasons. Chairman Dotson would reverse the judge's finding. In the Chairman's view, because Murphy sought only the retraction of the article and not any change in terms and conditions of employment, her protest over the article was not protected activity. See Phase Inc., 263 NLRB 1168, 1170 (1982); Champion Parts Rebuilders, 260 NLRB 731 fn. 3 (1982). Member Hunter finds it unnecessary to pass on whether Murphy's protest over Young's article was protected concerted activity. Insofar as the judge found that the Respondent's defense that Murphy was insubordinate and threatened and humiliated Young during their discussion was a fabrication, Member Hunter would find that it was solely Murphy's protected strike activity which motivated the Respondent to reprimand and ultimately discharge her. Thus, in Member Hunter's view, the Respondent's reliance on Murphy's protest as justification for her discharge was, like Murphy's refusal to take a psychiatric examination, simply another pretext for discharging her in retaliation for her protected strike activity.

Accordingly, the judge's Conclusions of Law and recommended Order are amended to reflect the Chairman's and Member Hunter's findings that the Respondent's actions against Murphy were due solely to her protected strike activity.

The judge also stated in dictum that, even if Murphy had threatened during their discussion to tell Young's wife that he was having affairs with two of the female office employees, this threat "would not have been so opprobrius to be unprotected." Chairman Dotson does not adopt this dictum. In the Chairman's view, a threat to disclose private sexual affairs, in the circumstances here, exceeds the bounds of protected conduct. Cf. Bell Federal Savings & Loan Assn., 214 NLRB 75 (1974) (disclosing employer's private telephone calls unprotected). In view of the judge's finding that Murphy did not in fact make such a threat, Member Hunter finds it unnecessary to pass on the judge's dictum.

Member Zimmerman agrees with the judge's analysis of Murphy's actions concerning Young's article and adopts his findings in all respects.

employment to provide a pretext to discharge her, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

5. The Respondent's aforesaid actions are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. The Respondent did not make Murphy's working conditions more onerous in reprisal for her protected concerted strike activity.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, Local 1357, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute in paragraph 1(a) the words "protected concerted strike activity" for the words "protected concerted activity."

2. Substitute in paragraph 1(b) the words "protected concerted strike activity" for the words "protected concerted activity."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge or discipline any of our employees for engaging in protected concerted strike activity.

WE WILL NOT issue any employee a warning letter in reprisal for such activity.

WE WILL NOT threaten an employee with reprisals for engaging in this activity.

WE WILL NOT require any employee to take a psychiatric or psychological examination to provide a pretext for discharging the employee.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Elizabeth Murphy immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from her discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify her that we have removed from our files any reference to her discharge and warning letter and that they will not be used against her in any way.

UNITED FOOD AND COMMERCIAL WORKERS INTERNATIONAL UNION, LOCAL 1357

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARION C. LADWIG, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, September 16–17, 1982. The charge was filed September 24, 1981,[1] and the complaint was issued February 10, 1982.

An SIU shop steward, representing office employees of a large local union, led an 11-day strike against the Union, to the embarrassment of its president. In a heated meeting after the strike with the steward concerning strike publicity, as credited evidence shows, the union president ejected her from his office, seizing her arm, badly bruising it. After she filed a claim alleging injury from the assault, the Union suspended her, later required her to undergo a psychiatric evaluation as a condition of employment, and gave her a formal notice of termination when she refused.

The primary issues are whether the Union, the Respondent, (a) unlawfully issued the office employees' steward a warning letter, (b) threatened her with reprisals because of the strike, (c) made her working conditions more onerous as a reprisal, (d) required her to undergo a psychiatric and psychological examination as a condition of employment, to provide a pretext for discharging her, and (e) discharged her for engaging in protected concerted activity during and after the strike, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Union, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent Local 1357, an integral part of a multistate labor organization, is an unincorporated association in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, where it annually receives over $100,000 in dues and fees, and remits over $25,000 to its International in Washington, D.C. The Union admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[1] All dates are in 1981 unless otherwise indicated.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Embarrassing Strike Against Union

Elizabeth "Betty" Murphy, who led the office employee strike against the Union from May 6 to 16, was a good employee and, as admitted by Union President Wendell Young, a "very good shop steward" (Tr. 367). She was the telephone operator and receptionist, and did volunteer work as secretary and loan officer for the credit union.

She was a member of the Seafarers International Union's negotiating committee, which failed to reach an agreement with the Union without a strike. As the SIU strike captain, she conducted the picket line in front of the union offices, causing considerable disruption in the operations when the officers and business agents honored the picket line.

The strike was a personal embarrassment to President Young. A May 12 news story in the Philadelphia Daily News (G.C. Exh. 2), identifying Murphy as a picket captain and former nun, quoted her as stating that the major issues in the strike were overtime and a cost-of-living clause and that her boss, Wendell Young, was a hypocrite. "How can a man like him run around preaching about contracts and be so hypocritical?"

President Young admittedly was "very upset" with the "completely one-sided" news article (Tr. 360). He also revealed his displeasure "over the fact that there was a strike altogether." He testified that the "local fellows could not control the situation. In other words, they lost control. In fact, I had to go into the negotiations at the end, and try to sell the package instead of the union official doing it. That is how goofed up it was." (Tr. 375.) This was an obvious reference to the bargaining position of the SIU negotiating committee on which Steward Murphy served.

Acknowledging his embarrassment from the adverse publicity, President Young responded to the news story the same day, stating in a letter to the Daily News that "In our opinion, the people on strike are trying to embarrass us into a very unfair contract" (G.C. Exh. 3).

It was this response, which was printed in full in the June issue of the Union's newspaper, the Dialogue, that was the subject of Steward Murphy's heated meeting with President Young on June 9 when, as Young admitted, she went to his office "to talk about union business" (Tr. 410).

B. Assault Upon Shop Steward

On June 9, 3 weeks after the office employee strike against the Union was settled, SIU Shop Steward Murphy saw in the Dialogue an article entitled, "The President Replies to Phila. Daily News," quoting President Young's May 12 response to that newspaper's strike story. At 4:15 p.m., she went to Young's office to give him the SIU position on the lack of accuracy of a statement in his response about one of the strike issues (Tr. 74–75, 175). His statement was that "As a result of extensive days off and lost time due to these programs, over the past few years there has been an increasingly large amount of overtime needed to run the office."

As Murphy credibly testified, she told him she would like to talk to him about the article, he asked what was the problem, she handed him the newspaper, and he started reading the article. "It is in reference to this overtime. You say that our girls are getting overtime because they missed so much time during the year, but the truth of the matter is they are filling in for the secretaries who are never at their desks . . . and then they have to do their work at nighttime." (Tr. 33–34.) She insisted on a retraction (Tr. 79). A heated argument ensued. (Murphy did not remember the full conversation.) Finally Young asked, "Are you telling me how to run his office? She said, "No, Mr. Young, but I think you should print the truth." When asked what then happened, she credibly testified (Tr. 34):

> A. Mr. Young said "Get out of my office. Get out." He got up from his chair and he came around. I don't think I moved. Then he grabbed my arm and I pulled away. He grabbed me again, and he pulled me toward the door.
> He opened the door and he dropped my arm, and I left his office. He threw me out of his office. [Emphasis added.]

She returned to her desk "in terrible pain," spent 3 to 5 minutes closing (Tr. 77), clocked out at 4:32 p.m. (R. Exh. 1), and met two awaiting friends, one of whom drove her car (Tr. 35). Her left arm "felt like it was out of its socket" (Tr. 96). She was holding it and was "teary eyed" (Tr. 422). When asked what was wrong, she said, "He threw me out of his office." (Tr. 426.) The next morning when she showed one of the two friends (employee Sophia Cleary, the SIU shop steward for another group of the office employees) her "red and swollen" arm (Tr. 423), she explained, "He gripped my arm" (Tr. 427).

This was the day, June 10, when she came to work and found two of her pictures broken, as discussed below. With Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini's permission, she did little work that day and spent most of the time resting. At quitting time, Rosmini asked her if she was staying to do some credit union loans and, as she credibly testified, "I told him no, that I was having . . . a lot of pain with my arm, and I was going right home." (Tr. 38–39.) I discredit Rosmini's denial (Tr. 180) that Murphy complained about her arm at any time that day. (By his demeanor on the stand, he appeared more concerned about supporting the Union's cause on critical matters than giving an accurate account of what happened.)

Rosmini permitted Murphy to rest much of the time during the next 2 days, Thursday and Friday, June 11 and 12. About 2:45 p.m. Friday, when she saw President Young, she told him, "Look at what you did to my arm." He looked at it and said, "I know. I know. See your union." (Tr. 44, 122.) Before leaving early that day (with permission from Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini to see a doctor about her arm (Tr. 128)), she told Rosmini, "I just showed Mr. Young my arm and he said he knew he did it," to see her union. Rosmini asked, "Do you mean he admitted it?" and she suggested that Rosmini ask him. In his testimony, Rosmini admitted that he saw Murphy's arm; that it was "very black and blue" with "two large black and blue marks" and "four smaller marks on the other side of her arm;" that he told her "That doesn't look good . . . . That looks terrible;" that he told her to talk to Young; and that when she returned, she said she had showed Young the black and blue marks and Young "admitted that he did it" (Tr. 188). I discredit Young's testimony that he merely told Murphy, "Come on, get out, go see your union" (Tr. 379). (Murphy impressed me most favorably by her demeanor on the stand as an honest, conscientious witness, but Young appeared to be less than candid.)

That Friday afternoon, upon the suggestion of an attorney, Murphy had four color photographs taken of her injured arm, graphically recording the condition of the arm as described by Rosmini.

The Union took the position at the beginning of the trial that Young "never laid a hand on her" (Tr. 20). After the photographs were introduced into evidence (G.C. Exh. 6), Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini testified that he had no information how Murphy's arm was injured and admitted having no reason to believe that the bruises were self-inflicted (Tr. 277–278). Young continued to deny touching her.

I reject as frivolous the suggestion in the Union's brief that there is "a reasonable probability that Ms. Murphy self-inflicted these bruises while rubbing her arm after leaving Mrs. Young's office or at some other time, in some other way." In arguing that Young's grabbing her arm as Murphy described would not leave two large bruises on the front of the arm, the Union ignores the credited testimony that Young gripped her arm twice.

After weighing all the evidence and discrediting President Young's denials, I find that Young injured SIU Steward Murphy's arm June 9 when ejecting her from his office.

C. Destruction of Steward's Personal Property

On Wednesday, June 10, Steward Murphy received another shock that added to the trauma of the assault of the afternoon before.

She arrived about 8:30 and office boy Thomas Spellane opened the door for her. After clocking in at 8:32 (R. Exh. 1), she went to her desk and found the pictures of her mother and her friend, Sister Gloria Keltz, lying on the floor with the frames broken. She was "most upset" (Tr. 37) and "kind of in total shock" (Tr. 98) upon seeing "the glass all over the floor" and the broken pictures. She turned and walked out, and asked Spellane for Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini's telephone number. Rosmini had already left home.

As other employees arrived, Spellane opened the door and let them in. The next employees to arrive were Renee Kelly and Margaret O'Brien, followed by Sophia Cleary, who arrived about 8:35, and Kathy Barrett, who arrived a minute or so later (Tr. 420, 429–430).

As Kelly and O'Brien entered the reception area, they noticed that the clock on the wall was also broken and Murphy's small Irish flag was burned. One of them commented, "Your flag is burned, too, Betty, and so is the clock" broken. (Tr. 38.) As Murphy credibly testified, "it was the pictures that were on my mind, my mother's picture and Sister's picture"; "I didn't know the clock was broken . . . I didn't examine it. . . . I think part of [the flag] was burned. I didn't examine it that well, because I was very upset about the whole episode" (Tr. 101). She did notice that the wall clock had stopped at 11 p.m. (Tr. 38).

When employees Cleary and Barrett came to the area, as Cleary credibly testified, "The first thing that I observed was the clock up on the wall stopped at 11:00. . . . And I turned to Kathy Barrett and said, 'It happened at nighttime.' She said, 'It would have had to'" (Tr. 421, 431).

When Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini arrived about 9:05 or 9:10 a.m., he saw Murphy standing at her desk, crying. "She told me that someone had broken Sister Gloria's picture and her mother's picture." (Tr. 176.) He cleaned up the glass and told Murphy to get some tea and relax (Tr. 103).

It was at quitting time that day (after Murphy told Rosmini she was having a lot of pain with her arm and was going right home) when Rosmini told her to stop in his office and, as discussed below, gave her a warning letter for "insubordination or belligerent behavior" and told her, in an apparently unguarded answer to a question, that President Young "said he was going to make an example of you, that nobody would ever strike against him again."

The next day, Thursday, June 11, upon instructions from Young, Rosmini made a perfunctory investigation, taking two statements. (A third employee also gave a statement to Young's secretary, professing to report what the office boy had told him.) The statement that Rosmini took from office boy Spellane (R. Exh. 5) was obviously inaccurate. The statement claimed that Spellane "went upstairs at 8:15 to make the coffee and the bell rang. Betty Murphy came in. Approximately 8:30 I went down to wait for the people to come in." Although Rosmini never accused Murphy of destroying her own property and never took a statement from her or any of the other employees who discovered the damage, the Union could argue from this purported timing that Murphy had 15 minutes to smash the pictures of her own mother and her nun friend, to set fire to the flag (ignoring the odor from the smoke) and, after damaging the wall clock, to have the presence of mind of somehow reaching the 7-foot-high clock on the wall (Tr. 283) and setting it forward or back several hours. (Except for President Young's dubious suspicion—that the flag burning and destruction of property were "to throw the thing off," or distract attention from Murphy's June 9 conduct in his office (Tr. 377)—nowhere in the evidence is there any suggestion of a motivation for her to damage the clock and destroy her own valued property.)

Spellane's statement also asserted: "In the meantime, I came in and she said, 'Look at all this.' There was glass on the floor and the clock said something on it. I took notice the clock was on the wall." (Emphasis added.)

The timing was obviously wrong, because Murphy's timecard showed that she clocked in at 8:32 a.m.—not 15 minutes earlier. By the time of trial, the timing was changed; Spellane testified that he went downstairs "around 8:30" and let Murphy in the front door (Tr. 308). (This corrected timing, however, made it even more unlikely that Murphy would be setting a fire at her desk, breaking pictures and scattering glass around, and breaking and resetting a clock in the few minutes before the other office employees arrived. As found above, Clearly arrived about 8:35—about 5 minutes after Murphy—and both Kelly and O'Brien arrived ahead of Cleary.)

Also by the time of trial, Spellane had changed another part of his story. Although asserting in his written statement (which was witnessed by Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini) that the damaged clock was on the wall, he claimed at the trial that "The clock was on the floor" (Tr. 310). Rosmini also claimed that the clock was on the floor (Tr. 176). To the contrary, Murphy and Cleary both credibly testified that the clock was on the wall when the damage was discovered. (The Union contends in its brief: "The clock sits seven feet off the floor on the wall of the reception area. . . . She intentionally damaged her own property, for what reason we can never be sure, and apparently pulled the clock down off the wall and set it at 11:00 o'clock for obvious reasons)." I find that Spellane and Rosmini fabricated the change in testimony to support the Union's cause—placing the damaged clock in a more accessible place for Murphy to reset it. (Rosmini claimed, "I concluded that [between 8:30 and 9 o'clock] the clock was moved forward [by Murphy] to indicate it was done the night before (Tr. 272–273), but testified he did not know how to change the time: "Move the hands, I guess" (Tr. 283).

Because of (a) the obviously inaccurate timing of Murphy's arrival in Spellane's statement, (b) the lack of any plausible motivation for Murphy to destroy or damage her own and the Union's property, (c) the implausibility of Murphy's setting a fire at the reception desk, destroying valued property, and damaging and resetting a wall clock at the beginning of the workday as other employees were arriving, and (d) the failure of the Union to question Murphy and other employees who discovered the damage, I deem it most unlikely that the Union actually believed two other assertions in Spellane's statement, that "the clock said 10 minutes of 8" and "nothing was disturbed" when he opened the building that morning. (At the trial, Spellane first admitted that he would have to turn his head "almost all around to see the clock" upon entering the front door, and indicated how far he would have to turn, but later indicated he would have to turn only about 90 degrees to the left (Tr. 313–315). He appeared to be less than candid.) Whether or not it was Spellane's own idea to include these assertions in the typed statement (witnessed by Rosmini and President Young's secretary, Janice Pinti), I find that the Union falsely claimed that it believed the assertions.

I find instead that President Young ordered the perfunctory investigation to discover some pretext for discharging the SIU steward, as discussed below. I discredit Rosmini's claim that he planned "to meet with Ms. Murphy and to discuss the incident and the statements taken in the investigation with her," but that he never had the occasion (Tr. 227). He later testified that. "As far as we are concerned, we had all the information we needed on the June 10th incident" (Tr. 242). Young, after testifying that he ordered the investigation, claimed that "without any evidence at this point . . . I thought Betty did it herself" (Tr. 375).

The evidence does not reveal who damaged the union and personal property. The damage was not done when the office was cleaned between 8 and 8:30 the evening before, and the night porter was not aware of anyone else being in the building between then and midnight, when he left the building (R. Exh. 4, Tr. 328). President Young testified: "I thought Betty did it herself . . . . Because I know I did not do it. . . . I know that it was not me. And I know that I did not instruct anybody to do some stupid childish thing like that . . . . I did not burn her flag, or instruct anybody to do it. (Tr. 375, 393–394, 412.)

Contrary to the Union's contention in its brief that the evidence is overwhelming "that Murphy" "committed the damage herself," I find both that she did not do the damage and that the Union did not in good faith believe that she did when discharging her.

D. Alleged Coercion Against Steward

1. Written warning and threat of reprisal

At quitting time Wednesday, June 10, Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini called Murphy to his office and gave her a warning letter signed by President Young (G.C. Exh. 4), notifying her that "any further display of insubordination or belligerent behavior . . . such as you exhibited in my office on June 9, 1981, will result in suspension and/or discharge." She first asked Rosmini what Young meant by "insubordination," and he replied that he did not know. Then, as she credibly testified (Tr. 40–41),

> A. I said "What seems to be Mr. Young's problem? Has he said anything to you?" And he said Mr. Young said he was going to make an example of you, that nobody would ever strike against him again.

Rosmini did not specifically deny telling her this. He claimed that when she asked how she was insubordinate, he explained that she failed to follow Young's instructions by not leaving his office and was "loud and boisterous" (Tr. 180).

The evidence is clear that President Young and Steward Murphy had a heated argument June 9 in Young's office, and that she insisted on a retraction of his strike publicity statement that the office employees were getting overtime because they missed so much time during the year. As found above, she credibly testified that when he asked, "Are you telling me how to run his office?" she said, "No, Mr. Young, but I think you should print the truth." (That was when he ordered her out and pulled her arm, injuring it.) The evidence is also clear that she was in the office longer than the 5 minutes she recalled and that she did not remember the full conversation.

I credit part of Young's testimony about what occurred. He testified that Murphy stated she felt the published letter "was against the understanding that we had after the strike [the amnesty clause attached to the agreement], that there would be no retaliation." He gave her a long explanation about why his strike publicity letter was printed in the Union's newspaper after the strike was settled "And she did not even listen. She just kept looking up in the air . . . staring at the ceiling." (Tr. 359.) (This testimony tends to account for her failure to recall part of the conversation.)

I find, however, that his denials that he even touched her and his claim that she referred to his morality in the June 9 meeting were fabricated. According to the Union's brief, she suggested "that the Union President was promiscuously involved with two other women employed by respondent," by making a remark that Young interpreted "as a suggestion that he was having sexual relations with these female employees," and that she made another remark that Young interpreted "as a threat by Ms. Murphy to call his wife and tell her that he was having an illicit affair with Pat Scarrelli and Jackie McPeak." The brief argues that this and other conduct were "so provocative and improper as to clearly warrant her dismissal." Yet the warning letter the next day mentioned only her purported "insubordination or belligerent behavior." Even if Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini's testimony were credited that on June 10, Rosmini gave Murphy an explanation of the warning letter, he merely claimed that he told her she "failed to follow instructions by not leaving [Young's] office, and that she was acting loud and boisterous (Tr. 180, emphasis added). (The Union's brief misstates the record in contending that Rosmini referred to her loud and "abusive" conduct toward Young.) Although some of Young's testimony was corroborated by his secretary, Janice Pinti (who witnessed office boy Spellane's obviously inaccurate statement about the June 10 property destruction), she did not impress me as being a credible witness.

Moreover, even assuming that in their June 9 meeting on union business, Steward Murphy made the statements that President Young claimed, I find that the statements would not have been so opprobrious to be unprotected. According to him, she stated that "the only people that you listen to are Pat Scarrelli and Jackie McPeak . . . . You hate me because I am Irish . . . . Is your wife going to be home tonight?" (Tr. 361–362.) (Although Murphy could not remember the entire conversation, she positively and credibly denied making these statements (Tr. 85–86).)

I note that in falsely denying that he even touched Murphy (contrary to her credited testimony that he gripped her arm twice), he gave testimony that undermined his claim that she was insubordinate by failing to follow instructions to leave the office. He testified (Tr. 362):

> I said, ". . . Come on, get out of the office, go see your union. We are finished with this conversation."
> I opened the door, and I asked her to leave. And she got up and left. I did not touch her. And that whole thing is absolutely ludicrous, those pictures [of her bruised arm], absolutely ludicrous.

The Union contends in its brief that "Even if this conversation is deemed to have involved protected activity, Ms. Murphy's conduct during that meeting far exceeded any reasonable bounds of propriety. When she did not succeed in her demand for a retraction, she berated and humiliated Mr. Young, suggested that he had a sexual liaison with two other employees, and made a statement that was interpreted clearly as a threat to call his wife and relay that false accusation. Under these circumstances, Mr. Young was justified in issuing the letter of reprimand . . . . Indeed, he would have been justified, under the circumstances, in meting out a much harsher form of discipline." The union brief does not reveal, if these were true facts, why this defense was reserved for the trial and not even alluded to at the time.

I find that Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini's June 10 statement to Steward Murphy that President Young "said he was going to make an example of you, that nobody would ever strike against him again" was a threat of reprisals for engaging in the protected concerted strike activity and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In view of this finding and the above finding that the defense that Steward Murphy "berated and humiliated" the union president was fabricated, I reject the argument in the Union's brief that the June 10 warning letter "obviously had nothing whatsoever to do with the strike" and find that it was a reprisal for her leading the strike against the Union and for her engaging in protected concerted activity in the discussion of union business with President Young in the June 9 meeting, in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

2. More onerous working conditions

On June 11, the day after Steward Murphy received the warning letter, Organizing Director Hugo McKissic wrote an interoffice communication to secretary Renee Kelly, informing her that she was not to relieve anyone on the switchboard or in any other area "unless you get my personal approval." On June 12 Murphy, as shop steward, received a copy of the communication.

The complaint alleges that the Union, through McKissic, made telephone operator Murphy's working conditions more onerous "by refusing to permit other employees temporarily to relieve her from her duties."

McKissic, however, credibly testified that neither President Young nor Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini was aware that he was sending the communication and that it had no relationship to the June 9 and 10 incidents. I therefore agree with the Union that the communication was not issued in retaliation for Murphy's union activities and that the timing was purely coincidental.

Accordingly, I find that the allegation must be dismissed.

E. Discharge of Office Employees' Steward

1. Her claims for compensation

On Friday, June 12, Steward Murphy began taking treatments for her arm. On June 15, with Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini's permission, she began taking sick leave (without pay). She took treatments about every other day (Tr. 46), and she was taking "a lot of Anacin" for the pain (Tr. 288). Toward the end of June, she began having stomach and other problems. She finally received a doctor's release dated July 20, stating that she was permitted to return to work July 27 on a full-time basis. Rosmini admitted that he had a conversation with her at least once a week (Tr. 234).

On June 22 one of Murphy's friends, Sister Gloria, handed Rosmini Murphy's workmen's compensation claim form that stated that Murphy was injured while meeting with President Young in his office (Tr. 135, 192). Murphy overheard Rosmini state, "I can't sign these. Wendell [Young] would never agree with it" (Tr. 133). According to Rosmini, he said "we" did not agree that Murphy was injured in Young's office, but said he told Sister Gloria that he would mail the claim to the carrier if the doctor filled out his part (Tr. 192). He admittedly advised that Murphy was entitled to file a claim on the health and welfare fund, which provides compensation for "two-thirds of pay" (Tr. 196).

On June 26, Rosmini sent Murphy some health and welfare fund forms. She submitted a disability claim that same day for "Personal injury sustained June while on the job in the President's Office" (G.C. Exh. 14). On July 2 the claims supervisor, with a copy to President Young, rejected the claim because it was work related (G.C. Exh. 13).

About August 18 (Tr. 195, 232), Steward Murphy again submitted a workmen's compensation claim form, which Rosmini this time sent in. On the form Murphy made the following assertions (G.C. Exh. 15):

> During conversation with [Pres.] Young, he became angry and gripped me by the arm, physically ejecting me from his office.
> . . . .
>
> Arm pulled out of socket affecting chest cavity.
> . . . .
> There has been great bitterness against me as shop steward in Seafarers International Union since a strike was launched against Mr. Young's Local last May 9, 1981 when our contract expired. The media attention it gained was a great embarrassment to him and our conversation that day was concerning a newspaper article he sent to the Daily News and printed in the Dialog.

Thus, in all three claims—her June 22 workmen's compensation claim (which Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini refused to send in), her June 26 disability claim, and her August 18 workmen's compensation claim (which she submitted shortly before her August 21 formal notice of termination)—she asserted that her injury was sustained on the job, in President Young's office.

Young was most concerned about this assertion (which I find to be truth). He testified (Tr. 385)

> A. One of the problems that we were having is what Betty was going to put on that form. . . . we told . . . the [SIU] . . . if she put on the form that I touched her . . . I was going to sue her, absolutely sue her.
>
> And I let that be known. And that is why we did not get any forms for a while. . . . she knew that I was waiting for that report to come in. And I was immediately going to go down and sue her for that incident.
> But we did not get a form. I called down to health and welfare. . . . and said all I want to do is review what she puts down for her sickness.

He was referring to the disability claim that she submitted June 26, asserting "Personal injury sustained while on the job in the President's office." He did not sue her but, according to the General Counsel, he in effect discharged her July 14 when he refused to let her work (although the formal notice of termination was not given her until August 21).

2. Her suspensions and notice of termination

On Monday, July 13, when Steward Murphy made her usual Monday morning telephone call to Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini to report her continued doctor's treatment, Rosmini told her (as she credibly testified), "Mr. Young said as soon as you are better—as soon as you get better, Betty, that you are fired" (Tr. 49, 139–140). According to Rosmini, he told her "she was going to be suspended" (Tr. 205).

The next day, July 14, in an apparent effort to retain her job, she reported to work despite her feeling "really sick" (Tr. 144). She clocked in, opened the switchboard, and started to work. About 9:15, President Young called in, recognized her voice, and told her, "Get off the board, Betty, and do what you are supposed to be doing" (Tr. 49). She left the board, went upstairs, and waited for Rosmini. When asked "what was I supposed to be doing," Rosmini "shook his shoulders" and later told her, "Get yourself well, Betty, get strong, and get a release from the doctor" (Tr. 50).

On July 27, Murphy returned to work with a doctor's release that read: "Ms. Betty Murphy is permitted to return to work on July 27, 1981, on a full-time basis. Ms. Murphy will be treated at our facilities during our evening hours" (G.C. Exh. 7). Rosmini directed her not to clock in and, after conferring with President Young (Tr. 211), gave her a letter stating "please be advised that you are being held out of service until we complete the appropriate investigation. Your recent absences and the facts and allegations surrounding them have raised certain serious questions which indicate that there may be reason requiring further action on our part" (G.C. Exh. 8). He admittedly refused to give her any explanation (Tr. 212).

On August 4, Rosmini sent Murphy a letter, advising her of an appointment on August 12 with a psychiatrist and a consulting psychologist. The letter explained (G.C. Exh. 9)

> A thorough consideration of all of the facts has convinced us that in order to make a responsible and informed decision [concerning her future employment], it will be necessary for us to receive a full psychiatric and psychological evaluation. This step is necessary for us to be advised whether there > are mental health problems which would dictate that the resolution of your employment question be dealt with in that sphere.

On August 6, Rosmini wrote Murphy another letter, stating that the appointment was postponed until August 19. She contacted her union, which advised her to completely ignore the letters (Tr. 153). Instead, she telephoned the psychiatrist and told him she did not want to waste his time or the Local's money. Then on August 11, Rosmini wrote Murphy another letter, advising her that the appointment was not for treatment. "It is solely for the purpose of guiding us in determining what the appropriate action should be in response to your past conduct. You are obliged to keep the appointment." The letter warned, "A failure to do so will be dealt with as a deliberate and willful disregard of orders and intentional insubordination." (G.C. Exh. 11.) The SIU again advised their steward to ignore the letters, and she did, missing the appointment.

About August 18, as indicated above, Murphy submitted her workmen's compensation claim to the Union, asserting that President Young "became angry and gripped me by the arm, physically ejecting me from his office." On August 21, Rosmini sent her the formal notice of termination, explaining (G.C. Exh. 12)

> You were specifically instructed to appear for an examination on Wednesday, August 19, 1981. You were warned that a failure to appear would result in disciplinary action. Despite this warning, you did not appear and this offense coupled to all attendant circumstances presents just cause for discharge.

3. Shifting defenses

Secretary-Treasurer Rosmini, Steward Murphy's immediate supervisor who signed her August 21 termination notice, positively testified at the trial that there were three and only three reasons for her discharge. He listed them as "insubordination" (failure to appear for the psychiatric examination), her "conduct of June 10th" (burning the flag and destroying other property), and "making slanderous statements about Mr. Young" (claiming, and stating on her August 18 workmen's compensation form, that the union president on June 9 injured her arm). (Tr. 262–264.)

President Young, the Union's chief executive officer for 20 years, stated that he made the final decision to discharge Murphy (Tr. 353). He testified that his "initial reaction was to dismiss her because of that [June 10 flag-burning] incident" (Tr. 413), that he "spent almost literally the gosh damn summer, at least an hour or so a day, discussing this damn Betty Murphy situation" (Tr. 394), that the major reasons they had decided to hold her out of service were the June 10 flag burning and the accusation that he had injured her arm (Tr. 405), and that when Murphy did not make the psychiatric appointment, "that was the final straw that broke the camel's back. We notified her that she was dismissed." (Tr. 396).

Thus at the trial, Rosmini claimed that the accusation against Young, the June 10 incident, and the refusal of psychiatric examination were the sole reasons, and Young claimed they were the primary reasons, for Murphy's discharge. Young specifically denied that her discharge had "anything at all to do with her functioning as shop steward" (Tr. 354). Both Rosmini and Young claimed that the decision to discharge her was not made until after she refused the psychiatric examination, but admitted that they had previously decided not to let her return to work until their "investigation" was completed.

In light of the evidence at the trial, however, these three purported reasons for the discharge were obviously suspect. One claim was that the Union was discharging the office employee shop steward for asserting that the union president injured her arm when ejecting her from his office, despite the evidence that her assertion was true. Another claim was that the Union believed, after a perfunctory investigation, that the steward herself burned her own flag and smashed two of her own valued pictures at starting time, despite the evidence indicating that the Union did not in good faith have that belief. The third claim was that the Union discharged the SIU steward for insubordination when she refused to obey a demeaning order to take a psychiatric examination for a possible mental problem—which the Union contended it suspected she had primarily because she asserted (truthfully, as found above) that the union president injured her arm and because she destroyed her own property (something, as found, she did not do).

In its brief, the Union listed other purported "major factors" involved in the Union's ultimate decision to terminate Murphy's employment (as well as its decision to seek a psychiatric evaluation). The first two were purported reasons that neither Rosmini nor Young claimed as a basis for the discharge. They were Murphy's "suggesting that the Union President was promiscuously involved with two other women employed by respondent" (found above to be a fabrication) and her "threatening to call the Union President's wife to report on the alleged illicit affairs if the Union President did not accede to Ms. Murphy's demands for a retraction of a newspaper article" (also found to be a fabrication).

Some of the other purported "major factors," contended in the brief but not claimed by either Rosmini or Young to be a basis for the discharge, were "blaming the mischief [destroying property June 10] on unspecified 'others' in the Union office" (something she did not do); "reporting to work on three consecutive days [June 10-12] and spending most of her time in the office lying on a couch in the ladies' lounge" (failing to point out that she did so with Rosmini's permission); and "reporting off sick for a period of six weeks and offering contradictory reasons concerning the nature of her alleged illness" (a clear pretext).

I find that these shifting defenses—particularly the first two purported "major factors"—detract from rather than bolster the Union's defense that it was lawfully motivated.

4. Concluding findings on discharge

After weighing all the evidence, I find that this is a bizarre case in which a local union president, seeking a mechanism to discharge a suspended office employee shop steward for her protected concerted activity, ordered her to submit to a psychiatric evaluation as a condition of employment and discharged her when she refused to comply with the demeaning order.

In its brief, the Union contends that it could have discharged SIU Shop Steward Murphy "immediately after the June 10 property destruction incident" and could have discharged her "following the false accusation against President Young," but that "she was a long-term employee, a virtual fixture in the office," and although she had engaged in this "serious misconduct," the Union decided it "should first attempt to determine whether her problem was due to emotional or mental distress" by requiring her to take the psychiatric evaluation.

To the contrary, as found, Murphy did not engage in the June 10 property destruction, the Union did not have a good-faith belief that she did and, in fact, ordered the perfunctory investigation to discover some pretext for discharging the SIU steward who had embarrassed President Young by her protected concerted strike activity. Also, as found, Murphy's accusation against Young was true; he had injured her arm in the June 9 meeting when she, as shop steward, was engaging in protected concerted activity.

I agree with the General Counsel that before July 14, when President Young suspended Murphy from work by ordering her off the switchboard, the Union had already decided to terminate her "and was only attempting by further investigation and delay to find some basis or mechanism—the psychiatric evaluation—to achieve this end."

I therefore reject the Union's contention that "Not one action taken against [SIU Shop Steward Murphy] had any relationship to her functioning as shop steward or her participating in the strike," and its contention that even if President Young acted in "retaliation for her strike activities . . . a discharge would have been proper, and occurred, even absent such a hostile motivation." I find that the Union unlawfully discharged her for engaging in protected concerted activity during and after the strike in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and that, as alleged in the complaint, she was in fact discharged July 14, after which the Union refused to permit her to work. (I find it unnecessary to rule whether the discharge also violated Section 8(a)(3).)

I also find that the Union required Shop Steward Murphy to undergo a psychiatric and psychological examination August 19 as a condition of employment, to provide a pretext to discharge her for engaging in protected concerted activity, further violating Section 8(a)(1).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By discharging Elizabeth Murphy July 14, 1981, for engaging in protected concerted activity, the Union engaged in an unfair labor practice affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By issuing SIU Shop Steward Murphy a warning letter in reprisal for her engaging in protected concerted activity, the Union violated Section 8(a)(1).

3. By threatening the shop steward with reprisals for engaging in protected concerted strike activity, the Union violated Section 8(a)(1).

4. By requiring the shop steward to undergo a psychiatric and psychological examination as a condition of employment, to provide a pretext to discharge the shop steward, the Union further violated Section 8(a)(1).

5. The Union did not make the shop steward's working conditions more onerous in reprisal for her protected concerted activity.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent having unlawfully discharged an employee, it must offer her reinstatement and make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits, computed on a quarterly basis from date of discharge to date of proper offer of reinstatement, less any net interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

The Respondent, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, Local 1357, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or disciplining any employee for engaging in protected concerted activity.

(b) Issuing any employee a warning letter in reprisal for engaging in protected concerted activity.

(c) Threatening any employee with reprisals for engaging in protected concerted strike activity.

(d) Requiring any employee to undergo a psychiatric or psychological examination as a condition of employment, to provide a pretext for discharging the employee.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Elizabeth Murphy immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of her discharge, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

[2] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge and to the June 10, 1981 warning letter and notify the employee in writing that this has been done and that the discharge and warning letter will not be used against her in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its union offices in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees arecustomarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

[3] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Walker Boat Yard, Inc. and District 2, Marine Engineers Beneficial Association, Associated Maritime Officers, AFL–CIO, Petitioner. Case 9–RC–14191

14 December 1984

DECISION ON REVIEW

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 16 February 1983[1] the Regional Director for Region 9 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in this proceeding.[2] Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, the Petitioner filed a timely request for review.

By telegraphic order dated 15 April 1983 the Board granted the Petitioner's request for review on the unit issue. The election was stayed pending decision on review.[3] The Employer filed an opposition.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has carefully considered the entire record, including the submissions of the parties in this case, and has decided to affirm the Decision and Direction of Election by the Regional Director for the following reasons.

The Employer is a Kentucky corporation primarily engaged in the repair and overhaul of boats and barges. The Employer's repair operations are conducted in the Walker Boat Yard facility (the boatyard), a self-contained compound located on the banks of the Tennessee River in Paducah, Kentucky.

Encompassed within the boatyard is the drydock area, machine shop, diesel engine shop, and electrical shop. Each is located within several hundred feet of the other. The drydock is an open area along the river with the electrical shop adjacent to it. The machine shop and diesel shop are located in separate buildings.

The Employer's boatyard business is a functionally integrated operation with a significant level of interdependence between employees assigned to various repair functions. Normally boats are docked for repairs alongside the boatyard on the river and the employees work together to repair the vessel.[4] The drydock employees repair the hull or bottoms of the boats. Diesel shop employees repair, maintain, and overhaul or rebuild the boat engines. The machine shop employees resurface or reshape salvageable engine parts used by the diesel shop employees. The machine shop employees also work on parts of the tail and rudder shafts. The electrical shop employees perform electrical work, including disconnecting and rewiring the boat generators.

In preparing for their repair functions, the diesel shop employees and machine shop employees rely on the drydock employees for assistance. Thus, if an engine must be removed from the boat for repairs, the drydock employees may operate cranes to perform this task. Other drydock employees may assist in the removal process and in the transporting of the engine to the diesel shop. Drydock employees also may be called on to cut away obstructions which block the diesel shop employees' access to the engines to be repaired. Machine shop employees are assisted by the drydock employees when removing shafts and propellers from boats for repair in the machine shop.

We find therefore, in agreement with the Regional Director, that in the context of the overall boatyard operation, the work of the diesel shop employees is not functionally distinct.[5] Rather, we conclude that the diesel shop employees' work is necessarily integrated with and dependent on work performed by other boatyard employees in the unit found appropriate by the Regional Director.

The bargaining history here further supports the inclusion of the diesel employees in the broader unit found appropriate. The unit employees have been covered by a series of collective-bargaining agreements dating back to 1968, except for a brief period from 1969 to 1972.[6] The earlier agreements

[1] Plant Bargaining Committee for the Employees of the Dry Docks and Repair Operations, for Walker Boat Yard, Inc. was allowed to intervene in this proceeding.

[2] The unit found appropriate by the Regional Director consists of: all production and maintenance employees, including all dry dock, machine shop, diesel repair and electrical shop employees employed by the Employer at its Paducah, Kentucky facility, excluding all office clerical employees and all professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act. The Petitioner by its petition sought to represent a unit limited to approximately 11 employees, including all mechanics, mechanics helpers, and diesel repairmen employed by the diesel repair division at the Employer's Paducah, Kentucky facility. Alternatively, the Petitioner indicated its willingness to proceed to an election in any unit found appropriate. The Employer and Intervenor contended that only an overall unit of the diesel shop, machine shop, electrical shop, and drydock employees was appropriate.

[3] The Board denied the Employer's request for review of the Regional Director's finding that there is no contract bar to the filing of this petition.

[4] Boats may also be raised out of the water or "dry docked" to be repaired.

[5] While our dissenting colleague notes that there is no interchange of function between the diesel shop employees and the other unit employees, it is quite clear from the record that the diesel shop employees could not perform significant parts of their work without the assistance of the drydock and machine shop employees. Although the diesel shop employees are primarily concerned with repair and overhaul of the diesel engines, they rely on the work of the machinists and on others in successfully carrying out the overall functions of the Employer's boatyard.

[6] As found by the Regional Director the bargaining unit was represented by the UAW in 1968 and 1969 and encompassed all hourly em-with the Intervenor made specific reference to diesel engine mechanics, while the latter agreements contained wage levels for "mechanics." Various provisions make reference to all "employees" and it is undisputed that the contractual benefits for vacation, holidays, and insurance coverage are received by all employees.[7]

In view of the foregoing, and based on the record as a whole, we conclude that the Regional Director's finding that the diesel shop employees lack a sufficient separate community of interest to justify separate representation must be affirmed.[8]

Accordingly, the Decision and Direction of Election is affirmed.

The case is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 9 for the purpose of conducting an election pursuant to his Decision and Direction of Election.[9] Those eligible to vote are those in the unit who were employed during the payroll period ending immediately before the date of the issuance of this Decision on Review.[10]

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I do not find the Employer's Walker Boat Yard (the boatyard), including a drydock area, machine shop, diesel repair shop, and electrical shop, to constitute a functionally integrated operation with such a significant degree of interdependence between employees as to render inappropriate the separate diesel repair shop unit sought by the Petitioner. Accordingly, on the facts discussed below, I would reverse the Regional Director and direct an election in the petitioned-for diesel repair shop unit.

The diesel repair shop was identified by the parties at the hearing as a separate department. It is physically situated in a separate building located in the boatyard compound. Its employees, including mechanics, mechanics helpers, and diesel repairmen, are separately supervised by the diesel department manager and two supervisory foremen. Diesel department employees are specially trained to repair diesel engines. They are the only employees of the Employer who repair, maintain, overhaul, and rebuild diesel and other engines for the Employer and its customers, including diesel engine manufacturers for whom diesel department employees do warranty work. They spend most of their time working on engines aboard boats in drydock, but do more serious repairs in the diesel shop. They also travel to vehicles broken down on the road or at construction sites, and go on board ships traveling upriver to do engine repairs. The diesel department repairs most parts itself, sends others out to a local contractor, and sends limited types of parts to the machine shop for resurfacing. The diesel department at times engages drydock employees to perform major welding and cut away work on drydocked vessels. The record does not clearly establish that the diesel department's reliance on other segments of the Employer's operation is regular or substantial. In addition, there is no evidence of employee transfer.

As to terms and conditions of employment, the record establishes that diesel department employees work a day shift, while the drydock and machine shop employees work both a day and afternoon shift. Diesel department employees punch a separate timeclock, wear distinct uniforms, have a separate lunch area (as do the other departments), and have their own Christmas party. All employees are paid out of the same payroll. Insurance and leave benefits are uniform. Seniority is supposedly companywide, but no instance of its application exists on the record. Diesel department employees' wages, discussed in detail infra, are 8 to 10 percent higher than those of drydock employees and comparable to those of machine shop employees.

The majority finds that the similarities in terms and conditions of employment between the various departments of the Employer are the product of a series of collective-bargaining agreements covering all of the Employer's employees, including those in the diesel department, and that any deviation from the contractually proscribed terms with respect to the diesel department is not indicative of the fact that the diesel department should not be part of the broader unit they find appropriate. The facts which ployees, including those in the diesel shop. In 1972 the Employer recognized the Intervenor and since then has executed a series of agreements, all of which, in our view, covered the overall unit including mechanics, a classification which embraces the sought diesel shop employees.

[7] While the record shows that the wage schedules have not always been followed for diesel mechanics and that some discretion in this area has been left to the diesel shop manager, it is clear that diesel as well as machine shop employees enjoy wages that are 8 to 10 percent higher than those received by drydock employees. This divergence from the contractual rates does not, in our opinion, demonstrate that they have not been part of the contractual bargaining history.

[8] Since we, contrary to our dissenting colleague, have found that the series of collective-bargaining agreements did not exclude the diesel shop employees from coverage, we view the Petitioner's request for a separate unit of diesel shop employees as a petition for severance. In addition to the factors enumerated above, severance is further unwarranted in view of the Regional Director's finding that the diesel shop employees' skills are not sufficiently specialized to justify the establishment of a separate craft unit. Moreover, despite the limited contractual variances applicable to the diesel shop employees noted in the dissent, the long bargaining history on a yard-wide basis favors inclusion of these employees in the broad historical unit found appropriate by the Regional Director rather than the narrow petitioned-for unit. Mallinckrodt Chemical Works, 162 NLRB 387 (1966). In agreeing with his colleagues that the employees sought here are not severable as a separate craft unit, Member Hunter does not endorse Mallinckrodt Chemical Works, supra, in its entirety.

[9] As indicated in the Regional Director's decision, further processing of this case to an election is contingent on the Petitioner submitting an additional showing of interest for the unit found appropriate. Accordingly, the Petitioner must submit a sufficient showing of interest within 10 days of this decision or the petition will be dismissed, absent withdrawal.

[10] [Excelsior footnote omitted from publication].

follow, however, show that for some time the diesel department has not been treated as covered by any collective-bargaining agreement.[1] The absence of such coverage, while all other boatyard departments are covered by the contract, further supports a finding that a separate diesel department unit is appropriate.

In 1968, the United Auto Workers (UAW) was certified by the Board as the representative of a unit of all production and maintenance employees in the boatyard. A contract of approximately 1 year was executed, but shortly before its expiration the UAW went on strike. In 1969, the UAW disclaimed interest in representing the boatyard employees. In 1972, the Employer voluntarily recognized the Intervenor.[2] A series of four similar collective-bargaining agreements between the Employer and the Intervenor followed, the latest expiring on 1 July 1982. The contracts contain no recognition clause describing the bargaining unit, and while many benefit provisions, by their terms, apply to "employees" generally, noticeably absent from both the 1976 and 1979 agreements are earlier included references to "diesel engine mechanics." The wage scale included is one for mechanics, grades 1 through 6. But, any argument that this reference to mechanics is an abbreviation for the diesel engine mechanic classification is undermined by the Employer's testimony that all employees are classified as "mechanics."

Beyond the Employer's own admission that the contractual wage schedule and increase provisions have not always been followed to set the wages of diesel department employees, there is evidence that diesel department wages are set directly by the diesel department manager. This may explain why several in the department receive wages at or above the contractual maximum even though they do not possess the contractually enumerated skills of fitting, burning, and welding requisite to receiving such high wages. Further, the Employer's claim that the contractual wage scale represents the minimum to be paid diesel department employees, and is to be supplemented by unspecified merit increases and increases to keep department employees 10 cents above local "like-type" industry, is totally unsubstantiated.

Other provisions also indicate that the contract was not designed to apply to diesel department employees. Thus, the contract provides for three shifts, the first to run from 6 a.m. to 2:30 p.m.—the diesel department works one shift beginning at 7 a.m. and ending at 3:30 p.m. There is no evidence that the companywide seniority provision has ever been applied. The contract provides for a committeeman to serve the entire Company, but the designated individual never solicited the views of diesel department employees concerning proposals in advance of contract negotiations and has not been involved in diesel department grievance meetings. Also significant is the fact that diesel department employees were never involved in contract negotiations or ratification of the latest contract.

In sum, considering the Employer's identification of the diesel department as a separate department; the separate supervision; the distinct job functions of the diesel department employees; the lack of employee interchange between diesel department employees and other yard operations; and the limited applicability of the collective-bargaining agreement to diesel department employees evidenced in part by their many different terms and conditions of employment, I conclude that the diesel department constitutes an identifiable and homogeneous group with a community of interest separate and distinct from other boatyard employees.[3] Accordingly, I find that the diesel department constitutes a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

[1] The Board denied the Employer's request for review of the Regional Director's finding that there is no contract bar to the filing of this petition.

[2] See Walker's Fuel & Service Co., 208 NLRB 158 (1974).

[3] In view of my conclusion that the terms and conditions of employment enjoyed by diesel shop employees have not been determined by collective bargaining for the broader unit, I do not view this as a severance case which would be controlled by application of the criteria of Mallinckrodt Chemical Works, 162 NLRB 387 (1966).

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 6 June 1984 Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci issued the attached decision. The Charging Parties filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.

The Charging Parties and the General Counsel except to the administrative law judge's credibility resolutions based on certain factual misstatements made by the judge and the judge's failure to discuss certain relevant testimony. We have reviewed the decision in light of the record evidence and the General Counsel's and Charging Parties' contentions and make the following factual corrections.

1. The judge found that 5 days prior to the arbitration of employee John Montiero's grievance, Charging Party Michael Domke had a conversation with Supervisor Willie White regarding Domke's participation in the arbitration. However, the record reveals that Domke's conversation with White actually took place approximately 4-1/2 months prior to the arbitration. Additionally, the judge stated that Domke was given a written reprimand on 3 January 1983 for violating a company rule. Although the Respondent prepared a written reprimand for Domke, the discipline was never actually issued to him. Further, the judge was incorrect in stating that the General Counsel contended that this alleged 3 January reprimand was issued to Domke only to justify a reprimand previously issued to Domke.

In addition, the judge erroneously stated that the Respondent had a rule prohibiting employees and stewards from discussing union business during work time. The rule in fact allowed such discussions if permission was first obtained from the supervisor. Finally, the judge found that Charging Party Jerry Bliss had knowledge of the "punching out" rule based on the fact that he was a steward at the time employee Nelson Orr was reprimanded for violating the same rule. However, the record reveals that Bliss was not a steward at the time the reprimand was issued to Orr.[4]

Notwithstanding the aforementioned factual errors, we find that they are insufficient to overturn the judge's credibility resolutions. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We are satisfied here that the judge's credibility resolutions are supported by the record, and thus no basis exists for disturbing them.[5]

2. The complaint alleges that the Respondent unlawfully threatened Bliss with discharge when it issued to him a written warning on 7 March 1983. The judge failed to rule on this allegation. The record reveals that subsequent to the 21 February 1983 discharge of Bliss, the Respondent on 4 March 1983 decided to reinstate him without backpay. On 7 March 1983 the Respondent sent a letter to Bliss explaining its reasons for reinstating him without backpay and notifying him that, with respect to the company's disciplinary procedure, any subsequent violation would warrant a discharge. The Charging Parties and the General Counsel contend this letter constituted a "new" discipline.

We disagree. Having concluded that the 21 February 1983 discharge was not unlawful, the Respondent was neither required to reinstate Bliss nor to provide backpay for the period between the discharge and the reinstatement. We therefore conclude that the reasons given for reinstatement with-

[1] Both the General Counsel and the Charging Parties contend that the judge's interpretation of the evidence and his credibility findings showed bias and prejudice against them. Upon careful examination of the administrative law judge's decision and the entire record, we are satisfied that the contentions of the General Counsel and the Charging Parties in this regard are without merit.

[2] In agreeing with the judge that the Respondent lawfully and uniformly enforced against Bliss its prohibition against unauthorized entry into unassigned buildings, we do not rely on the mere existence of the posted notice prohibiting such activity but rather on the credited testimony that the Respondent similarly disciplined other employees who violated this rule.

[3] The judge specifically noted that Teamsters Local 337, the employees' bargaining representative, did not participate in this case, concluding that if the Union believed the Respondent had engaged in unlawful conduct, the Union "would have been present to correct the wrong." We draw no conclusions from the Union's absence and disavow the judge's remarks in this regard.

[4] Bliss did have knowledge of the rule, however, based on his testimony admitting that a "punching out" rule existed.

[5] The General Counsel and Charging Parties further assert in their briefs that the judge erred in "ignoring" certain testimony which conflicted with his findings. As the Board stated in Walker's, 159 NLRB 1159, 1161 (1966), "The failure of [an administrative law judge] to detail completely all conflicts in the evidence does not mean . . . that this conflicting evidence was not considered."

out backpay were not unlawful and the Respondent lawfully advised Bliss that any subsequent violation of company policy would lead to discharge. Therefore, we find no "new" discipline was issued and, accordingly, we dismiss this allegation of the complaint.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

THOMAS A. RICCI, Administrative Law Judge. A hearing in this proceeding was held at Detroit, Michigan, on April 4, 5, and 6, 1984, on complaint issued by the General Counsel against Borman, Inc. (the Respondent or the Company). The complaint issued on March 2, 1984, based on separate charges filed on February 24, 1983, and on June 1, 1983, by Jerry Bliss and Michael Domke, respectively (the Charging Parties). The issues presented are whether the Respondent discriminatorily applied and enforced its work rules against the Charging Parties in order to retaliate against them for exercising protected concerted activities, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the statute. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent.[1]

On the entire record and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

This Company, a State of Michigan corporation, is engaged in the retail sale and distribution of groceries, meats, produce, and related products, and has its principal office and place of business in Detroit, Michigan. During the 12-month period ending December 31, 1982, and December 31, 1983, representative periods, its gross revenues from all sources exceeded $500,000, and in the course of its business it purchased and caused to be transported and delivered to its Michigan facilities foods and other products valued in excess of $50,000 which were transported and delivered to its facilities from out-of-state sources. I find that the Respondent is an employer within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

I find that Local 337, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] A posthearing motion by the General Counsel to strike the Respondent's brief or to reopen the record is denied.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Picture of the Case

The background of this case tells a revealing story. Among the 600 to 700 employees working in this Company's warehouse and food distribution center, about 400 have long been represented by Local 337 of the Teamsters International Union. In 1979 and earlier, there developed a movement among its members to combat the policies and practices of the officers and elected officials of the Teamsters, to protest what was called undemocratic action by the Union as such. The very vocal dissidents in this Company joined forces with like complainers, both members of Local 337 and of other locals of the International Union, working in other companies, including employees of competitors of this Respondent in the Detroit area, such as the A & P and the Kroger stores. In fact, there came into being an organization called Teamsters for Democratic Union (TDU), formed for the purpose of changing the practices of the Teamsters Union as a whole, to make it more democratic and more sensitive to the needs and desires of its members. This internal dissension within the Teamsters was widely publicized, the TDU printing a periodical called "Rank and File Speaks," and distributed widely. There were meetings and discussions everywhere. One of the activists, a man named Jerry Bliss, involved in this very case, was even scheduled to testify before the United States Senate Labor Committee on labor racketeering. The other Charging Party, Michael Domke, was equally active in distributing TDU literature throughout the plant.

What brought about the complaint in this proceeding was something that happened in this Company's plant in March 1982. Its contract with Teamsters Local 337 was due to expire in October 1982. In March the Company proposed to the Union extension of the contract for a further fixed period of years, with all wages to remain as they were in March 1982. Whether this meant withholding of raises due on the unexpired contract, I do not know. But clearly it meant no increase in wages throughout the period of the new contract to take effect in October 1982. The witnesses for the General Counsel, all dissidents and members of TDU, referred to the proposal of the Company, eventually accepted by Local 337, as the "concessions." There was a great to-do among the employees, whether to accept the Union's approval recommendation. In a first vote the employees refused to ratify the agreement. A second vote, in March, they agreed, and the contract was extended accordingly, as the Company desired.

There is also repeated testimony by the employee witnesses that about the same time—starting late in 1981—the Company began a "speed up" system, aimed at getting more work from the employees. Although the Respondent's officers did say that due to economic necessity—especially the pressure of competition in the area—it had no choice but to get more efficient performance from its employees and keep its expenses down, they took issue with the phrase "speed-up." In any event, that development—the "speed up"—plus the so-called concessions which precluded all raises for quite a period, served to generate an even greater friction between the dissident members and their duly elected union officials.

The essential question presented here is whether the Company, in enforcing its work rules against the two principal activists in that TDU movement, was motivated by a desire to squelch the dissident movement which went counter to its economic position—or merely applying work rules agreed to by the collective-bargaining agent, which certainly was the Employer's right.

A number of disciplinary warnings were issued, two men were discharged, and other steps taken in keeping with the work rules. Grievances were filed, some were settled at one step or another, and some went to arbitration according to the Union's contract. The officers and business agents of the Union participated in all these grievance steps, winning a number of them to the advantage of the employees. There is no charge that the Union ever failed in its duty fairly to represent all the employees. What I think is the main allegation of the General Counsel now is that Jerry Bliss, the big TDU activist, was unlawfully discharged in February 1983. When Bliss' grievance was discussed at the first step of the grievance procedure, only 2 weeks after his dismissal, the Union persuaded the Company to reinstate him, and he did get his job back. The Company nevertheless refused to pay him for the time off he had lost—9 days' pay. With the Union still pressing his grievance and preparing for the next step in the grievance procedure, Bliss voluntarily withdrew his grievance, and came to the National Labor Relations Board instead, with the hope of having a better chance here of getting his 9 days' pay.

A very significant aspect of this case must be kept in mind at this point. The Union, Local 337, did not participate in this hearing. It entered no appearance and none of its officers came to the hearing. This means that in the opinion of the Union—i.e., its elected officials, for they are the ones who speak for the Union, and not a disagreeing minority—there was nothing wrong in any of the warnings, criticisms, or even suspensions imposed by management. Were the Union itself of the opinion that this employer violated the statute in its treatment of its members, surely it would have been present to correct that wrong. Whenever an employee chose to file a grievance, the regular union officials did their best to win it. Not once, insofar as this record shows, has it failed to represent all as was its duty. And if it did not go to arbitration over the 9 days lost by its principal critic, it was only because he, Bliss, chose to withdraw his grievance.

In sum, what emerges from all this is a dispute between the Union and some of its members on the question of how the employees should be treated by their employer. As will appear below, there were even instances where the employee felt he had a right to arrange his own understanding with the Company as to what his "conditions of employment" should be, to use a classic phrase. Indeed, as to what work rules should or should not apply, these particular employees had their own ideas, and never mind either the precise terms of the exclusive collective-bargaining agreement or the regularly posted work rules entirely acceptable to the exclusive bargaining agent.

B. The Facts of Record

1. Jerry Bliss

There is a marked question of credibility running through the entire record, the General Counsel's witnesses (all employees), giving the straight lie to the Respondent's witnesses (all management representatives). As stated, the main witnesses for the prosecution were Bliss and Domke, both stewards most of the time during their employment. Again and again the question was whether the employees were or were not permitted certain liberties in the course of their employment, the employees insisting they were always free to do this or that, to move from building to building throughout the very large work area without having to clear with their supervisors, to talk instead of working during their work hours, to use the public telephone at will, etc. Against all this, the supervisors testified there were rules governing what liberties could be taken during work hours, restrictions upon leaving the work area without signing out on the timecard, or going from building to building in the vast property without permission of supervisors. A number of oral warnings, written reprimands, and suspensions are listed in the complaint as having been caused by the employer's desire to curtail the concerted movement among some of the employees to push the cause of the TDU. In some instances the employee involved denied having committed the offense for which he was criticized; at other times he defended on the ground there was no such rule as the supervisor at the moment said he was enforcing. In most instances, the question was the latter.

Sometimes credibility resolutions turn on what is called the demeanor of the witnesses, evasive answers to direct questions, refusals to reply, arguments in response to straight inquiries, etc. Sometimes the disagreement between the witnesses is put at rest by objective evidence as to which there is no question—documents, admissions, logical inferences that are inescapable. In this case, both of these elements come into play. If ever there was a case in which the credibility resolution is put at rest beyond question by both the demeanor of the witnesses and objective evidence, this is it. I cannot credit the employees against their supervisors where they are contradicted on this record.

One of the incidents of which the witnesses spoke at length will make the point very clear. In fact it involves the principal allegation in the complaint. In consequence of a general laxity in the enforcement of work rules before the concessions demanded and won from the Union in early 1982, and, of course, as part of its policy to "speed up" the work and increase the efficiency of its entire operation, on August 9, 1982, the Company posted a notice which, admittedly, came to the attention of all the employees. It reads as follows:

> Employees will not be permitted to enter buildings they are not assigned to work in without the express approval of their supervisor. (This includes all lunchrooms and restrooms.)

> Needless to say, this policy is in effect during both working hours and non-working hours.
> Violation of this policy will result in disciplinary action up to and including discharge.

On February 21, 1983, Bliss, the steward, left the grocery warehouse, where he worked, during his lunch hour and went to the produce warehouse, and distributed TDU literature among those employees. This grocery warehouse is a very large place, where 260 employees work, coming in different shifts starting at various hours throughout the day. They stack large amounts of food for the Respondent's 83 retail stores, move it about as ordered, take it on carts to many docks, and load trucks continuously throughout the day. There is a lunchroom there for their use and, as the shifts keep changing, there are very different lunch periods and break periods throughout the day. The produce warehouse is also a large building, with about 120 employees. Bliss admitted he did not punch his timecard when leaving his assigned building during his lunch hour, and did not ask permission of any supervisor to enter the produce warehouse, both actions violative of established work rules. He was given a written reprimand notice for the first offense, and a reprimand notice reading "Suspension pending advisability of discharge" for the second offense. In the office, when being given those two reprimands, Bliss denied having done anything wrong, insisting he had not violated any rules of conduct on the job. Confronted with the August 1982 notice, his argument became more clear. His position was, as he repeated at the hearing a year later, that the rule did not apply to him. And to prove his assertion he produced a letter written in 1979 by the lawyer for the TDU to the Company, and the Company's response at the time. The TDU lawyer wrote to the Respondent about employees rights to distribute literature on company property and warning it against commission of possible unfair labor practices for interfering with such rights. In response the Company had written to her that it intended to abide by the law as written and as interpreted by court decisions.

This attitude by Bliss, reflected throughout his testimony at the hearing, shows clearly a pervasive intent to change the facts, to put the Employer in a bad light and to further his disagreement with how his Union, Local 337, chooses to carry on its bargaining authority vis a vis the Respondent. There is no contention by the General Counsel that the rule of conduct, as posted in August 1982, was improper, or illegal in any way. Certainly even in the opinion of the Union, it conformed with the terms of the written collective-bargaining agreement. The contract contains the following provision:

> The employer shall have the right to establish reasonable rules and regulations and penalties for their violations; provided such rules and regulations and penalties are first approved by the Union.

At the hearing Bliss said he had always, before February 1983, gone from building to building to distribute his literature. How can I believe him with the posted notice so clearly prohibiting such action? Significantly, he also admitted, in agreement with the manager's testimony, that he had always been granted permission, when he asked for it, to go into the produce department to give out his TDU literature. What better proof than this that the Company was not opposed to what he was doing provided he conformed with the rules? Had the supervisors been instructed, as the employee witnesses kept arguing, to put a stop to the TDU activity, management would surely have denied such request, as the Company had a right to do under the rules.

Only 2 months before his reprimand for leaving his assigned building without clocking out, another man, Orr, was given a written reprimand for exactly the very same rule violation. That notice bears the signature of a union steward; Bliss was a steward and he therefore certainly knew the rule was being enforced. For him to say at the hearing, as he did several times, that he always left the building without clocking out—implying, although not proving, that any supervisors saw him do that—marks Bliss as an absolutely discredited witness. For sure the August 1982 posted notice, and the reprimand given Orr 10 days before Bliss got his, are all the affirmative defense needed by the Respondent. Bliss may be living in a dream world, but that he was lying as a witness is a fact. Wherever he is contradicted by a management witness, I do not believe a word out of his mouth.

Instead of arguing that the rule against entering another building without permission was improper, the General Counsel contended that the reason it was enforced against Bliss was because of his pro-TDU activity. But the proof is no more than his assertion. The answer to the question of permission whenever he asked for it is enough to wash that argument away completely. But there is more. When Bliss filed a grievance over the discharge which immediately followed, the Union went to bat, and at the first-step discussion won his job back for him. The Company could not have been so adamantly opposed to the man's activities if it yielded so quickly. The Union was prepared to take the matter further, and get him his 9 days' pay. It was Bliss who chose to withdraw the grievance instead. This was Bliss fighting the Teamsters, not the Respondent.

I find that the discharge of this man in February 1983 was not an unfair labor practice. An employee is not immune from discipline for an admitted violation of the work rules merely because he is engaged in concerted activity, whether in favor of a regular labor organization, or to further a disruption within that union. At the hearing the Respondent did not move to defer this issue to arbitration, as the contract called for. Had it done so, its motion would have been a perfectly good one. I therefore do not pass on the question whether, under the circumstances of this case, Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), applies.

But the General Counsel's stated reason why this man could not be deferred only sheds further light on the case as a whole. She offered to prove that the Union—again, that is, the duly elected officials who run the Union—do not like this man, Bliss, and his intimates, and that the reason is because he, and his friends, are very active in the TDU movement. She may be right; I do not know. But the fact is, like them or not like them, the Union always stood by them as any union does when any of its members get into trouble with the boss. It always represented them and did its best to protect their interest, as it was prepared to go to arbitration in Bliss' discharge. The real quarrel here, therefore, is not between the Charging Parties—Bliss and Domke—and the Respondent, the true nature of any complaint case before the Board. It is, instead, a quarrel between the TDU—represented by Bliss and Domke and the TDU lawyer, Thompson—and Local 337, or the entire Teamsters International. That dispute came to a head in this particular company when the Union gave the concessions in 1982, and when the Company instituted its "speed up" system at about the same time. And in order to create the impression that the dispute is with the Company instead, the witnesses kept talking about the employer's enforcement of the rules which implemented the concessions and the "speed up" as improper, not because it was not nice to get the Union's approval, but because the National Labor Relations Act was violated!

2. Michael Domke

Considering the testimony of Steward Domke in his entirety, he appears even a less credible witness than Bliss. He kept changing his answers as he went along, he evaded coherent replies again and again, he argued the correctness of his factual assertions when asked to speak instead of what happened. And, equally revealing, his testimony was at odds with unquestionable facts. A few examples will suffice.

Respondent has a rule that when an employee is supposed to be working he may not use the pay telephone without permission of a supervisor. On May 11, 1983, Domke did that and was issued a written warning for breaking the rule. As a witness time and again he kept repeating that there was no such rule, that employees had always used the phone at will, and that they still do so. There was then received in evidence four recorded written reprimands issued because employees had used the phone without permission. One is dated June 6, 1982; one is dated August 13, 1982, one is dated February 2, 1982; and one is dated July 14, 1983. The first three of these bear Domke's signature as witness, which means he was present as steward when the reprimands were issued. In his prehearing affidavit, after the events, Domke also said, "The employees used the telephone on a regular basis without getting permission." Can there be any question but that he was lying as a witness in this case? I think not.

In complete inconsistency with the above story, Domke defended his use of the telephone in May 1983 by saying he did have permission that day. He said the office girl, Miller, had handed him a note saying that Lloyd Williams, the Union's business agent, had called him and wanted him to call back. He quoted Miller as telling him, in the presence of Supervisor Daniel, "Call the guy right away." His position was, both to Daniel while getting the reprimand and at the hearing, that he had a right to presume that the clerk had been given permission to call him at the time. Miller did not testify. Daniel's version of this incident is that he did hear Miller say there was a message for Domke to "call 500," and that Domke then went outside the office to a pay telephone, and that while Domke was talking another supervisor saw him and asked Daniel had he given the man permission? With this, still according to Daniel, he went outside and asked Domke had he obtained permission from anyone, and Domke answered, "No." Daniel then ordered Domke off the phone, took him into the office, and wrote him up. As to what Domke argued then, Daniel said he only said he was "sick," and wanted to go home. When Daniel told him to wait until the written reprimand was finished, Domke threatened to file NLRB charges for being refused permission to leave immediately. According to the supervisor, therefore, Domke did not even claim, at that time, he had implicit permission to use the telephone. Miller was also given a written reprimand that day for having called the employee to the office without permission; she had been reprimanded for the same offense once before.

All I see in this is but another instance of a union steward believing that the rules in a work place applicable to ordinary employees do not apply to him. Domke started his very extended testimony by generalizing about how at the time of the concessions and speed up in early 1982, the number of disciplines increased greatly, how he always appeared at many grievance meetings about them, how he always argued against the speed up and stricter work rules. I think he just went to the phone that day and made his personal call because he still felt the rules he knew to be in effect were too stringent. This was a bone of contention between the TDU and the Teamsters, in which he was a principal activist. I credit Daniel. I find Domke violated the "don't use the phone" rule knowingly, that he did not even claim to have implied permission, and that the only reason he was given the reprimand was for the direct rule violation. I find nothing wrong in the Company having issued that reprimand that day. As to the complaint allegation that the Respondent enforced the rule "disparately" against Domke, it rests essentially on the steward's conclusionary assertion to that effect, which is destroyed both by the documents in evidence and by the very, very poor demeanor of Domke at the hearing.

As to the next incident, which I deem very revealing on the general question of credibility between the two groups of witnesses, the doubletalk which does no credit to Domke's testimony, is tied with like doubletalk in the General Counsel's complaint. On December 29, 1982, management asked Domke to come to the office so he could be present when five reprimands were to be handed to five employees, each for the same offense. All five of the men had left their work stations before the buzzer sounded for the lunchbreak. The very fact of management itself inviting the steward to the office then indicates a total absence of anti-Domke, anti-Teamsters, or TDU animus. One of the five men was VanWalthausen, who had several times already been reprimamded for the same offense. For the other four, it was the first time they had violated that rule. For this reason the manager had decided to issue a suspension notice to VanWalthausen, and only a reprimand to the others.

When Domke arrived at the office, he entered the room where the four employees were with the supervisors. VanWalthausen was asked to wait outside. For 15 or 20 minutes the supervisors discussed the offense with the men and with Domke. The employees and the steward, while admitting the offenses, tried to soften the blow. The reprimands were issued and the four left. When VanWalthausen was called in, Daniel started to write the suspension notice. Domke and VanWalthausen then began to talk between themselves about what they should do. Daniel told them to be quiet while he finished writing, because he had already decided what to do. In a matter of a few minutes he gave the employee the notice and ordered him out. Outside the office Domke and VanWalthausen continued to discuss what to do. When Daniel emerged and saw them so occupied he ordered Domke to return to work. Domke insisted he had a right to talk union business on working time.

Judging from what I heard, it is not at all clear just what the unfair labor practice was that is alleged to have occurred at that moment. At times Domke made it sound like a Weingarten case, where the employer refuses an employee's request to be represented by his union steward during a disciplinary interview or investigation. But there was no interview, or investigation conversation here. The decision to suspend VanWalthausen had definitely been made in advance. That is why he was told to wait outside while the proposed reprimands to the other four employees were being discussed. The manager saw no point in disconcerting the other four employees by having them watch while another man was discharged. This was only because it definitely had decided with finality what was going to happen with VanWalthausen.

The complaint puts it differently. It says that that day the Respondent "interfered with employees" right to process grievances by denying an employee access to the union steward at the close or immediately after a disciplinary interview." Asked, at the hearing, did this mean "that the unfair labor practice was committed by this company based on this man's testimony that they refused to permit him to permit his union representative to participate in a disciplinary, investigatory interview?" the General Counsel answered "Correct." But if Daniel's and VanWalthausen's testimony be taken in total, what they were saying is that Daniel refused them permission to decide—between themselves—what to do about all this. What did management have to do with any conversation that was to take place between an employee and his union representative about whether, or how, to file a grievance?

At one point VanWalthausen said the supervisor refused to permit him to ask the steward for a grievance form. There is a rule in this place that employees, and especially stewards, are not to discuss union business during working time. Domke was on the clock; he was engaged in union business while being paid by the Company only because the manager had asked him—given permission?—to come to the office on behalf of the four reprimanded employees. And again we return to the basic question of credibility running throughout this case. Domke, and Bliss, said that they could talk union business at will; the manager said otherwise. I just do not believe the unsupported testimony of the employees.

In sum, there was absolutely nothing wrong in anything the supervisors did that day. The details about it all by the employees served only to again show how the witnesses were trying to build a story with words but adding nothing of substance to the record. They were not credible witnesses.

On this same question of what the rule about talking instead of working during pay time really was, there are separate additional paragraph allegations in the complaint. In support of those allegations, Domke testified that in March 1983 Supervisor Daniel told him "not to solicit grievances" and that "if he caught me soliciting or recommending the employees at Borman to file grievances that he would discharge me." Domke also said that Daniels repeated the warning to him the following month, "not to solicit or recommend the employees to file grievances." Each of these conversations took place, according to Domke, on occasions when Daniels had called him to the office so he could speak on behalf of employees who were being reprimanded.

Daniel's testimony is different. When Domke became steward, in 1982, he told the man to stick to his work and that he could only talk to employees when "they would stop and maybe ask him about an insurance form or eye forms or something of that nature . . . as long as it was something that took a minute or two and, you know, didn't tie anyone up."

Daniel's testimony continues that because Domke felt the rule applicable to others could not apply to him, there was a later meeting with both Domke and Williams, the Local 337 business agent, present, when again Daniel restated the rule that union stewards were not to talk business during working hours without first asking permission of a supervisor. Williams agreed with Daniel, but Domke did not, and kept arguing with the business agent. And on January 3, 1983, Domke was given still another written reprimand that reads as follows:

> Failure to follow instructions on the above date. At approximately 3:15 p.m. you were observed in your work area having conversation with another employee (Don Pierce). You have been instructed several times that if another employee wishes to speak with you that he must have authorization from his supervision. Due to your failure to follow instructions I find it necessary to issue you this warning.

For the General Counsel to argue that this January 3, 1983 reprimand was issued only to justify the December 29, 1982 reprimand will not do. It is a form of inverse reasoning. The second reprimand was consistent with the overall testimony of many witnesses. In any event, no charge was filed in this proceeding until February 24, 1983!

The principal witnesses kept talking about things that happened in the work place, conversations with supervisors, which only cluttered the record and have nothing to do with this case—things that are not mentioned in the complaint. All the witnesses proved is that they disagreed with management as to what the conditions of employment should be. With the General Counsel asking all these questions of her witnesses, she did so on the theory that if management thinks an employee is wrong as to what the collective-bargaining contract says, or what the work rules are, this is proof of illegal animus against that employee. It is a very poor argument to make.

Again, an example: There is a rule applicable to working on Christmas Day. A notice is posted days in advance; anyone who wishes to work on Christmas Day must sign his name on the notice at least 48 hours in advance of the holiday. Bliss spoke of Christmas 1982, saying he was planning something else for that day and therefore did not sign up. He changed his mind and, the day before Christmas, said he was going to work. He was refused the opportunity. His position at the hearing, and as argued to the supervisors at the time, was that the rule did not apply to him because he was normally scheduled to work that day of the week anyway. "I informed the Company that you didn't have to sign the list to be able to work." Bliss even filed a grievance over the matter, which is still pending unresolved. I do not understand why I heard this story.

A better example of pure argument by the witnesses, intending again, I suppose, to prove animus against these men, is something that happened in connection with an arbitration that was scheduled one day. A man named Montiero was disciplined for low production, in fact discharged, on September 16, 1982. When he was to be given the reprimand the supervisors called Domke to the office so he could represent the man at the disciplinary interview, because the regular steward for that department was not available. After much discussion about the matter Montiero was suspended and Domke signed the reprimand notice. The matter went to arbitration, originally scheduled for January 4, 1983. Domke decided he wanted the production records applicable to Montiero and asked Zafarano for them one day while at work; Zafarano told him he did not have them. With this Domke left his work station and went to the pay telephone to call his business agent. When a supervisor asked did he have permission to go to the phone, Domke refrained from making the call and returned to his work.

The story thus far about the Montiero discipline and arbitration is from Domke's direct testimony. It spans a number of pages of transcript and must be read to be believed. He answered almost every question with an irrelevant comment about the Company's improper imposition of work rules, about all the liberties he had always been permitted in the past, and about the Company's antagonism towards him. Even the General Counsel had difficulty obtaining direct replies. After repeating a number of times that he always used the phone while at work and that nobody ever stopped him, he ended by saying he did not make the call when asked had he obtained permission that day, because "I felt I would be disciplined." If he knew he would be disciplined, he certainly knew the rule was he had to obtain permission first. It is not possible to believe one word this witness uttered.

Domke went on to say that when he asked for production records about Montiero's work to prepare for the arbitration about that man's discharge, which was scheduled for January 4, he was denied the opportunity to see them. The Respondent then offered a letter it sent to the Union's lawyer on January 4, reading in part:

> John Montiero and persons claiming to be his representatives have made two separate appointments with Borman's management to review Mr. Montiero production records. Although in each instance, the records and Borman's management personnel were available, Mr. Montiero or his representatives failed to appear.

Domke was Montiero's representative, present at both the disciplinary interview and at the arbitration hearing later. There is a rule that a steward desiring to attend an arbitration hearing must give 48 hours advance notice. Domke did not do that, but demanded the right to attend Montiero's arbitration anyway. At first Supervisor Daniel said he could not leave, but, when a union officer apologized for not having given the requisite advance notice, Daniel let Domke off and permitted him to go to the arbitration. With this being Respondent's attitude towards Domke's steward activities, how can I believe his story that the Respondent was determined to put a stop to his handling of grievances, or assisting the employees? The Company's January 4 letter in evidence proves without doubt he was offered the records, and if he did not see them in advance of the arbitration it was only because he himself was negligent. More importantly, this matter is further proof of the complete falsity of his entire testimony. Domke even testified that 5 days before he was so graciously given permission to attend that arbitration, Supervisor White told him he would be discharged if he became involved in that particular arbitration! Another perfect example of false testimony by Domke.

Wherever Domke is contradicted by the company witnesses, especially with respect to his testimony about being threatened by Supervisor DeMay or Daniel, I do not credit Domke.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

I recommend that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, District 1199E, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL–CIO and Johns Hopkins Hospital. Cases 5–CB–3533 and 5–CB–3585

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 31 August 1982 Administrative Law Judge Mary Ellen R. Benard issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions to the extent consistent with this decision, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The Respondent (Union) and the Charging Party (Employer) have been parties to a series of collective-bargaining agreements requiring the Employer, among other things, to contribute to the National Benefit Fund for Hospital and Health Care Employees (the Fund), a trust subject to Section 302(c)(5) of the Act. In 1980 the parties negotiated a new agreement to succeed one that expired 1 December of that year. Anticipating those negotiations, the Employer wrote the Union requesting certain information about the Fund that the Employer thought would allow it to determine whether it was getting its money's worth in benefits to its employees. The Union forwarded this request to the Fund, and the Fund eventually informed the Employer that it was preparing the requested information. Contract negotiations began before the requested information was provided.

On 6 November the Fund provided the Employer with certain requested information, but some of the information was omitted. The Fund expressly declined to correlate the information with names and addresses of the individual employer-contributors to the Fund, as the Employer had requested, the Fund trustees having voted to make that information confidential. On 14 November the Employer informed the Union that the information provided by the Fund was inadequate, and specified the additional information it was still requesting. On 1 December, the day the contract expired, the parties reached impasse and the Union began a strike which lasted until a contract was signed on 16 December. A principal issue causing the impasse and strike was the parties' disagreement over whether the Employer would continue contributing to the Fund and, if so, on what terms.

For the reasons to be discussed we do not agree with the judge that the Union violated Section 8(b)(3) by virtue of any action or inaction by the Fund. We agree with her, however, that the Union did violate the Act when it failed to explore alternative means of providing the requested information, and when it struck while refusing to provide information relevant to the outstanding issues in contract negotiations.

In finding that the Union was required, under Section 8(b)(3), to direct its representatives among the Fund trustees to provide the information, the judge relied on Hospital Employees (Sinai Hospital), 248 NLRB 631 (1980). In our recent decision in Food & Commercial Workers (Layman's Market), 268 NLRB 780 (1984), we overruled that aspect of Sinai Hospital. Holding that trustees of Section 302(c)(5) trusts are not agents of the parties who appoint them, for purposes of collective bargaining, we decided that the actions of trustees could not be the basis for finding bad-faith bargaining under the Act unless "a collective-bargaining representative demonstrates that it is in de facto control of a nominally independent trust fund." Slip op. at 5.

We find that the Respondent was not in control of the Fund at any time relevant to this case. We note that control of this Fund by this Union was demonstrated in Sinai Hospital, as we reiterated in Layman's Market. Since Sinai was decided, however, the relationship between the Union and the Fund has changed. Then the Fund's director was a union officer, and it was in effect the director's decision at issue in that case because the Fund trustees were deadlocked. In this case, the Fund director was not and never has been associated with the Union. Furthermore, the decision to make the disputed information "confidential" was at the initiative of the employer trustees of the Fund. In these circumstances, we cannot find that the union-appointed trustees had any duty, under Section 8(b)(3), to oppose that decision as Fund trustees. We will therefore dismiss that portion of the complaint.

[1] The Respondent has moved to reopen the record to show that the requested information has been provided to the Charging Party and that the National Benefit Fund has changed its policy with respect to "coding" the information. Both the General Counsel and the Charging Party oppose the motion. We find the motion is untimely because it could have been made to the judge before her decision issued; moreover, not all the violations found in this decision would have been cured by the belated provision of information. We will therefore deny the Respondent's motion and leave to the compliance stage the determination of the Respondent's efforts to cure the violations found.

We will not, however, dismiss the entire complaint because we agree with the judge that the Union was obliged to investigate alternative sources of the requested information, or to explain its unavailability, and it had failed to do either. While we stated in Layman's that the requested information was equally available to both bargaining parties, we were addressing only the question of the union's obligation to obtain information from the fund. In that case the fund eventually provided or offered to provide all the requested information. Here, the Employer informed the Union on 14 November that it needed information the Fund had failed to provide. We do not need to determine whether the Union had access to that information through other means because the Union did not offer to investigate other means, nor to show the Employer that there were no other means. As we stated years ago, "minimum standards of good faith required" that the Union do at least that much. General Electric Co., 150 NLRB 192, 261 (1964).

Except as it requires the Union to request action by the Fund, we will adopt the judge's recommended remedy.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, District 1199E, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL–CIO, Baltimore, Maryland, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a).

"(a) Make reasonable efforts to obtain, from its own records or other sources, the information requested by Johns Hopkins Hospital in its letter of 16 May 1980, to the extent that the information has not already been supplied, or document why it cannot obtain the information."

2. Delete paragraph 2(b) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to make reasonable efforts to obtain and provide to Johns Hopkins Hospital information pertaining to contributions to the National Benefit Fund for Hospital and Health Care Employees.

WE WILL NOT bargain to impasse or strike over subjects of bargaining about which we failed to supply relevant and necessary information.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner refuse to bargain with Johns Hopkins Hospital concerning contributions to said Fund.

WE WILL in the event the Fund refuses to make the information available, make reasonable efforts to obtain the information from our own records or other sources or document why we cannot obtain the information. If that information is not supplied, Johns Hopkins Hospital will not be required to bargain with us with respect to its contributions to the Fund until such time as the Hospital is provided with the information.

NATIONAL UNION OF HOSPITAL AND HEALTH CARE EMPLOYEES, DISTRICT 1199E, RETAIL, WHOLESALE AND DEPARTMENT STORE UNION, AFL–CIO

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARY ELLEN R. BENARD, Administrative Law Judge. The charge in Case 5–CB–3533 was filed on October 3, 1980,[1] by Johns Hopkins Hospital (Hopkins or the Hospital) against National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, District 1199E, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL–CIO (Respondent). On November 24 a complaint issued alleging, in substance, that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act by refusing to supply Hopkins with requested information which was relevant for purposes of collective bargaining. On December 2 the Hospital filed the charge in Case 5–CB–3585 against Respondent and on December 10 a complaint issued which, as amended on December 15, alleges that since about October 1 Respondent insisted to the point of impasse over a subject about which it refused in bad faith to provide relevant information requested by Hopkins, and that since about December 1 Respondent had commenced and continued a strike to compel agreement concerning a subject about which it was refusing to provide relevant information. Respondent filed answers to the complaint in Case 5–CB–3533 and to the amended complaint in Case 5–CB–3585 in which it denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

A hearing was held before me on October 19, 1981, in Baltimore, Maryland. Thereafter, all parties filed briefs, which have been considered.

[1] All dates are 1980 unless otherwise indicated.

On the entire record in the case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER

Johns Hopkins Hospital is a Maryland corporation engaged in the operation of a private nonprofit hospital in Baltimore, Maryland. During the 12-month period preceding the issuance of each of the complaints, a representative period, the Hospital received gross revenues in excess of $250,000 and purchased and received, in interstate commerce, materials and supplies valued in excess of $50,000 from points located outside the State of Maryland. The answers admit and I find that the Hospital is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act and I find that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent has represented Hopkins' service and maintenance employees for an undisclosed number of years and has been party to a series of collective-bargaining agreements with the Hospital. The most recent agreement prior to the events at issue here was effective December 1, 1978, to December 1, 1980. This agreement, called the 1978 contract, required the Hospital to, among other things, contribute monthly a sum equal to 10 percent of the gross payroll of unit employees to the National Benefit Fund for Hospital and Health Care Employees (the Fund).

The Fund is a trust fund subject to the provisions of Section 302(c)(5) of the Act and provides health and welfare benefits to employees represented by Respondent and to employees represented by the National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, Division of RWDSU, AFL–CIO (the National Union) with which Respondent is affiliated. There are approximately 40 trustees of the Fund; half of the trustees are selected by employer-contributors and half are selected by the National Union and/or its districts. Both the employer and the union trustees are selected according to a formula which is based on geographical area. The union trustees in the aggregate have one vote, as do the employer trustees; the vote of each bloc of trustees is determined by a majority within that bloc.

The trustees meet annually; there is also an executive committee comprised of six union and six employer trustees who meet once a month and have the authority to act for the trustees in between the trustees' annual meetings. The executive committee also votes by bloc; in the event of a deadlock of the executive committee the issue is referred to the full board of trustees. If the full board is deadlocked, the issue is submitted to arbitration.

B. The Hospital's Request for Information and Respondent's and the Fund's Response

Charles Johnson credibly testified that he became Hopkins' manager of employee and labor relations in April and at that time began to prepare for the upcoming contract negotiations. As part of this preparation, Johnson reviewed experience reports the Hospital had received from the Fund for the period 1976 through 1978. These reports are prepared by the actuaries of the Fund and list an employer's contributions to the Fund and the benefits paid to the contributing employer's employees, including a detailed breakdown for each claim. On the basis of the experience reports, Johnson determined that the Hospital had paid more in contributions to the Fund for the years 1976 through 1978 than its employees had received in benefits.[2] Johnson also discovered in the course of his review of the Hospital's files that his predecessor had brought a suit against the Fund and the Union charging mismanagement of funds.[3] Realizing that the Hospital's contributions to the Fund would be an issue in the negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement, Johnson wrote to Ronald Hollie, Respondent's president, on May 16, stating, inter alia, that "in order to prepare for negotiations for a successor agreement and to bargain intelligently concerning the provision of health care benefits," the Hospital requested the following information for the calendar years 1978 and 1979 and the first 3 months of 1980: (1) The name and address of each employer or other person who made contributions to the Fund; (2) the business or occupation of each contributor; (3) the formula by which the amount of the required contribution was determined; (4) the date and actual amount of the contribution made on the most recent date prior to December 1, 1978, for 1978 listings, December 1, 1979, for 1979 listings, and April 1 for 1980 listings; (5) the number of employees eligible to receive benefits from the Fund on the dates stated in response to item (4); (6) the plan in which the covered employees were eligible to participate on the specified date;[4] (7) the benefits provided if the plan listed in response to item (6) was other than Plan A, Plan B, or Plan C; and (8) the total annual contribution. Hollie responded by letter dated June 3, stating that he had forwarded Johnson's letter to Mortimer Lewart, the director of the Fund, and that Lewart would forward the requested information to Johnson "as soon as possible." Lewart also wrote directly to Johnson on June 11, acknowledging the request for information and stating that similar requests for information had been received and that the trustees had directed him to establish a format for data to be forwarded whenever such requests were made to the Fund, and that he would notify Johnson as to the date when a report would be available and its cost. However, as of October the requested information had not been supplied and, in consequence, Hopkins filed the charge in Case 5–CB–3533 on October 3.

[2] The Fund had not yet provided Hopkins' experience report for 1979.

[3] The record does not indicate whether the Union which was a party to that suit was the National or Respondent, nor does the record disclose the subsequent history of the litigation.

[4] At material times there were three major plans, known as Plan A, Plan B, and Plan C, pursuant to which the Fund provided benefits—Plan A provided the most benefits and Plan C the least. The Hospital's employees were covered by Plan B. There is also another benefit plan known as the "direct pay" plan, which provides benefits for individuals who have lost coverage under the other plans because they have retired or otherwise left the employ of a contributing employer, but who make contributions on their own behalf into the Fund. Presumably, the request in the Hospital's May 16 letter for information regarding "each other person who made contributions to the National Benefit Fund" as well as employers referred to the direct pay contributors.

On November 6 Lewart sent N. Peter Lareau, Hopkins' counsel, various statistics relating to contributions to and payments by the Fund in 1978 and 1979. Specifically, Lewart sent a list of all employers who had made contributions to the Fund for those years and their addresses, and in separate documents sent a listing of contributors, identified only by a code number which was not correlated with the names on the other list; the type of business in which the contributor was engaged; its average number of employees; its annual gross payroll, its average gross payroll per employee; its annual contribution; the percent of payroll contributed; percent of payroll contributed for each contract;[5] the type of benefit plan, listed as A, B, C, or O; and the amount in dollars of benefits paid by the Fund to employees of that employer. Not all the information was provided with respect to every contributor. For "type of business," for example, a number of entries list only "othr," apparently meaning "other," and some entries are confusing and/or internally inconsistent.[6] No data was supplied for any part of 1980.

After the information was received, but prior to November 14, Lareau had a telephone conversation with Robert Moore, Respondent's administrative organizer, and told him that the information provided was inadequate because the Hospital needed: (1) statistical information correlated to the specific contributor by name and address; (2) the occupation or business of every entry listed as "other"; (3) the formula utilized to determine the amount of contributions; (4) the specific description of the benefits provided for those beneficiaries whose plan type was not A, B, or C; (5) for those entries which showed that the contributor changed the contribution rate in the course of a calendar year, the length of time for which each of the different percentages was in effect; (6) the rest of the statistical information for those entries as to which some data was not supplied; and (7) all of the information for the first 3 months of 1980. There is no evidence of what response, if any, was made to Lareau in that conversation. There is also no evidence that any of the alleged defects in the information supplied were ever remedied.

[5] Apparently this item applies to those employers who had more than one collective-bargaining agreement requiring contributions to the Fund.

[6] For example, in the statistics provided for 1979, Employer 057157 is listed as having an annual gross payroll of 0, an average gross payroll per employee as 0, and 00 percent of payroll contributed, but the employer contribution is listed as $120,486. In the 1978 statistics, Employer 057157 is similarly listed as having no annual gross payroll, average gross payroll per employee, or percent of payroll contributed, but is also listed as having made a contribution of $116,010. The entry in the 1978 statistics for Employer 012021 lists 0 for its annual gross payroll, average gross payroll per employee, percent of payroll contributed, and percent of payroll per contract, but also lists a contribution of $87,322 and benefits in the amount of $94,494.

C. The Bargaining

The first bargaining session for a successor to the 1978 contract was held on October 6. Around September 29 Respondent had sent its initial proposals for a new contract to the Hospital, including an increase in the contributions to the Fund to 11.5 percent of gross payroll. Hopkins mailed its first proposal to Respondent on October 13 and included in that proposal an amendment to the section of the contract regarding the Fund which stated that the Hospital would provide health, medical, hospitalization, and life insurance benefits to its employees; i.e., that the Hospital could withdraw from the Fund altogether. There were a total of approximately 13 bargaining sessions; until the seventh session on November 28[7] there was no change in the position of either party regarding the Hospital's contribution to the Fund. However, at that session Sam Cook, one of the Hospital's attorneys, told Respondent's negotiators that the Hospital was willing to retreat from its original position and proposed that Hopkins participate in the Fund but at a contribution rate of 8 percent of gross payroll. Cook also proposed language which would require the Fund to use Hopkins' contributions for the sole purpose of providing the Hospital's employees with their current level of health, medical, hospitalization, and life insurance benefits, and specifying that none of the Hospital's contributions would be utilized for the purpose of providing benefits to any other persons. At this point both Respondent's and the Hospital's negotiating teams caucused; after the caucus, according to Johnson, Hollie said that Respondent was not stupid enough to strike over the Fund contributions or the cost-of-living clause (another major item in the negotiations), and that there would be no contract if those two provisions "were tampered with." Apparently, there was no response to this comment; the negotiations continued but no agreement was reached that day.

The next bargaining session began in the morning of Sunday, November 30, and concluded at 5 a.m. the next day but no agreement was reached. The Hospital proposed a new index on which to base the cost-of-living allowance and reintroduced its proposal on the Fund. According to Johnson, Hollie again said that there would be no contract if these two items were changed,[8] apparently referring to the clauses as they existed in the contract that was about to expire. At approximately 3 a.m. on December 1, Respondent suggested maintaining the status quo; i.e., a 10-percent contribution rate with no restrictions on the Fund's use of the money. The Hospital, however, rejected that suggestion and continued to insist upon its proposal. At 5 a.m. the Federal mediator involved in the negotiations declared an impasse and the strike began 2 hours later. The entire bargaining unit of some 1400 employees participated.[9]

[7] The Union notified the Hospital on November 19 that a strike would begin at 7 a.m. December 1.

[8] I credit Johnson. He appeared to be a straightforward witness and Hollie, although called as a witness by Respondent, did not deny making the statements Johnson attributed to him.

[9] The charge in Case 5–CB–3585, alleging that Respondent had unlawfully refused to bargain with the Hospital, was filed the next day.

Negotiations continued during the strike and in the course of a bargaining session which began on December 15 the parties reached agreement about 3 a.m. on December 16. That agreement provides that the Hospital will contribute a sum equal to 9 percent of gross payroll of employees who have completed their probationary period to the Fund and that "such payments shall be used by the trustees of the Fund for the purpose of providing said employees with health, medical, hospitalization and life insurance benefits and will remain at the level of benefits provided as of December 30, 1980, under the Fund's Plan B."[10] The strike ended that same day.

Johnson testified that at the November 10 bargaining session, which was the first held after the information described above was received, Respondent contended that the Hospital had not provided requested information on the pension plan and the Hopkins' negotiators responded that the information was being forwarded. At that point Cook or another Hospital negotiator stated that the information which had been provided to the Hospital by the Fund was inadequate. Although the Hospital did not again contact the Fund to request the information, Hollie, a member of the Fund's executive committee and an officer of the National Union, was present at this bargaining session.[11] However, it is undisputed that the Hospital negotiators never said that they could not bargain unless they had more information from the Fund and, according to Hollie's uncontradicted testimony, when the Hospital negotiators made their proposals as to what the contribution rate should be they produced figures which they said were based on information from the Fund.

D. The Board's Decision in Sinai Hospital;[12] Actions Subsequently Taken by Respondent and the Fund Regarding Requests for Information

About 2 months before Hopkins' request for information the Board had issued its decision in Sinai Hospital of Baltimore, supra, which involved a request by Sinai Hospital of Baltimore, Inc. (Sinai), for various statistical information similar to that at issue in the instant case; i.e., the names and types of business of all contributing employers, their gross payroll, the amounts contributed, contribution rates (both actual and required by contract), the number of employees covered, average annual payroll per employee, and the type of plan under which benefits were provided by the Fund. Sinai, whose employees are represented by Respondent and who is a contributing employer to the Fund, had requested the information from William Taylor, who was then and had been since 1950 the Fund's executive director, and who had also been the National Union's executive vice president for a number of years.[13] Taylor denied the request on grounds that the information was confidential and that too much time, effort, and cost would be required to provide it. Sinai offered to reimburse the Fund for preapproved costs of assembling the information and had expressed in its initial request a willingness to accept identification numbers in lieu of employers' names, but Taylor nonetheless refused to supply any of the requested information. Subsequently, Sinai wrote to Hollie and to Leon Davis, who was then both president of the National Union and chairman of the Fund's board of trustees, requesting them to instruct the Fund to provide the data, but they replied that the request should be addressed to the board of trustees. Thereafter, there was a vote by the trustees and the management trustees voted to supply the information and the union trustees voted not to; thus, the request was in effect denied.[14]

The administrative law judge found, and the Board agreed, that the information requested was relevant and necessary for Sinai's collective-bargaining purposes, that Taylor did not have a legitimate business justification for refusing to furnish it, and that his responses to the requests were not made in good faith. However, the administrative law judge further found that because neither the Fund nor its trustees were labor organizations within the meaning of the Act nor partisan agents of a particular principal, the Fund had no obligation to respond to a collective-bargaining obligation of the union by furnishing the requested information, and that the Board did not have jurisdiction over the Fund. The administrative law judge therefore recommended that the complaint be dismissed. The Board disagreed, finding that Taylor was not acting solely in the interest of the beneficiaries of the Fund when he denied the request and that he was thus not refusing to furnish the information in his fiduciary capacity, or if he was acting in a fiduciary capacity, that that fiduciary duty did not preclude the furnishing of the information, and that Taylor, Davis, and Hollie "violated their affirmative obligation to make a reasonable effort to obtain the information, or to investigate reasonable alternative means for obtaining it, or to truthfully explain or document the reasons for its unavailability, in violation of Section 8(b)(3) of the Act."[15] Thus, the Board held that "although Section 302 trustees may be expected to champion the interest of their respective principals, they must do so in a manner which is consistent with their fiduciary obligations rather than utilizing their alleged fiduciary capacity as a pretext to circumvent bargaining obligations under the Act."[16]

It is undisputed that, in response to the complaint issued in Sinai Hospital, supra, in November 1978 employer trustee William Abelow offered on behalf of 10 other management trustees and himself a resolution that [10] The printed version of this portion of the agreement refers to benefits provided as of "November 30, 1980" but is otherwise the same as the handwritten agreement signed by the negotiators on the morning of December 16.

[11] Johnson was substantially corroborated on this point by Hollie, who testified that he thought that the comment about information on the pension fund and the Hospital negotiators' comment that the Hospital had not received all the information it wanted from the Fund was made on November 27, but it may have been sooner.

[12] Hospital Employees (Sinai Hospital of Baltimore, Inc.), 248 NLRB 631 (1980), enfd. in an unpublished decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, December 10, 1981.

[13] Taylor was paid by the Fund in his capacity as its executive director but served as the National Union's vice president without pay.

[14] At the time of the hearing in that case, the issue had not been submitted to arbitration.

the Fund provide to either Respondent or Sinai the information the latter had requested, "in a manner which will preserve the confidentiality of each item with respect to any individual contributing employer," and provided that the entity requesting the information reimburse the Fund for all costs incurred in providing it. Thereafter, as found by the Board in Sinai Hospital, supra, management trustees voted for, and the union trustees voted against, supplying the information. There is no evidence in this record of any further actions by the Fund's trustees in determining how to respond to such requests until May 20, 1980, when, at an annual meeting of the full board of trustees, the employer trustees moved that the trustees adopt the resolution proposed by Abelow. The resolution was tabled at the request of the union trustees pending further opinion from counsel.

Thereafter, on June 10 the executive committee of the trustees met and, noting that there were several pending information requests from employers asking for different versions of essentially the same data, voted to request a committee consisting of Abelow, Lewart, and Donald Klein, counsel to the Fund, to develop a proposal to respond to all requests for data uniformly. On August 7 Lewart approved a computer job request for a Fund-wide statistical report at a cost of some $17,000, and at an executive committee meeting on September 9 Lewart reported that programing for a report on Fund-wide data was proceeding and that delivery was scheduled for November. The $17,000 for the computer programing was approved by the executive committee at its meeting of October 14; at that same meeting the committee approved a charge of $200 for each report to amortize the total cost of preparing the reports over the anticipated number of requests.

At the November 11 executive committee meeting, Klein reported that representatives of the Board, apparently in the compliance stage of the Sinai Hospital case, had questioned him regarding the information furnished to Sinai Hospital with respect to the lack of information the Hospital had requested for the years 1976 and 1977, a more detailed breakdown of the category of "other" of contributing employers, presumably the same problem faced by Hopkins in the instant case, and an identification of employers by location. The trustees unanimously directed that information for 1976–77 and a more detailed breakdown be provided to Sinai if it were willing to pay the higher cost of developing this information, but the trustees—also unanimously—declined the request that employers be further identified by location, according to the minutes, "consistent with the principle of confidentiality with respect to the identity of individual employers."[17]

[17] In accord with this position, Lewart, in a letter dated November 12 to Richard Dorn, an attorney who represented the National Union in Sinai Hospital, supra, and is a member of the same firm as Klein, stated:

> As to [Sinai's] request for additional identification of employers by location, the Trustees adopted the principle of confidentiality with respect to the identity of individual employers as a premise and prerequisite for making such a report available. They are of the view that adding the location of each employer to the report would violate that principle of confidentiality.

In the meantime, the Board had filed an application for enforcement of its order in Sinai Hospital, supra, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit granted enforcement of the Board's order in an unpublished decision dated December 10, 1981, in Case 80-1499. There is no mention in the court decision of the confidentiality issue other than a reference to Taylor's denial of the request for information on grounds that the data sought was confidential and the employer trustees' position that the information should be supplied with provision for protection of its "confidentiality."

E. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The parties' contentions

The General Counsel and Hopkins contend at the outset that all of the information requested by Hopkins, including a matching of employers' names and addresses with the statistical information regarding their contributions to the Fund, was relevant and necessary for purposes of collective bargaining. The General Counsel and Hopkins further contend the information supplied was inadequate because (1) there was no way Hopkins could identify which data referred to a specific contributor; (2) certain information was not provided, specifically: a description of the occupation or business of contributors described as "other"; the formula by which an employer's contribution was determined; a description of those benefit plans other than Plans A, B, or C; and, for those entries where the contribution rate changed during the year, a breakdown of when each rate was in effect; (3) there were significant numbers of "blank" entries, i.e., entries where the only information reported was the contributor's code number and the amount of benefits paid; and (4) no information at all for 1980 was provided. The General Counsel and Hopkins assert that no justifiable explanation was presented regarding the failure to provide the information, that the information sought should not be considered confidential, and that the fact that the Fund rather than Respondent is the repository of the requested information does not justify Respondent's failure to provide it. Finally, the General Counsel and Hopkins contend that Respondent's failure to supply the information converted the subject of Hopkins' contribution to the Fund into a nonmandatory subject of bargaining; thus, by bargaining to impasse and striking over that issue, Respondent further violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act.

Respondent contends, on the other hand, that it cannot be found to have committed an unfair labor practice by failing to supply information it did not possess, asserting that, in the instant case, unlike Sinai Hospital, supra, Respondent made an effort to procure the requested information and the fact that it was not all supplied cannot be attributed to Respondent. Respondent also contends that the trustees' unanimous decision, that in order to preserve confidentiality the financial data should not be correlated with the names and addresses of contributors, distinguishes the facts of this case from the Board's finding in Sinai Hospital, supra, that the refusal to supply the information was not made in good faith.

2. The relevance of the requested information

The duty of a participant in collective bargaining to provide information to its opposite number is well established, for:

> There can be no question of the general obligation of an employer to provide information that is needed by the bargaining representative for the proper performance of its duties.[18]

It is also well established that a labor organization's duty to furnish information relevant for collective bargaining is parallel to that of an employer.[19] In the instant case, Johnson credibly testified that in light of his conclusion that the Hospital had contributed more to the Fund than the employees had received in benefits for the years 1976 through 1978, and as Hopkins had sued the Fund and the Union alleging mismanagement, he realized that Hopkins' contributions to the Fund would be an issue in the negotiations for a new contract. Clearly, in these circumstances, information enabling Hopkins to compare its number of employees, amount of contribution, gross annual payroll, contribution formula, actual contributions, number of employees eligible to receive benefits, type of plan, and total annual contributions, with similar data from other employers, would assist Hopkins in formulating its bargaining position and supporting that position at the bargaining table.

Respondent asserts that inasmuch as Hopkins had received its own experience reports and a copy of a letter from the Fund's actuaries indicating that a contribution rate of 9.6 percent was necessary to continue funding benefits at the same level, and had received the information described above pursuant to its May request, Hopkins had sufficient information available to negotiate the collective-bargaining agreement. However, Hopkins was not required to "demonstrate that the information sought is certainly relevant or clearly dispositive of the basic negotiating or arbitration issues between the parties. The fact that the information is of probable or potential relevance is sufficient to give rise to an obligation on the part of [the Union] to provide it. The appropriate standard in determining the potential relevance of information sought . . . is a liberal discovery-type standard."[20] Certainly, Hopkins was not required to rely on the conclusionary statement of the Fund's actuaries, but was entitled to obtain statistical data and reach its own conclusions.[21] In addition, the fact that Hopkins negotiated the collective-bargaining agreement without all of the information it requested does not establish that the information was not relevant.[22] Similarly, the fact that Respondent's failure to provide the information was not apparently a major item for discussion at the bargaining table does not warrant a finding that the information was not relevant for collective-bargaining purposes.[23]

Respondent also contends that the Fund's practice of pooling contributions by geographical area rather than on a nationwide basis suggests that information as to all contributors in the pool is not relevant. This contention, however, ignores Klein's uncontroverted testimony that areawide pooling began in the spring and summer of 1980; thus this pooling method was apparently not in effect for the period for which Hopkins requested the data.

Finally, with respect to the question of whether a correlation between specific contributors and the data regarding their contributions was relevant, I agree with the General Counsel and the Charging Party that it was, both because Hopkins had no way of verifying the accuracy of the statistical data without knowing how to match statistics and contributors, and also because, in light of the system of geographical pooling which was being implemented in 1980, as discussed above, Hopkins was entitled to information enabling it not only to compare its contributions and the benefits received by its employees with other contributors in the same pool, but also to compare contributions made by and benefits received by members of its pool with those in other geographic areas. In light of these considerations, and in view of the Board's findings in Sinai Hospital, I conclude that the information requested in the instant case was relevant.[24]

3. Respondent's asserted inability to obtain information correlating the names and addresses of contributors with statistical data

Respondent contends that no unfair labor practice can be found with regard to its failure to match the names and addresses of contributors with the statistical data relating to their contributions and the benefits received by them or their employees, because this information was in the possession of the Fund and the trustees of the Fund had declared this information to be confidential. It is undisputed that at the November 11 executive committee meeting the trustees declined unanimously to identify specific employers with their contributions. In this regard, Respondent emphasizes that in Sinai Hospital, supra, the Board relied on the fact that the president of [24] In Sinai Hospital, supra, the Board found, inter alia, that the names and addresses of contributing employers, the type of business in which the employer was engaged, the number of employees eligible to receive benefits, the employer's total annual contribution, and the type of benefit plan provided, all of which were also requested by Hopkins, were relevant, 248 NLRB at 632. In the instant case, Hopkins also requested other information which was not requested in Sinai Hospital, supra. Significantly, the Board found that the charging party in Sinai Hospital was apparently willing to accept the statistical data without correlation to specific employers, and, thus, the Board did not pass on the question of whether Sinai was entitled to information which would permit such a correlation.

Inasmuch as the relevance of the information sought is established by the record, I find it unnecessary to determine whether all of the information was presumptively relevant. Cf. East Dayton Tool & Die Co., 239 NLRB 141, 143 (1978), in which the Board stated that insurance is encompassed within the concept of wages and that, therefore, information about insurance is presumptively relevant.

the National Union was chairman of the board of trustees and the executive vice president was the executive director of the Fund, and that the Board found that the latter had no legitimate reason for refusing to provide the information and that his refusal was not made in good faith. In the instant case, by contrast, the executive director of the Fund at the time of the negotiations between Hopkins and Respondent holds no position with either Respondent or the National Union, and it is undisputed that the executive committee of the trustees voted unanimously to refuse to supply a correlation between specific contributors and their contributions and other statistical data. Clearly, to some extent these facts differentiate the instant case from Sinai Hospital, supra. Nonetheless, I find that these factual differences are not such as to excuse Respondent from its obligation to provide the requested data.

a. The confidentiality defense

Although the record is replete with references to the asserted confidentiality of the identities of specific contributors matched to data regarding their contributions to the Fund, there is no evidence whatsoever as to why this information should be deemed confidential. Indeed, there is not even any evidence that employers were ever assured by the Fund that information about their contributions and about the benefits received by their employees would not be disclosed. Obviously, the decision by the trustees on the executive committee to categorize the information as confidential is not, by itself, dispositive as to whether the Board should direct that the information be provided.

b. The defense that the Fund, not Respondent, possessed the information

Respondent's contention, that its failure to match the names and addresses of contributors with the statistical data about their contributions was justified by the fact that this information was in the possession of the Fund, misconstrues Respondent's obligation as a party to collective bargaining. Clearly, if information is shown not to exist, there is no obligation to provide it.[25] However, where, as here, there is no dispute that the requested relevant information exists, there is an "obligation to make a reasonable effort to obtain this information, to investigate alternative means for obtaining this information, or to explain or document the reasons for its unavailability."[26] Respondent utterly failed to meet this obligation. True, Respondent did forward the Hospital's letter requesting the information to the Fund, but that is the only action Respondent took to supply the information. Thus, although two members of the executive committee of the Fund's trustees, Hollie and Henry Nicholas,[27] were on Respondent's negotiating team, there is no evidence whatsoever that either of them attempted to persuade the executive committee or even the union trustees that the information should be provided. Indeed, although Nicholas was at the November 11 meeting where the trustees voted to treat the information as confidential, he did not vote to supply the data, and there is no indication in the minutes of that meeting that he argued in favor of providing it. At least, if the union trustees had voted to provide the information and the employer trustees had voted against this action, the issue would have been submitted to the full board of trustees and, in the event of deadlock, to arbitration.

Similarly, there is not a scintilla of evidence that Respondent made any attempt to investigate alternative means for obtaining the information. In this regard, it is noteworthy that Respondent has collective-bargaining relationships with some of the employers who are contributors to the Fund, but, although presumably, by examination of its records regarding these employers Respondent could have matched some of the identities of the contributing employers with the statistics regarding their contributions, Respondent did not offer to do so or suggest any other alternative means for obtaining the information without recourse to the Fund.

Finally, it is undisputed that Respondent did not proffer any explanation as to why the information was not supplied other than that the Fund's trustees considered it confidential. Having found that the information was not confidential and that Respondent did not make sufficient efforts to obtain the information either from the Fund or elsewhere, I conclude that Respondent also failed to explain or document the reasons for the asserted unavailability of the information.

4. The failure to supply all the statistical data

As discussed above, there are significant gaps in the statistical information which was provided to Hopkins and no information was provided for 1980. Klein testified without contradiction that when the Fund received a written complaint from Sinai about gaps in the information which was furnished to it after the Board's decision (and which was apparently similar to the information furnished to Hopkins), the Fund requested the actuarial service which had prepared the information to supply the missing data to the extent it could and the actuarial service did so. Klein also testified that there was no similar complaint to the Fund from Hopkins. Respondent implies that Hopkins' failure to make such a complaint excuses the failure to attempt to supply more information. However, the parties stipulated that Lareau contacted Respondent's administrative organizer and specified what items were missing from the information supplied in November, but there is no evidence that Respondent subsequently attempted to obtain the missing information from the Fund.

To summarize, in light of the foregoing, I find that all of the information requested by Hopkins was relevant, that not all of the requested information was supplied, and that Respondent has asserted no sufficient justification for its failure to supply it. I therefore find that, by [26] Borden, Inc., 235 NLRB 982, 983 (1978).

[27] Nicholas did not testify, but it appears from minutes of executive committee meetings in evidence and from stationery letterheads that he was a union member of the executive committee and secretary of the board of trustees.

failing to provide the information, Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act. Having so found, I further conclude, in light of the Board's decision in Sinai Hospital, supra, that by bargaining to impasse and striking over the issue of Hopkins' contributions to the Fund while failing to supply relevant and necessary information about the Fund, Respondent further violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act.

On the basis of the above findings of fact and the entire record in this case, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Johns Hopkins Hospital is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, District 1199E, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL–CIO, is a labor oraganization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time service and maintenance employees who work regularly twenty (20) or more hours in the workweek, including dietary employees and dietary cashiers, linen workers and housekeeping employees, aides, nursing assistants, nursing technicians, technical assistants or helpers, messengers, and maintenance department employees, pharmacy technicians, electronic technicians, apprentices, radiology maintenance technicians, fire safety mechanics, P.C.C. teacher assistants, uniform room attendants, central supply technicians, supply aides, physician's aides, nursing unit clerks, and dark room technicians, but excluding office clerical and all other clerks, physicians, dentists, registered nurses, licensed practical nurses, technical and professional employees, temporary employees, guards, confidential employees, supervisory, administrative, and executive employees, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material Respondent has been the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the aforementioned appropriate unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By failing since about May 17, 1980, and at all times thereafter, to provide Johns Hopkins with relevant and necessary information pertaining to contributions by employers and others to the National Benefit Fund for Hospital and Health Care Employees, and by failing its affirmative obligation to make reasonable efforts to obtain the information, or to investigate reasonable alternative means for obtaining it, or to truthfully and in good faith explain or document the reasons for its unavailability, Respondent has failed to bargain collectively with Johns Hopkins Hospital and has thereby engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(3) of the Act.

The relevant information requested consists of:

For the calendar years of 1978 and 1979 and the period January 1–March 31, 1980:

(1) The name and address of each employer or other persons who made contributions to the Fund;

(2) The business or occupation of each contributor;

(3) The formula by which the amount of the required contribution was determined;

(4) The date and actual amount of the contribution made on the most recent date prior to December 1, 1978, for 1978 listings, December 1, 1979, for 1979 listings, and April 1 for 1980 listings;

(5) The number of employees eligible to receive benefits from the Fund on the dates stated in response to item (4);

(6) The plan in which the covered employees were eligible to participate on the specified date;

(7) The benefits provided if the plan listed in response to item (6) was other than Plan A, Plan B, or Plan C;

(8) The total annual contribution.

6. By insisting to impasse and striking over a subject of bargaining about which it failed to supply relevant and necessary information, Respondent has engaged in further unfair labor practices within the meaning of Sections 8(b)(3) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

Inasmuch as I have found that the information listed above and requested by the Hospital is relevant and necessary for purposes of collective bargaining, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to request the Fund, in writing, to supply the requested information to the extent that the Fund has not already done so. In the event the Fund refuses to make the information available, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to make reasonable efforts to obtain the information from its own records or other sources or document why it cannot obtain the information. Consistent with the remedy provided by the Board in Sinai Hospital, supra, if the information is not made available to the Hospital, I recommend that, if it so desires, the Hospital not be required to bargain with Respondent with respect to its Fund contribution until such time as it is provided with the requested information.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[28]

ORDER

The Respondent, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, District 1199E, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL–CIO, Baltimore, Maryland, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to make reasonable efforts to obtain and provide to Johns Hopkins Hospital information relevant for purposes of collective bargaining regarding contributions to the National Benefit Fund for Hospital and Health Care Employees.

[28] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Bargaining to impasse or striking over a subject of bargaining about which it failed to supply relevant and necessary information.

(c) In any like or related manner refusing to bargain collectively with Johns Hopkins Hospital concerning contributions to the Fund.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Request, in writing, from the Fund, the requested information regarding contributions to the Fund to the extent that the information requested by Johns Hopkins Hospital in its letter of May 16, 1980, has not already been supplied, as set forth in the section of this Decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) In the event the Fund refuses to supply the information, make reasonable efforts to obtain the information from it own records or other sources, as described elsewhere in this Decision or document why it cannot obtain the information.

(c) Post at its offices and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[29] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being duly signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Sign and mail sufficient copies of the attached notice to the Regional Director for Region 5 for posting by Johns Hopkins Hospital, if said employer is willing, at all locations where notices to its employees are customarily posted.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

---

[29] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

14 December 1984

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 13 July 1984 Administrative Law Judge Russell L. Stevens issued the attached second supplemental decision. The Applicant filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the General Counsel filed an answering brief in support of the judge's second supplemental decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the second supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the application of the Applicant, B. J. Heating & Air Conditioning, Inc., Woodland, California, for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act be dismissed.

[1] The judge creates a misimpression by stating that "severance and subsequent dismissal of the case . . . were based upon refusal of witnesses to appear at trial in answer to subpoena." Actually, the General Counsel was unsuccessful in his attempts to serve subpoenas, and therefore needed witnesses could not be produced at the trial.

[2] Because Member Hunter agrees that the General Counsel's handling of this case was substantially justified and that the Applicant is not entitled to an award of fees and expenses under the Equal Access to Justice Act, he finds it unnecessary to pass on the question of whether the Applicant has adequately demonstrated its eligibility for an award.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

(Equal Access to Justice Act)

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RUSSELL L. STEVENS, Administrative Law Judge. This matter arose from preliminary proceedings and trial in three cases consolidated December 30, 1981, by the Regional Director for Region 20 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board). Cases 20–CA–16449 and 20–CA–16451 involved Perrin Heating and Air Conditioning, River City Mechanical and Sheet Metal Workers Union Local 162, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL–CIO (the Union). Case 20–CA–16621 involved B. J. Heating & Air Conditioning, Inc. (B.J.) and the Union. At trial on August 31, 1982, prior to taking any testimony and prior to introduction of substantive evidence, the General Counsel moved to sever Case 20–CA–16621 from the other two cases, and that motion was granted by the administrative law judge (judge). The complaint in Case 20–CA–16621 later was withdrawn by the aforesaid Regional Director for Region 20.

On October 12, 1982, B. J. Heating & Air Conditioning, Inc. (Applicant) filed with the Board an application for award of fees and expenses under EAJA[1] and the Board's Rules and Regulations,[2] alleging entitlement to an award following withdrawal of the complaint against it. On October 18, 1982, the Board referred the application to me for appropriate action. On November 10, 1982, counsel for the General Counsel moved to dismiss the application, and set forth nine separate reasons in support of the motion. The first reason urged by the General Counsel was that the application was not timely filed. On November 29, 1982, Applicant filed a response to the General Counsel's motion to dismiss. On January 11, 1983, I issued a supplemental decision dismissing the application for lack of jurisdiction because it had not been timely filed. The remaining eight arguments advanced by the General Counsel were not reached by the dismissal, as they were procedural in nature. On January 26, 1984, the Board reversed the dismissal, held that the application timely was filed, and remanded the matter to me for further action, including the issuance of a decision on the merits of the application.

On March 6, 1984, Applicant filed a Motion for Summary Judgment, and on March 8, 1984, the General Counsel filed a response opposing Applicant's motion. Because of several apparent discrepancies and uncertainties disclosed by the record, I held an informal conference of the parties on April 16, 1984. In response to an Order dated April 16, 1984, issued following the conference, Applicant submitted explanatory material on April 27, 1984, and General Counsel submitted a supplemental memorandum in support of the Motion to Dismiss, dated June 15, 1984. The Order of April 16, 1984, provided, inter alia, that Applicant had 15 days in which to submit its affidavit response to the General Counsel's supplementary support of its motion to dismiss the application. That response, dated July 3, 1984, was filed July 5, 1984.

Findings and conclusions relative to Applicant's Motion for Summary Judgment, and to the General Counsel's eight arguments in support of the motion to dismiss, are discussed below.

I. MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Applicant argues "By failing to file an answer to the application within 30 days of the Board's January 26, 1984 order denying the Motion to Dismiss, the General Counsel has consented to the award requested by the Applicant herein."

That argument is based on an erroneous presumption. The Board's Order to this judge did not deny the General Counsel's motion to dismiss. The Order remanded "this proceeding," "for such further action as is required in light of our decision to accept as timely filed the application of" the Applicant, "including the issuance of a decision on the merits of the application."

[1] Equal Access to Justice Act, 5 U.S.C.A. § 504.

[2] Sec. 102.143 et seq.

Whether or not further proceedings ensue after the General Counsel's motion is disposed of is irrelevant to the proceedings herein. The only matter presently before this judge is the General Counsel's argument relative to items 2 through 9, set forth in the motion to dismiss.

Applicant's Motion for Summary Judgment is denied.

II. ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS

The General Counsel argues that the application does not show the net worth of Applicant as of December 30, 1981, the date of the complaint, as required by Section 102.143(d) of the Board's rules; that the application does not show the number of Applicant's employees on December 30, 1981, as required by Section 102.143(d) of the Board's rules; and that the application does not include accompanying notes and the accountant's review report referred to in Applicant's financial statement, as required by Section 102.147 of the Board's rules.

Section 102.143(d) provides that, for the purpose of eligibility, the net worth and number of employees of an applicant shall be determined as of the date of the complaint in an unfair labor practice proceeding. The date of the complaint in this proceeding is December 30, 1981.

Applicant's balance sheet, submitted with the application, is dated March 31, 1982, 3 months after the date of the complaint. Total assets are shown as $442,744. Total stockholders' equity is shown as $296,221. Total cost of property and equipment is shown as $295,256, with a net value of $90,412. Nothing in the record casts doubt on those figures, and no reason is shown for assuming that Applicant's net worth changed so greatly (more than $4.5 million) within a 3-month period as to place Applicant outside the purview of EAJA.

So far as the number of employees is concerned, it is apparent from the complaint and Applicant's balance sheet that far fewer than the 500 criteria of EAJA were employed as of December 30, 1981. As of March 31, 1982, Applicant's cash totaled $60,063, and its total receivables were $114,196. A weekly payroll for 500 employees, even at the minimum wage of less than $4 per hour, would be far more than Applicant's total cash on hand. Further, the application states, as required by Section 102.147(a) of EAJA, that Applicant employed 12 full- and part-time employees as of October 7, 1982. There is nothing in the record to indicate or show a precipitous drop in the employee complement within the 3-month period just prior to March 31, 1982, and the inference is drawn that, as of December 30, 1981, Applicant had employees totaling substantially fewer than 500. If there was any doubt concerning Applicant's eligibility on the basis of net worth or number of employees, that doubt could be resolved pursuant to Board rules.[3] There is no such doubt.

[3] Sec. 102.147(f) and Sec. 102.152(a).

So far as failure of the application to include the accountant's notes and review report is concerned, there is no basis in the record to indicate that the balance sheet is not within the requirements of EAJA and Board rules. Section 102.147(f) provides, inter alia, that the financial statement "may be in any form convenient to the applicant that provides full disclosure of the applicant's and its affiliates' assets and liabilities and is sufficient to determine whether the applicant qualifies under the standards in this part."

The General Counsel's arguments relative to this issue are found to be without merit.

III. FEES FOR WORK ON OTHER CASES

The General Counsel argues that the application "clearly contravenes the stated purposes of EAJA," in that it claims fees related to other litigation and matters between the parties.

In the application, Applicant claims fees for time devoted to an RM petition, and to cases consolidated with Case 20-CA-16621.

In its explanatory memorandum of April 27, 1984,[4] Applicant's counsel states, inter alia:

> In view of the Region's consolidation of these cases, there were certain portions of pre-trial preparation that were common to all three respondents. Accordingly, all time spent on trial preparation activities that were in the common benefit of all three respondents were billed out at 1/3 the total costs for each respondent. For example, on August 9, 1983, 4.8 hours were spent reviewing case files and conducting research on legal defenses available to all three respondents. For billing purposes, each respondent was billed 1/3 the total, or 1.6 hours. This method of proration is reflected in the Documentation of Fees and Expenses attached as Exhibit D to the Application for Award of Fees and Expenses Under the Equal Access to Justice Act in B.J. Heating & Air Conditioning, Inc. (Sheet Metal Workers Union, Local No. 162) in Case No. 20-CA-16621. It is also reflected in the Amended Documentation of Fees and Expenses—B.J. Heating & Air Conditioning, attached hereto and incorporated herein by reference. All other expenses listed were attributable solely to work on Case No. 20-CA-16621 and were billed 100% to B.J. Heating & Air Conditioning.

It appears that Applicant is not claiming fees for time spent on other cases that were not related to Case 20-CA-16621. It is clear from affidavits submitted by the General Counsel (discussed infra), and from Applicant's explanation, that the claim by Applicant covers prorated time spent on matters that were common to all three Respondents involved in the consolidated cases. This claim does not appear unreasonable or improper. The General

[4] The General Counsel states in the supplemental memorandum of June 15 that Applicant's explanatory memorandum was not received by the General Counsel. Applicant's letter of June 20, 1984, remedies that matter.

Counsel's argument on this point is found to be without merit.

IV. EXCESSIVE FEES

As discussed during the informal conference of April 16, 1984, Exhibit D attached to the application for fees award was not clear and readily understandable. The revised claim submitted by Applicant on April 27, 1984, which accords with Applicant's oral explanation of April 16, 1984, indicates that the amounts claimed are on the basis of $75 per hour as permitted by EAJA, or on lesser computations if actual billings to clients were at less than $75 per hour.

The General Counsel's argument that fees in excess of $75 per hour are claimed by Applicant is not supported by the record.

V. FEES AND EXPENSES INCURRED PRIOR TO OCTOBER 1, 1981

Applicant claims $60 for time expended on RM matters on August 14 and 26, 1981. The General Counsel submitted lengthy argument against such fees, contending, "it is clear that Congress did not intend to apply the statute retroactively so as to include fees and expenses incurred before the effective date of the statute," while acknowledging that EAJA is silent so far as that proposition is concerned.

The General Counsel makes the same argument that was made in Tyler Business Services v. NLRB.[5] There, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit stated, inter alia:

> The Act's test for recovery of attorney's fees is whether the case was pending on or after October 1, 1981, and not when the fees were incurred. The Supreme Court previously has approved fee awards for work performed before the effective date of the applicable authorizing statute. See Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678, 694 n. 23 (1978) (Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Awards Act); Bradley v. School Board of the City of Richmond, 416 U.S. 696 711–21 (1974) (Educational Acts Amendments of 1972). Because the statutes involved in those cases and the Equal Access to Justice Act address similar concerns, the rationale of Bradley and Hutto applies here. See Underwood v. Pierce, No. 79–1318–HP, slip op. at 7–8 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 25, 1982); Photo Data, Inc. v. Sawyer, 533 F.Supp. 348, 351–52 (D.D.C. 1982).

The test, therefore, is whether or not the case for which Applicant claims fees and expenses, i.e., Case 20–CA–16621, was pending as of October 1, 1981. It was not so pending—it was issued December 30, 1981, when it was consolidated with Cases 20–CA–16449 and 20–CA–16451, neither of which involved Applicant.

This argument by the General Counsel is meritorious, and the amount of $60, discussed above, is not eligible for an award under EAJA.[6]

VI. FEES AND EXPENSES INCURRED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1981

Applicant claims fees and expenses totaling $668 incurred prior to December 30, 1981, for preparing one letter concerning an RM petition and for conferences with B. J. Heating personnel and NLRB representatives.

The General Counsel argues that "only fees and expenses that are incurred in 'adversary adjudication' are recoverable, and that, under Section 102.143(a) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, "adversary adjudication" begins with the issuance of a complaint.

The General Counsel's summary of pertinent portions of Board rules is correct. The language of the rules is plain. No fees or expenses incurred prior to issuance of a complaint are eligible for award. The General Counsel is required by law to investigate all charges, and there is no basis on which to conclude that fees and expenses incurred during the investigatory stage of the controversy were intended by Congress to be compensable.

This argument by the General Counsel has merit, and the above-mentioned $668 portion of Applicant's claim is found not to be eligible for award.[7]

VII. FEES AND EXPENSES INCURRED IN DRAFTING THE EAJA APPLICATION

Applicant seeks an award of no less than $1576 for fees and expenses "according to proof incurred in the within application."

General Counsel argues that no fees and expenses incurred "after the adversary adjudication has been completed" are eligible for award.

The General Counsel's position is considered incorrect, since denial of such fees and expenses would have the effect of discouraging litigants who have established eligibility for an award from filing claims.[8] Claiming such an award, however, properly is for consideration only after an award has been made. The claim is not subject to a motion to dismiss. As found below, General Counsel was justified in proceeding herein, and the application is found to be without merit. Therefore, this portion of the claim for no more than $1576 is found to be an includable item in the total claim, but not eligible for an award because Applicant is not entitled to any of the fees and expenses set forth in the application.

VIII. FAILURE TO SHOW HOW APPLICANT "PREVAILED"

The General Counsel argues that "Respondent has failed to identify the Particulars in which it has prevailed and has failed to identify the positions of the General Counsel which were not substantially justified."

This argument is without merit. The application devotes approximately five of its pages, to a detailed review of the history of the case and, in another four pages states with considerable particularity the basis for concluding that the case was initiated and pursued without "substantial justification."

The issue of "substantial justification" is a separate matter, which is discussed below.

IX. SUBSTANTIAL JUSTIFICATION

It is noted at the outset, that this motion to dismiss raises a two-faceted issue. One facet relates to the investigative stage of the controversy; the other relates to the litigation stage. The Government's position must be found to have been substantially justified at both stages, in order for the General Counsel to prevail in this motion.[9]

So far as the investigative stage is concerned, it is quite clear that the General Counsel proceeded in a reasonable manner. The investigation was exhaustive and detailed.[10] Possible violations of the Act reasonably disclosed by the investigation were not novel or unusual—they included several possible 8(a)(1) violations (interrogations, circulation of unlawful petitions, and unlawful solicitation of employees) and 8(a)(5) violations (discontinuance of contractual contributions to trust funds). B.J.'s attorneys were present during much of the investigative stage (taking of affidavits), and during several negotiations involved in the three consolidated cases. There is no indication of any surprise on the part of, or of any advantage taken of, or of any false or misleading statements by investigators addressed to, B.J. or its attorneys. There is no indication, however slight, that the General Counsel's attorneys or investigators were motivated by antagonism, dislike, or vindictiveness so far as B.J. or its representatives were concerned. Issuance of a complaint based on the investigation was reasonable and proper.

So far as the litigation stage is concerned, there is no indication that the General Counsel's initial severance, and later dismissal, of the case against B.J. improperly was motivated or was based on last-minute recognition that a prima facie case was out of grasp. Counsel for the General Counsel represented at trial, and later in memoranda, that severance and subsequent dismissal of the case against B.J. were based upon refusal of witnesses to appear at trial in answer to subpoena. A copy of the subpoena for David Gladwill was submitted to the judge by counsel for the General Counsel, pursuant to the judge's request for subpoena copies. Gladwill was a key witness for the General Counsel's case. Without witnesses, a case could not be made. Pretrial affidavits, of which there were many, cannot be used as substantive proof of violations of the Act. If there had been no pretrial investigation, subsequent failure to litigate the issues possibly may have provided the predicate for an award. However, that is not this case. Possibly the General Counsel could have gone further, and asked a U.S. district court to enforce the subpoenas. However, that would have involved lengthy and costly procedures, and it must be assumed, in light of the General Counsel's generally reasonable approach to the case, that good reason existed for abandoning further efforts to get witnesses, whose affidavit evidence already had been obtained, to trial. There is no evidence that the General Counsel acted arbitrarily or improperly during the litigation stage of these proceedings.

Applicant's principal argument is that, had the case gone to trial, it would have prevailed on the merits. That may be true, but it is beside the point. The question is whether or not the General Counsel substantially was justified in initiating action against B.J. and in pursuing that action to the point of trial. As noted above, such justification is apparent. The General Counsel's evidentiary support disintegrated through no fault of his own, and that fact cannot now be used to negate the justification that existed prior to that time.

Based on the foregoing, it is concluded that there was reasonable basis and substantial justification, both in law and in fact, for the General Counsel's pretrial and trial conduct. It will, therefore, be recommended that the application be denied.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[11]

ORDER

It is ordered that the application of B. J. Heating & Air Conditioning, Inc. for an award of fees and expenses under the Equal Access to Justice Act is denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 28 February 1984 Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Linton issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel filed with the Board a motion to strike the Respondent's brief opposing the exceptions. Thereafter, the Respondent filed a motion to strike the General Counsel's exceptions. Both motions are denied.

[2] The General Counsel alleged that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Supervisor Burroughs because his business partner, employee Newbrough, engaged in union activities. The General Counsel argued that the discharge coerced Newbrough in the exercise of his employee rights because the part-time business in which Newbrough had a one-half interest could be harmed by the loss to Burroughs through the discharge of his main source of income. In adopting the judge's conclusion that Burrough's discharge did not violate the rights guaranteed Newbrough by Sec. 7 of the Act, we emphasize that the judge found that Burroughs was fired for his own conduct in maintaining a business relationship with a union organizer and not because of Newbrough's organizing activities or for helping Newbrough to vindicate his employee rights. We find it unnecessary to pass on Golub Bros. Concessions, 140 NLRB 120 (1962), and similar cases that hold that it is unlawful to discharge a supervisor because his or her spouse engaged in protected activity, as those cases are inapposite to the facts here.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. LINTON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in Amarillo, Texas, on October 6, 1983, pursuant to the August 10, 1983 complaint issued by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Regional Director for Region 16 of the Board. The complaint is based on a charge filed April 18, 1983, by Randolph C. Burroughs, an individual (Burroughs or the Charging Party), against Crouse-Hinds, a Division of Cooper Industries, Inc. (Respondent).[1]

In the complaint the General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on March 25, 1983, by discharging Burroughs, Respondent's maintenance general foreman, because a statutory employee (Joseph R. Newbrough) of Respondent, who was engaged in a sideline business as a partner with Burroughs, became involved in union activities, and that the discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act because it was done "in order to discourage employees" from engaging in union or other protected activities.

By its answer Respondent admits certain factual matters but denies violating the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is an Ohio corporation. It has a facility located in Amarillo, Texas, where it is engaged in the manufacture and sale of electrical fittings for electrical construction.[2] During the past 12 months, Respondent purchased supplies and materials valued in excess of $50,000 from firms located outside the State of Texas, and such supplies and materials were shipped from such firms directly to Respondent's Amarillo, Texas facility. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The General Counsel alleges that the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 602, AFL–CIO–CLC (the Union or Local 602) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. Neither in its answer nor at the hearing did Respondent ever admit such allegation to be true. However, Crouse-Hinds has contracts with other locals of the IBEW at other locations (Tr. 194). It appears from the record that on March 4, 1983, Local 602 filed the representation petition in Case 16–RC–8545, and that the Board-conducted election was held in that case on April 29, 1983 (Tr. 173–174, 219). The fact that Region 16 conducted the election supports the finding, which I make, that Local 602 is a labor organization. Story Oldsmobile, 244 NLRB 835, 836 (1979).

[1] All dates are for 1983 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] The corporate headquarters of Cooper Industries is located in Houston, Texas (Tr. 189). The division headquarters of Crouse-Hinds is situated in Syracuse, New York (Tr. 191; R. Br. 6).

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. General Facts

Charging Party Burroughs, as the parties stipulated, was a statutory supervisor at all times relevant (Tr. 24).[3] Around January 10, 1983, Burroughs and Joseph R. Newbrough, a millwright in Respondent's maintenance department, orally agreed to a business partnership, ostensibly on a 50/50 basis, in which they began operating a septic tank and backhoe business part time.[4] As shown on their business card, they named their side business the "B & N Septic Systems & Backhoe Service." (G.C. Exh. 3; Tr. 32–34.) In accordance with Respondent's rules, Burroughs obtained clearance from Respondent to enter the side business (Tr. 118–119). He thereafter distributed B & N's business cards (which named both him and Newbrough) to various supervisory personnel. In the latter part of January, Personnel Manager Don Barclay and Plant Manager Robert J. Murphy each conversed with Burroughs concerning the progress of B & N (Tr. 36).[5]

About Monday, February 28, 1983, Newbrough, his wife Marlene (herself an employee of Respondent), and employee Peggy Griffin went to the union hall of IBEW Local 602 and obtained authorization cards which they began distributing (Tr. 156–165). The organizing went rather quickly, for on March 4, 1983, the Union, in Case 16–RC–8545, filed a petition for representation election (Tr. 173, 219). Newbrough passed out union literature every working day in March (Tr. 65). The election was conducted in a unit of 118 employees on April 29 (Tr. 219), and, in Newbrough's words, the Union lost by a "pretty good" margin (Tr. 165).

By no later than early March Burroughs was aware that Newbrough was involved in the union organizing, and around Friday, March 11, Plant Manager Murphy informed Burroughs that the organizing had started in his maintenance department (Tr. 77, 114, 139–142).[6]

Leading up to the conversation in Murphy's office about March 11, Burroughs had a conversation with Personnel Manager Barclay, perhaps a day or two before March 11, in Burroughs' office. On that occasion Barclay told Burroughs that Burroughs needed to get his business partner "straightened out on his activities." Burroughs said that he did not feel he had the right to interfere with Newbrough's beliefs and that, if Newbrough wanted to be involved in the Union, it was his right and Burroughs would not interfere. At that Barclay changed the subject (Tr. 78–80, 115). Although Barclay did not expressly mention "union," it is clear, and I find, that he was making reference to the union activities of Newbrough.

At one point during the March 11 conversation when Murphy informed Burroughs that the union organizing had started in the maintenance department, Murphy and Burroughs were standing by a window. It was at the end of the shift and Newbrough could be seen waiting for Burroughs in the latter's automobile. Gazing out at Newbrough, Murphy told Burroughs that "it does not look good to the company or to the employees" for Burroughs to be seen in the company of Newbrough, and that such a relationship could lead to a serious problem. Burroughs replied that he and Newbrough did not discuss the Union, that the subject was not a problem between them, and that Burroughs would not discontinue their friendship or relationship (Tr. 80–81, 114).

Following this conversation, Burroughs told Newbrough that because of Burroughs' management obligations he no longer could socialize with Newbrough although they would continue their B & N business relationship (Tr. 116). Either in that conversation, or one as late as March 21, Burroughs, as Newbrough credibly testified, told Newbrough that Burroughs was receiving heat because of their association and because Newbrough was a union organizer (Tr. 162, 168).

The parties stipulated that James Ferguson is a statutory supervisor (Tr. 41). Based on the stipulation and the combined testimony of Burroughs (Tr. 38, 84) and that of Vice President Dunphy (Tr. 196), it appears that Ferguson holds some position in the employee relations department in Cooper Industries' corporate office in Houston. During the Company's counterorganizing campaign,[7] Ferguson conversed with Burroughs on three occasions. The first two conversations are not described. The third took place about March 22 in the office of Ron Riley, the plant superintendent. Only Ferguson and Burroughs were present. On this occasion Ferguson stated that Burroughs' outside business relationship with the union organizer was a real problem, and that it was not acceptable and would have to be dealt with soon (Tr. 85–86, 89, 115–116). Ferguson asked if Newbrough was aware that he was placing Burroughs' job in jeopardy. Burroughs replied that he saw no problem on the matter, that he and Newbrough knew how the other stood on the union subject.

Ferguson then complained that Burroughs had interfered with Ferguson's countercampaign when Burroughs intervened on behalf of Peggy Griffin who had received a warning for absenteeism. Burroughs told Ferguson that the reason he asked Plant Manager Murphy to review the case was because Murphy had always had an open

[3] Respondent hired Burroughs on July 10, 1980, raised him to maintenance foreman around October 1980, and promoted him to general foreman about October 1981 (Tr. 22, 132; G.C. Exh. 8).

[4] Newbrough, who later voluntarily quit his employment with Respondent, was a rank-and-file employee directly under a maintenance foreman. The foreman in turn reported to Burroughs. There were about 26 employees in the maintenance department.

[5] Only three witnesses testified in this proceeding: Burroughs and Newbrough for the General Counsel (with Burroughs again taking the stand in the rebuttal stage), and Edward Dunphy Jr. for Respondent. An attorney, Dunphy is vice president of employee relations for Crouse-Hinds at its Syracuse, New York headquarters.

[6] The record is unclear concerning exactly when Burroughs first became aware of the organizing. Although Newbrough places one conversation on the subject with Burroughs as occurring even before the cards were obtained, he seems to merge a separate and later matter with that conversation (Tr. 160). The precise time of Burroughs' knowledge is immaterial here.

[7] Burroughs testified that the supervisors were trained in the "Do's and Don'ts" and instructed not to commit any unfair labor practices (Tr. 143). Burroughs carried out his assigned tasks in the countercampaign, including distributing Respondent's handbills (Tr. 93). Respondent opposed unionization of the plant (Tr. 142). Dunphy testified, however, that Crouse-Hinds has contracts with the IBEW at other locations (Tr. 194).

door policy and several union supporters had come to him and said that the Peggy Griffin case was an example of why they wanted a union. Burroughs told Ferguson that afterwards Murphy told Griffin the matter had been mishandled by the personnel department and that the warning would be removed from her file. Burroughs further told Ferguson that he was not in favor of the Union at the plant, but he would not disavow his friendship with Newbrough. Finally, Burroughs expressed the opinion that the personnel department constituted 90 percent of the problems in the plant by, for example, mishandling certain terminations. Ferguson said "that" (personnel ineptness, apparently) would all be at an end (Tr. 86–90).

At a regular meeting of the maintenance department in the late afternoon on Friday, March 25, 2 of the 18 employees present asked Burroughs about his personal views on the Union. Burroughs responded that it did not matter to him personally, that his job was to run the job effectively and efficiently, and that he would see that the job was done—with the Union or without one (Tr. 92, 144–145).

Moments later Burroughs was summoned to Plant Manager Murphy's office. Just the two of them were present. Murphy asked for Burroughs' resignation. Burroughs inquired if Murphy meant from his supervisory position. The plant manager advised that it was a complete separation, and that Burroughs would be terminated if he did not resign. Burroughs asked for the reason and who had made the decision.[8] Murphy stated that the reason which would be given was a "conflict of interest," that the people handling Respondent's counter campaign felt that Burroughs was a problem because of his outspokenness and his association with the union organizer, and that such persons did not want that association.

Burroughs said that he would not resign, that he wanted the reasons stated on the termination slip, and that he would return the following day to obtain any evaluation or contracts he had signed (Tr. 94–96). The following day he picked up the termination slip which states (G.C. Exh. 7): "Termination due to conflict of interest."

At the close of the General Counsel's case-in-chief, Respondent moved for dismissal on the ground that no violation had been established even if all the General Counsel's evidence were credited (Tr. 174). I denied the motion and Respondent proceeded with its defense by calling its only witness, Vice President Edward Dunphy.

Vice President Dunphy testified that he was present at a general meeting of Respondent's officials at the corporate office in Houston, Texas, on March 24, 1983. In attendance were H. John Riley Jr., executive vice president of Cooper Industries; Felix F. House, senior vice president and general manager of the electrical construction materials product group of Cooper Industries; James Ferguson; and Dunphy (Tr. 190, 204). A number of matters were discussed including a report, apparently by Ferguson, on the Union's organizing attempt at the Amarillo plant (Tr. 189–190). Included in the report, according to Dunphy, was a comment that Burroughs was engaged in a commercial venture with a person he supervised, and that the business venture had consumed some of the normal work hours at Respondent's plant (Tr. 190, 195, 199–200).[9] Ferguson's report also included the fact that Newbrough was the husband of a woman active on behalf of the Union (Tr. 191). Dunphy testified that the report made no mention that Newbrough was active for the Union (Tr. 202). According to Dunphy, that report was his first knowledge that Burroughs was involved in a business venture with one of his department's employees (Tr. 195, 201).

Riley, House, and Dunphy conferred at a separate meeting later that March 24. Dunphy remarked that, although Burroughs was held in high regard as a technician, he was a problem in his relationship with other supervisors, and that the business venture with a subordinate was unacceptable. When Riley asked what should be done, Dunphy stated that Burroughs should be terminated. Riley asked if it made any difference that Newbrough's wife was active in the Union's campaign. Dunphy responded in the negative and added that Respondent could not have a supervisor compromising his responsibility to the Company by becoming involved in such a situation (Tr. 190–191). At Syracuse, New York, the following day, Murphy's superior, Patrick J. Vassallo, vice president of manufacturing for Crouse-Hinds, was informed of the policy decision to terminate Burroughs, and Vassallo apparently instructed Murphy that very day, March 25, to implement the decision (Tr. 191).[10]

On the matter of Burroughs' supervisory performance, it should be noted that the record contains his last appraisal, dated September 10, 1982, by Plant Manager Murphy, and approved by Vassallo on September 17, 1982 (G.C. Exh. 2). Item 6 under job performance pertains to his ability to work well with others. Murphy's entry for this item reads:

> Works well with his subordinates; has difficulty working with his peers in the production area.

Under the general heading of overall performance, item 4 asks for a description of areas needing improvement. Murphy wrote:

> Needs to improve his tact in dealing with people outside of his direct realm of responsibility. He also needs to develop a better understanding of the rules that a corporation of our size is governed by.

On the topic of potential for advancement, under item 4, Murphy wrote that Burroughs could eventually be

[8] On cross-examination Burroughs testified that he and Murphy respected each other and he therefore knew Murphy would not have taken this action on his own without talking with him in advance (Tr. 147–148).

[9] Although the report apparently named Newbrough, Dunphy testified that he did not recognize the name (Tr. 190, 192). Dunphy either knew Burroughs or recognized his name, and, indeed, referred to him by his nickname of "Bo" in his testimony.

[10] As Vassallo's name appears in the record with questionable or uncertain spelling (Tr. 31, G.C. Exh. 2 at 4), I have used the spelling shown at page 8 of Respondent's brief.

promoted to plant manager. As a final comment, Murphy added:

> Mr. Burroughs is a very highly qualified Maintenance Supervisor. He knows how to operate a maintenance crew. He needs to grow in the area of personnel relationships with people outside this group.

According to Dunphy, he considered and rejected the option of having Burroughs, rather than being fired, be directed to cease his business relationship with Newbrough. He rejected the idea because: (1) the B & N relationship was well known among a large number of the employees; (2) his supervisory skills were a source of concern to Dunphy; (3) he showed a lack of judgment in establishing B & N with a subordinate; and (4) attendance to B & N had, in some instances, occurred during work hours at Respondent's plant (Tr. 205).[11]

B. Credibility Resolutions

1. Introduction

It can be argued that I should first determine whether the General Counsel's evidence adduced during his case-in-chief, viewed in isolation from Respondent's defense, establishes a prima facie case before I proceed to review all the evidence.[12] On the other hand, as Respondent proceeded with its defense after I overruled its motion, one might contend that the appropriate procedure is to consider all the evidence, make credibility resolutions, and resolve the case on the merits of the entire record.[13] In view of the disposition I make of the case, the procedural choice seems immaterial, and I therefore have considered the entire record.

2. Resolutions

There is no direct contradiction of the testimony of Burroughs and Newbrough. Their demeanor was persuasive, and I credit them.

Neither was there any direct contradiction of Dunphy's testimony. However, Dunphy testified with an unpersuasive demeanor and I do not credit him. Moreover, certain elements of Dunphy's testimony are inconsistent with the undisputed facts. For example, Dunphy testified that Ferguson did not report that Newbrough, as well as Newbrough's wife, was active for the Union. In view of the evidence concerning Ferguson's March 22, 1983 conversation with Burroughs, it is simply illogical that Ferguson would omit reporting that Newbrough himself was active. I find that Ferguson did report that Newbrough was active in the union campaign. In view of my ultimate disposition herein, it is unnecessary for me to resolve whether Dunphy testified otherwise in an effort to place some perceived distance between Burroughs and the person active for the Union for the purpose of insulating Burroughs' discharge from a direct connection with a person active in the union campaign.

Second, other grounds specified for opting against simply requiring Burroughs to sever the business relationship seem to be afterthoughts added as makeweights. Thus, Dunphy overextends himself by listing Burroughs' supervisory skills as a basis for the termination. Murphy did write that Burroughs needed to "improve" in the areas of dealing with other supervisors, but his opinion that Burroughs had the potential to be a plant manager is a far cry from Dunphy's assessment that the deficiency of Burroughs was so bad as to warrant a termination.

Other than Dunphy's testimony about Ferguson's alleged report, there is no record evidence of a conflict between the work of B & N and the plant's work. Dunphy testified with an unpersuasive demeanor, and Burroughs (Tr. 128–130, 150–151) and Newbrough (Tr. 166–167) credibly denied that there was any interference. I find that Ferguson did not report about any conflict.

As for Burroughs' lack of judgment in establishing a commercial venture with a subordinate, Dunphy failed to address the fact that both Murphy and Personnel Manager Barclay were aware of the situation in January. It did not become an issue until Newbrough became a known union activist. It is noteworthy that Dunphy gave no testimony that either Plant Manager Murphy or Personnel Manager Barclay, or both, were discharged or reprimanded for allowing Burroughs to go into the B & N business with a subordinate.

In short, I find that but for Newbrough's union activities, the most that would have happened would have been an order to Burroughs to sever his business relationship with his subordinate. Although such a course had been strongly suggested to Burroughs, he was never ordered to sever his business relationship with Newbrough.

It is clear, and I find, that the real reason Respondent terminated Burroughs was that given to Burroughs on Friday, March 25, by Plant Manager Murphy, that is, his outspokenness[14] and his business association with a known union organizer. I find the "conflict of interest" ground to be a complete fabrication insofar as a termination is concerned. It could form the basis for an order to sever the business relationship, but that option was not chosen by Respondent. Thus, Burroughs was not terminated for insubordination in refusing to comply, for he was never ordered to comply.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

The thrust of the General Counsel's case, although initially appearing to be two-pronged, apparently has been merged into a single argument: A violation is established because Respondent interfered with the protected rights of employees by discharging statutory Supervisor Burroughs based on his business relationship with union activist Joseph R. Newbrough. The legal theory, advanced [11] As to the last item, no specific instance was described, and Dunphy testified that such factor had been reported to him by Ferguson (Tr. 199–200). Ferguson did not testify.

[12] See Hillside Bus Corp., 262 NLRB 1254 (1928).

[13] See Postal Service Board of Governors v. Aikens, 103 S.Ct. 1478 (1983). However, under Sec. 102.41 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, a party does not waive an objection by further participation.

[14] A euphemism, I find, for expressing a neutral position to his employees on the union issue, such as occurred on March 25, and to management when questioned about his association with Newbrough.

by the General Counsel in support of this contention, is the line of cases finding it unlawful for an employer to discharge a supervisor because of the union activities of an employee who is the spouse of the supervisor. The parties dispute whether the Board impliedly overruled such cases by its June 23, 1982 decision in Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402 (1982).

At the hearing it appeared that the General Counsel was contending that Burroughs' discharge additionally was unlawful because he failed to "straighten out" Newbrough. That is, that Burroughs failed to dissuade Newbrough from his union activities and even refused to make such an attempt. It was clear at the hearing that such a theory, to be successful, required inferring that Personnel Manager Barclay meant that Burroughs should, if necessary, engage in illegal conduct to dissuade Newbrough. This is so because the Board has long held that an employer is entitled to discharge a supervisor who fails to use lawful efforts in seeking to persuade employees to cease their union activities. World Evangelism, 261 NLRB 609 (1982); Western Sample Book Co., 209 NLRB 384, 389–390 (1974); and Southwest Shoe Exchange Co., 136 NLRB 247 (1962). At page 8 of his brief, counsel for the General Counsel acknowledges this settled statement of the law. As for Barclay's remark, the General Counsel does not argue that the evidence supports a finding that Respondent expected Burroughs to use unlawful means to dissuade Newbrough.

The relevant complaint allegation, contained in paragraph 8, is in the conjunctive rather than the disjunctive. Paragraph 8 reads:

> Respondent engaged in the conduct described above in paragraph 7 because Burroughs's business partner, i.e., Respondent's statutory employee, joined, supported, or assisted the Union, and/or engaged in concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining, or other mutual aid or protection, and in order to discourage employees from engaging in such activities or other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and in order to discourage employees from engaging in such activities or other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. [Emphasis added.]

It seems clear that the final clause of the allegation is an implied acknowledgment that it takes more than a discharge of an employee's supervisor-spouse to constitute a violation. Thus, there must be a further finding that the discharge would interfere with the statutory rights of employees.

We may now return to the debate of the application over Parker-Robb. When the General Counsel rested his case-in-chief, Respondent moved for dismissal (Tr. 174). As part of its argument in support of the dismissal motion, Respondent contended that Parker-Robb overruled the family relationship line of cases (Tr. 179). Respondent relies on the Board's language in Parker-Robb overruling the "secondary or incidental effect" cases. (262 NLRB at 404.) As earlier noted, I overruled the dismissal motion. I did so on the basis that the statement by Personnel Manager Barclay conceivably could support a finding that Respondent discharged Burroughs because he failed to use, if necessary, unlawful means to dissuade Newbrough.

In Parker-Robb the Board further stated that the justification for finding a supervisor's discharge to be unlawful, and ordering his reinstatement, is grounded on the view that the discharge itself severely impinged on the employees' Section 7 rights. Examples of this would be when a supervisor is discharged for testifying at a Board hearing or at a contractual grievance proceeding, or for refusing to commit unfair labor practices in order to dissuade employees from their union activities.

In support of its argument that the supervisor-spouse employee cases are still viable, the General Counsel cites Operating Engineers Local 400, 265 NLRB 1316 (1982). The Board there, at footnote 1, cited with approval cases which reaffirmed the Board's position that "a supervisor discharged because he or she is the spouse of an employee who has engaged in union or other protected activities is entitled to reinstatement and backpay." That decision issued some 6 months after Parker-Robb.

Burroughs was not fired because Newbrough was a union activist. Such an action would be more in the nature of a discharge for failing to dissuade Newbrough from supporting the Union. Burroughs was fired because he continued his business association with a union activist. An incidental effect of such a termination might be one of discouraging employees from supporting a union.

Respondent, as I have found, would not have taken any action against Supervisor Burroughs had he severed his business association with Newbrough. Newbrough could have continued in his capacity as a union activist and Burroughs in his position as a general foreman had Burroughs withdrawn from the B & N business partnership. When Burroughs failed to do this, he was fired. While it is true that Plant Manager Murphy did not give Burroughs that option, it is clear from my earlier findings, including the March 22 remarks of James Ferguson, that such an option had been available and strongly suggested to Burroughs. However, Burroughs repeatedly declared that he would not sever his association with Newbrough.

Does the option Supervisor Burroughs had call for dismissal of the complaint? If we had a spouse situation here, with a husband the supervisor and his wife an employee and also a union activist, could an employer tell the supervisor that his wife can remain active for the union, but that the supervisor would have to terminate the relationship, i.e., divorce his wife? Such a choice indirectly places the employee-spouse in the untenable position of learning that the price for his or her continued union activities would be either (a) a fired supervisor spouse or (b) a divorce.

The General Counsel contends that the "rationale in these earlier spousal decisions seems to be that the effect of the discharge of the supervisor-spouse is a form of economic reprisal against the employee-spouse, since the income of one is part of the income of both." (Tr. 8) From this the General Counsel argues that the discharge of Supervisor Burroughs because of the union activities of his business partner, Newbrough, would reasonably tend to discourage employee Newbrough from engaging in union activities.

"Thus," the General Counsel argues, "we see that the supervisor-partner's discharge operates as an economic reprisal against a statutory employee because of the statutory employee's union activities. The nature of the economic reprisal and the resulting coercive tendency is clear in the circumstances such as here, where Burroughs and Newbrough both engaged in a part-time business and the present and future viability of the business necessarily depended on the continued income of both partners." (Br. 8–9.) As the discharge of Burroughs, continues the General Counsel, had the effect of economically harming Newbrough, it then follows that the discharge of Supervisor Burroughs interfered with the Section 7 rights of Newbrough (and presumably, by extension, with the Sec. 7 rights of all other employees) in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Reinstatement of Burroughs, with backpay, is the appropriate remedy, concludes the General Counsel, in order to end the coercive effect of the discharge of Newbrough[15] as well as to convey to employees the extent to which the Act protects Section 7 rights.

In Consolidated Foods Corp., 165 NLRB 953, 959 (1967), the Board adopted an analysis acknowledging the general rule to be that although a supervisor is not protected from discharge because of his own union activities, there are three exceptions.

> First, that an employer may not discharge a supervisor if his defense is that he refused to commit an unfair labor practice for the employer. Jackson Tile Manufacturing Company, 122 NLRB 764, enfd. 272 F.2d 181 (C.A. 5). A second exception was established in the instance of a supervisor who gave evidence before the National Labor Relations Board. The third exception as spelled out in Golub Bros. Concessions, 140 NLRB 120, is where a supervisor is discharged because he or she is the spouse of an employee who has engaged in union or other protected activities.

Although the Sixth Circuit denied enforcement of the Board's order calling for reinstatement of the supervisor discharged in Consolidated Foods, it did so on the facts and expressly without reaching the legal issue of whether the discharge of a supervisor is ever unlawful. Consolidated Foods Co. v. NLRB, 403 F.2d 662 (6th Cir. 1968).

In Golub Bros. Concessions, 140 NLRB 120 (1962), the Board adopted the following language (140 NLRB at 127):

> There is no merit to the first defense aforementioned involving blanket immunity under the Act for the discharge of supervisory employees. It is now well established that while an employer may demand the complete loyalty of his supervisors and may discharge those who participate in union activity, the Act does not permit him to use this loyalty as a device for infringing upon the rights of rank-and-file employees. NLRB v. Talladega Cotton Factory, Inc., 213 F.2d 208 (C.A. 5); Jackson Tile Manufacturing Company, 122 NLRB 764, 767, enfd. 272 F.2d 181 (C.A. 5). A restraint on the exercise of employee rights is readily apparent where, as it is here claimed, the supervisor is discharged because she is the wife of an employee who has engaged in union or other protected activities. Brookside Industries, Inc., 135 NLRB 16. Under these circumstances, the rank-and-file employees of Respondents can "reasonably . . . fear that the employer would take similar action against them if they continued to support the Union." Jackson Tile Manufacturing Co., supra.

In Jackson Tile Mfg. Co., 122 NLRB 764 (1958), enfd. per curiam 272 F.2d 181, (5th Cir. 1959), the Board wrote at 767:

> We also find, as did the Trial Examiner, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by discharging John Scoggins, a supervisor, because he became reluctant to commit further unfair labor practices on the Respondent's behalf. The Board has held that a discharge of a supervisor for refusing to commit unfair labor practices on behalf of his employer constitutes an invasion of the self-organizational rights of rank-and-file employees.[5] This is so because it demonstrates graphically to rank-and-file employees the extreme measures to which the offending employer will resort in order to thwart them in their desire to join or assist a labor organization.

The Board did not expressly address the supervisor-spouse line of cases in Parker-Robb. And in the subsequent case of Operating Engineers Local 400, supra, the Board, in footnote 1, cited with approval Consolidated Foods and Golub Bros. and did not mention Parker-Robb. It therefore appears that the Board considers the supervisor-spouse cases a separate class distinguishable from the types of cases it overruled in Parker-Robb.

Assuming, therefore, that the supervisor-spouse cases remain viable, does the rule of those cases apply here? First, what is the rationale of those cases? Is it the economic relationship of the supervisor and his or her spouse as posited by the General Counsel? Is it the fear of an economic loss, that is, loss of the supervisor-spouse's job and income, which reasonably tends to interefere with, restrain, and coerce employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights? Or is it also the special and ancient relationship of husband and wife and the public consideration that the statutory goals will be defeated, in part, if an employer is given the right to hold a threat of economic terrorism over a husband and wife when one is a supervisor and the other a rank-and-file employee?

If the touchstone is that there is an economic relationship, then Burroughs and Newbrough qualify with their [15] In accordance with Operating Engineers Local 400, 265 NLRB 1316 (1982).

B & N operation. But if the special relationship of husband and wife is also part of the rationale, then the General Counsel's argument fails as to Burroughs and Newbrough.

It appears to me that something more than an economic relationship is part of the underlying rationale in the supervisor-spouse cases. That extra something can be described for our purposes here as the husband-wife relationship.[16] Consequently, the General Counsel's argument fails.

The only impact on Newbrough here would have been an economic inconvenience in his having to buy out Burroughs or sell his interest to Burroughs. That is a far cry from an employee being faced with the prospect of having to cease his or her union activities or face either (1) a discharged supervisor spouse with attendant economic loss to the family, or (2) a divorce. In short, the impact of Respondent's action here did not severely impinge on the Section 7 rights of Newbrough or other employees. I therefore shall dismiss the complaint.

[16] Whether that basis would include other family members, and even extend to friends and "friends" are matters which need not be decided here.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. IBEW Local 602 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At all relevant times, Randolph C. Burroughs was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

4. By discharging Supervisor Burroughs on March 25, 1983, because Burroughs continued his part-time business association with employee and union activist Joseph R. Newbrough, Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[17]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[17] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Joseph F. Whelan Company, Inc. and Charles T. Wiltse. Case 29–CA–10004

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 30 June 1983 Administrative Law Judge Steven Davis issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging employee Wiltse for refusing to participate in a disciplinary interview without a union representative. Contrary to the judge and for the reasons set forth below, we find that the Respondent acted lawfully when it discharged Wiltse for refusing to obey an order to go to the manager's office without a union representative.

During Wiltse's 6 years of employment as a truckdriver for the Respondent, he had received eight written warnings. He received four of these warnings in the 10 months before his discharge on 10 June 1982, two of which stated that the Respondent would take other action against him if his poor work performance continued and the third stated that the Respondent was asking for a hearing at which it would request permission to discharge him for poor work performance. After the fourth warning, there were two hearing sessions in April and May 1982 about the Respondent's request to discharge Wiltse, and a third session was scheduled for late June.

On 9 June 1982 a customer where Wiltse was supposed to be making a delivery called Respondent Manager Cotter to complain that Wiltse was not with his truck so it could not be unloaded. Cotter asked the customer to have Wiltse call when he returned. When Wiltse called about 15 minutes later, he told Cotter that he had taken his lunch break from 1 to 1:30 p.m., even though the customer's employees took their lunch breaks from 12:30 to 1 p.m., because he believed he was not allowed to stop for lunch until that time under the contract. Cotter said that Wiltse was wrong about the lunch hour provisions of the contract and that he should have called the office when he took a different lunch period from the customer's employees. Wiltse said he did not know that rule. Cotter said it had always been the rule that you should call because "you just don't walk away from the truck when the warehouse is operating." Cotter ended the conversation by telling Wiltse to get back to his truck, unload it, and "I'll show you tomorrow, you're wrong about this lunch hour."

On 10 June 1982, at the morning "shape" where drivers' work assignments were made, Cotter handed Wiltse his work assignment book and told him to come into the office next to the drivers' room. Wiltse asked if shop steward Sorensen was there. Cotter said he was not. Wiltse said he would not go into Cotter's private office for a talk without Sorensen being present. Cotter said that if Wiltse did not come into the office he could not work. Wiltse again refused to enter the office. Cotter then took Wiltse's work book, and Wiltse left the Respondent's terminal. That day, Cotter sent Wiltse a letter stating he was discharged because of his actions on 9 June at Krasdale Foods and on 10 June at the Respondent's facility, "when you refused an order to come into the office to cooperate with the company in straightening out the previously mentioned incident at Krasdale."

The judge found that, on most of the other occasions when Wiltse received written warnings, Cotter had asked Wiltse during the morning "shape" to come into the office for a talk. Each time Wiltse went into Cotter's office, where the shop steward was waiting, and discussed the incident with Cotter and the steward. Then Cotter handed Wiltse a written warning a few days later. Based on this past practice and on the scheduled hearing about the Respondent's request to discharge Wiltse, the judge found that Wiltse reasonably believed the 10 June interview might result in disciplinary action against him. Relying on the Supreme Court's Weingarten decision,[1] the judge concluded Wiltse was entitled to have a union representative present at this interview, and, therefore, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when it discharged Wiltse for refusing to participate in the interview without a union representative.

Significantly, the judge found that the Respondent fired Wiltse "only for his refusal to enter the office."[2] We agree. Based on this finding, we conclude that the Respondent acted lawfully under Roadway Express.[3] In Roadway Express, we stated that an employer does not first have to assure an employee that his representative will be present at a meeting in order to induce the employee to leave the plant floor. Thus, if the employer, as here, asks the employee to leave the work area to go to another location where further discussion can occur in private, the employee acts at his peril if he declines to do so.[4] In this case, Wiltse's refusal to report to the office as directed by Cotter clearly undermined the Respondent's right to maintain discipline and order, especially as it occurred in the drivers' room while Cotter was making work assignments. Although Wiltse was entitled to refuse to participate in an interview in the absence of the requested representation, he was not privileged to ignore the Respondent's order to report to the office in an attempt to compel the Respondent to conduct its business in the work area. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent did not violate the Act when it discharged Wiltse for refusing to obey an order to go to the office, and we shall dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

STEVEN DAVIS, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to a charge filed on October 6, 1982,[1] by Charles T. Wiltse, a complaint was issued by Region 29 of the National Labor Relations Board on November 30 against Joseph F. Whelan Company, Inc. (Respondent). The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Wiltse on June 10 because he requested that a union representative be present for a disciplinary interview, and because he refused to participate in such interview without a union representative.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the brief filed by Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a New York corporation, having its principal office and place of business at 439 West 54th Street, New York, New York, and a truck depot at 400 Western Avenue, Staten Island, New York, is engaged in providing transportation and related services. During the year ending December 1981, it derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 from services performed for Proctor & Gamble Company, Inc., located in New York, which company annually produces goods valued in excess of $50,000 which it ships directly out of the State in which it is located. Respondent admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that Truckdrivers Local Union No. 807, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the Union), is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

1. Background

Wiltse, hired by Respondent on April 19, 1976, as a truckdriver, has been a member of the Union during his employment there.

Wiltse has had a very poor work record. During his 6 years of employment he has received 8 written warning notices which set forth the details of such alleged infractions as having several traffic accidents which caused damage to the truck and failing to orally report an accident; taking excessive time while unloading the vehicle at certain stops and also between such delivery stops; writing false, later times of deliveries on his worksheet in order to make it appear that it took longer to make certain deliveries than it actually took; taking excessive overtime; stopping for coffee during work hours; failure to note on a receipt why all the items scheduled for delivery to a customer were not delivered; failure to travel by the most direct route between deliveries; failure to call the office if delayed at a delivery stop; driving with the brakes on, causing damage to two tires; inability to properly park the truck; ignoring the instructions of a mechanic, thereby causing the truck to stall which resulted in a mechanic being sent to fix the truck.[2]

Robert Cotter, Respondent's manager of the Staten Island facility, handed Wiltse the warning notices at the terminal.[3] About 1 to 3 days prior to the delivery of each warning notice, Cotter, during the morning shape, on handing Wiltse his assignment book for the day's work, asked him to come into the office because he wanted to talk to him.[4] On each occasion, Wiltse entered Cotter's office where he spoke with Cotter and the shop steward concerning the incident. About 1 to 3 days after the meeting, a warning notice concerning the incident discussed was delivered to Wiltse.

It should be noted that the warning letters of September 1 and October 2, 1981, contained the following admonition:

[1] All dates are in 1982 unless otherwise stated.

[2] The notices are dated September 15, 1976, February 17, 1978, March 26 and September 25, 1980, September 1 and October 2, 1981, and January 15 and March 23, 1982.

[3] The parties' collective-bargaining agreement provides that the warning letter must be issued within 7 days of the incident involved.

[4] However, on one or two occasions, the shop steward told Wiltse that Cotter wanted to speak with him and, on another occasion, Cotter began talking to Wiltse alone but then stopped the conversation and he (Cotter) called the steward in so that he could be a party to the conversation.

> If this poor work performance continues or if there are any other violations of the labor agreement by you we will take other action against you.

2. The events of 1982

The warning letter of January 15 specified incidents involving excessive time in unloading the truck at Respondent's terminal: failure to call the office when delayed at a customer; ignoring a mechanic's instructions, and causing the truck to stall, which resulted in Respondent incurring the time and expense of having a mechanic service the broken truck in the field. The letter ended with the following:

> Your work performance has not improved as you have been warned in the past. Your attitude seems to be that the company will just have to go along with whatever you do or say you have done, that whatever amount of time you take will have to be accepted, that whatever the costs are none of your concern. We are therefore asking for a hearing for permission to discharge you for poor work performance.

The parties' collective-bargaining agreement contains a provision whereby the Company may ask for an arbitration hearing at which permission is requested to discharge an employee. Generally, the employee continues working until the arbitrator issues a decision as to whether the employer may properly discharge the grievant.[5]

On March 23, a warning letter was given to Wiltse. The letter related an incident in which his trailer hit a bridge, causing a hole in the trailer's roof. The letter criticized his carelessness in striking the bridge; his failure to examine the damage to determine whether the roof was torn, thereby exposing the cargo to possible precipitation; and failing to immediately orally report the damage.

A hearing on Respondent's request for permission to discharge Wiltse was held on three separate dates, the last session being held on June 24. The General Counsel claims that, at the April 8 hearing, the arbitrator directed Respondent to retain Wiltse during the pendency of the hearing. Respondent disputes this. The transcript of the hearing is unclear on this issue.[6] I need not resolve this dispute inasmuch as I do not believe that it affects my ultimate resolution of this case. It is fact, in any event, that Wiltse was discharged on June 10, prior to the last arbitration hearing date which took place on June 24.

On June 9, Wiltse was assigned to make a delivery to Krasdale Foods. About 1:20 p.m. that day the receiving manager at Krasdale called Cotter, complaining that the driver was not with his truck. She said she would not be responsible for any detention charges. Cotter asked the manager to have Wiltse call him. About 1:35 p.m. Wilte called and told Cotter that the Krasdale employees took their lunch period from 12:30 to 1 p.m. but he could not stop for lunch then because, inasmuch as he started work at 9 a.m. that day, he believed that he could take a lunchbreak only between the fourth and sixth hour, so that the earliest he could take lunch would be 1 p.m. Wiltse accordingly took his lunch period from 1 to 1:30 p.m. Cotter replied that Wiltse was wrong about his lunch period being between the fourth and sixth hour, and was also wrong in not calling the office when he took a lunch period different from that which the customer's employees take. Wiltse responded that he did not know that that was the rule and asked which rule number he was referring to. Cotter said that it had always been a rule. "Everybody calls in. You just don't walk away from the truck when the warehouse is operating." The conversation continued for a few minutes and Cotter finally told Wiltse: "Look, they're irate up there. Get back to the truck, and we'll straighten [this] out tomorrow. Just get that load off now, and I'll show you tomorrow, you're wrong about this lunch hour."

The following day, June 10, at the morning shape, Cotter gave Wiltse his work assignment and book and told him to come into the office. Wiltse asked if Eddie Sorensen, the shop steward, was there. Cotter said he was not.[7] Wiltse refused to go into Cotter's office.[8] Cotter told Wiltse that if he did not come into the office he could not work. Wiltse again refused to enter, Cotter took the work book from Wiltse and Wiltse left.

That day Cotter sent a letter of discharge to Wiltse which stated:

> This is to inform you that you are hereby discharged because of your actions of June 9, 1982 at Krasdale Foods and June 10, 1982 at Staten Island when you refused an order to come into the office to cooperate with the company in straightening out the previously mentioned incident at Krasdale.

On June 24 the final arbitration hearing was held, and on July 20 the arbitrator issued his decision in which he found that Respondent had just cause to discharge Wiltse on June 10. The arbitrator's conclusion is as follows:

> After hearing all of the testimony offered at this hearing, the undersigned is persuaded that the grievant wants to do everything his way regardless of what his way is going to do to the Company, the labor agreement, promulgated rules of operation or the Union. By several of his self-willed acts he was posited just cause for his own discharge by the Company.

[5] By retaining the employee until the decision, the employer avoids liability for backpay which it would have incurred if it had first fired the employee and then later received a decision that the discharge was not justified.

[6] The arbitrator said the following at different parts of the hearing:

MR. CHAIRMAN: Leave [sic] him work until I hear the case. I mean that is my ruling. You request to discharge the man. Now, somebody has been postponing this, but I don't know what side.

MR. CHAIRMAN: Either you discharge him, or I am going to let him work. Because he has go to work until you request for discharge.

[7] Sorensen was not at work that day.

[8] Wiltse claims he told Cotter that he would not go into Cotter's private office for a talk without Sorenson being present. I credit his statement.

Therefore, I rule that the discharge of the grievant by the Company was for just cause and is hereby sustained.

B. Analysis and Discussion

The General Counsel alleges that Wiltse was discharged on June 10 because he requested that a union representative be present for a disciplinary interview and because he refused to participate in the interview without a union representative being present, in violation of his rights as set forth in NLRB v. J. Weingarten.[9] Respondent contends that the requested June 10 meeting was only for the purpose of explaining the contractual provision concerning lunch hours to Wiltse, and was a routine and informal meeting not requiring the presence of a union representative. Respondent argues that Wiltse was not discharged for refusing to attend the meeting without a steward, but rather was discharged for refusing to participate in the meeting in which he was to be shown that he was mistaken as to his understanding of the contract relating to lunch periods.

In Weingarten, the Supreme Court held, in agreement with the Board, that employee insistence on union representation at an investigatory interview, which the employee reasonably believes might result in disciplinary action against him, constitutes protected concerted activity.[10]

I believe that the evidence is clear that Wiltste reasonably believed that the interview that Cotter requested on June 10 might result in disciplinary action.[11]

On June 9, when the dispute arose over Wiltse's failure to take the proper lunch period, and his failure to call Respondent when he took a lunchbreak different from that which the customer's employees took, it was clear, as Cotter conceded, that Wiltse was taking excessive time because he stopped work between 12:30 and 1 p.m., and also took his 30-minute lunchbreak between 1 and 1:30 p.m.[12] In the past, Wiltse had been accused of taking excessive time, for which he was called into Cotter's office, discussed the matter with him in the presence of the shop steward, and had also, shortly after the meeting, received a warning letter regarding his taking excessive time. Moreover, the collective-bargaining agreement states that theft of time "is recognized as an offense for which severe disciplinary measures may be invoked." Two of the prior warning letters[13] which involved excessive time cautioned that "if this poor work performance continues or if there are any other violations of the labor agreement by you we will take other action against you." Wiltse apparently believed that it was necessary to answer three of the warning letters concerning excessive time, and he did so by writing responses with attached documentary evidence on April 3 and October 7, 1980, and September 9, 1981. Wiltse therefore took these warning notices seriously enough to attempt to rebut their allegations which is an indication that on June 9, when Cotter told him he would speak with him the following day, Wiltse reasonably believed that discipline might result from the interview.

It should be noted that Wiltse had also received a warning letter in the past regarding his failure to call the office when there was a delay at a customer. On June 9, Cotter accused Wiltse of a similar offense failing to call in when he took a different lunch hour from the customer's employees, thereby causing a delay. Cotter conceded that he would have spoken to Wiltse about that issue on June 10 also.

Furthermore, when Cotter requested his presence at a meeting on June 10, Wiltse was "at risk." Respondent had already requested permission to discharge him and two arbitration hearing sessions had already been held on his discharge, the last one only 3 weeks earlier, and the final hearing to be held only 2 weeks later, on June 24.[14]

In addition, the June 10 request for a meeting with Wiltse followed the past pattern of such interviews. The request occurred at the morning shape; the steward was present at the interview which took place in Cotter's office; the interview related to some wrongdoing by Wiltse immediately prior to the meeting; and the session was followed by the issuance of a warning letter 1 to 3 days later incorporating the matters discussed at the interview. Respondent argues that there have been occasions in the past where Cotter spoke alone with Wiltse. However, such occasions, as testified by Cotter, all involved incidents of alleged malfeasance by Wiltse, and as to which he could have requested the presence of a steward but apparently did not do so as was his right.

Thus, objectively viewing the circumstances which Wiltse confronted when requested to meet with Cotter on June 10, we see that: (a) he was accused on June 9 of theft of time, an offense recognized in the contract punishable by "severe disciplinary measures," and for failing to report a delay at a customer, as to both of which he had received warning letters in the past, (b) he was told on June 9 that he was to talk to Cotter the following day about these matters, (c) the past practice had been that

[10] The complaint alleges that the unlawful discharge occurred because of Wiltse's request for a union representative at a "disciplinary" interview. The distinction between disciplinary and investigatory interviews is of no moment since the Board has held that "the full purview of protections accorded employees under Weingarten apply to both 'investigatory' and 'disciplinary' interviews, save only those conducted for the exclusive purpose of notifying an employee of previously determined disciplinary action." Baton Rouge Water Works Co., 246 NLRB 995, 997 (1979).

[11] The test for determining whether an employee reasonably believes the interview might result in disciplinary action is measured by objective standards under all the circumstances of the case rather than by an employee's subjective motivations, Weingarten, supra at 257 fn. 5. I accordingly sustain Respondent's objection to a question asked of Wiltse as to why he asked for the presence of steward Sorensen on June 10. I have therefore not considered nor relied on Wiltse's subjective answer to the question in making my findings and conclusions herein.

[12] Wiltse was only entitled to take 30 minutes for lunch.

[13] The warning letters are dated September 1 and October 2, 1981.

[14] Respondent argues that the fact that Wiltse was given the right by the arbitrator to remain at work until a decision was issued leads to the conclusion that he could not have reasonably believed that he would be discharged until such time. However, Weingarten requires only that the employee reasonably believe that the interview might result in discipline. As set forth above, Wiltse reasonably believed that the interview might result in discipline and it did—his discharge that day. Moreover, he was discharged in part as set forth in the letter of June 10, for the June 9 incident for which the interview was sought—prior to the issuance of the arbitrator's decision.

when a request for interview was made in the circumstances in which it was made on June 10, the interview had been with the steward present, was concerned with his alleged incompetence, and was followed by the issuance of a warning letter, and (d) he was "at risk" in that a request had already been made for his discharge and two arbitration sessions had already been held.

Under these circumstances, the evidence is overwhelming that on June 10, Wiltse reasonably believed that the interview might result in disciplinary action, and he therefore had a right to have a steward present at the interview.[15]

On June 10, when Cotter asked Wiltse to come into the office, Wiltse asked if Sorensen, the shop steward, was there. Cotter said he was not.[16] Wiltse refused to go into Cotter's office without Sorensen present.[17] Cotter told Wiltse that if he did not come into the office he could not work. When Wiltse again refused, Cotter took the assignment book from him.

In this circumstance, the Employer had the choice of giving the employee time or a postponement to obtain the representation or, as the Supreme Court pointed out in J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. at 258–259 (adopting the Board's statement in Mobil Oil, supra, 196 NLRB at 1052), of "advis[ing] the employee that it will not proceed with the interview unless the employee is willling to enter the interview accompanied by his representative. The employee may then refrain from participating in the interview, thereby protecting his right to representation, but at the same time relinquishing any benefit which might be derived from the interview. The employer would then be free to act on the basis of information obtained from other sources." Respondent did none of these things.[18]

In its letter of June 10 to Wiltse, Respondent stated that he was discharged: "because of your actions of June 9, 1982 at Krasdale Foods and June 10, 1982 . . . when you refused an order to come into the office to cooperate with the Company in straightening out the previously mentioned incident at Krasdale." At the hearing, when asked by the General Counsel why he discharged Wiltse, Cotter replied: "Because he refused to come in and let me show him that he was wrong in his interpretation of this lunch hour." Indeed, the circumstances of the discharge lead me to agree that Wiltse was fired only for his refusal to enter the office.[19] Inasmuch as Wiltse had a right to have a union representative present at the interview, his refusal to engage in the meeting without a representative present, and his discharge for doing so is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[20]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Joseph F. Whelan Company, Inc. is, and at all times material herein, has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Charles T. Wiltse on June 10, 1982, because Wiltse requested that a union representative be present at an interview which he reasonably believed might result in disciplinary action against him and because Wiltse refused to participate in said interview without a union representative.

3. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

In cases where an employee has been discharged for refusing to participate in an interview conducted in derogation of his Section 7 right to a representative, a make-whole remedy is appropriate.[21] However, in this case, the General Counsel states that he does not claim that Wiltse's later discharge, as found by the arbitrator in his decision issued on July 20, 1982, was violative of the Act. Accordingly, the General Counsel does not seek reinstatement for Wiltse, and seeks backpay only for the period from June 10 to July 20, 1982.[22]

I therefore recommend that Respondent be ordered to make Wiltse whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him from June 10 to July 20, 1982.[23] The amount of backpay

[15] I reject Respondent's argument that the June 10 interview was only for the purpose of explaining the contractual provisions, relating to lunch period to Wiltse, to correct his misunderstanding of the contract, and to prevent further similar incidents. Wiltse was not advised of this when Cotter requested that he go into the office on June 10. Moreover, the extreme form of discipline—discharge—was imposed on Wiltse in part according to the June 10 letter for the June 9 incident. Northwest Engineering Co., 265 NLRB 190 (1982), relied on by Respondent, is inapposite. That case involved a "general shop meeting, informational in nature," to review work rules, at which all the employees were present. The purpose of the meeting was stated at the outset, "it did not relate to any one specific employee or to any single instance of purported misconduct or deficiency in performance," and no discipline was imposed. In contrast, the instant case involved a situation where only Wiltse was asked to go into the office for a private meeting with Cotter. He was not told that the purpose of the meeting was to explain the contractual provisions relating to the lunch period. The purpose of the meeting clearly was to discuss his wrongdoing of the previous day, and discipline was imposed.

[16] Sorensen was not at work that day. There was no evidence as to whether alternate shop steward Freddie O'Neal was available.

[17] Cotter agrees that Wiltse refused to come into the office. I credit Wiltse's statement that he refused to speak to Cotter without union representation. In view of Wiltse's reasonable belief that the interview would result in discipline, it is manifest that he would have expressly refused to enter unless Sorensen was present.

[18] Super Valu Xenia, 235 NLRB 1581, 1591 (1978).

[19] Respondent could not have immediately discharged Wiltse for theft of time since the contract states that such an offense is not a ground for immediate discharge. Moreover, Wiltse had been similarly accused of such wrongdoing in the past but had not been fired on the spot for that reason before.

[22] The complaint allegations are consistent with these contentions of the General Counsel. I need not therefore reach the question of whether the arbitrator's award meets the criteria set forth in Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955).

[23] I reject Respondent's contention that the backpay period should be reduced because of Wiltse's failure to provide the arbitrator with a transcript of the hearing in a timely manner. Wiltse requested that his attorney engage a court reporter to record and transcribe the June 24 arbitration hearing. The arbitrator required that a copy of the transcript be sent to him. On July 14, 1982, Wiltse's attorney advised the arbitrator that the transcript "would not be forthcoming and the Impartial Chairman should not wait any longer before rendering his award." The arbitrator issued his decision on July 20. In the absence of proof that any delay in the arbitrator's issuance of his decision was caused by Wiltse's failure to provide a copy of the transcript as promised, I cannot find that the backpay period should be limited. There was no evidence that there was any delay in the issuance of the award. Thus, the arbitrator was advised on July 14 that he would not receive the transcript and it was not until July 20 that the award was issued.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 26 August 1983 the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order[1] in this proceeding. By panel majority, the Board reversed the administrative law judge's findings that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by initially refusing to recall the Charging Party from his 3 December 1980 layoff and then only employing him intermittently in 1981. The Board majority reversed the judge's credibility resolutions, considering them to be based not specifically on demeanor but on inferences drawn from an incorrect factual analysis made by the judge. The Board majority, therefore, found that the General Counsel had not proven by a preponderance of the evidence that the Respondent had discriminated against the Charging Party because it believed that he had filed a complaint against the Company with the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA). Thus, the complaint in this case was dismissed in its entirety.[2]

Thereafter, the Charging Party filed a petition for review of the Board's Decision and Order with the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. On 17 April 1984 the court issued an opinion[3] in which it refused to affirm the Board's decision and order, which it found to be unsupported by substantial evidence. The court consequently remanded the case to the Board for a determination of the applicability of the Board's newly adopted principles concerning protected concerted activity recently enunciated in Meyers Industries,[4] which issued while court appeal of this case was pending. According to the court's remand, if Meyers applies, then the Board is to reevaluate the case on the basis of the judge's factual findings; if Meyers does not apply, then the Board is to "reinstate" the decision and order of the judge.

On 2 July 1984 the Board advised the parties that it had decided to accept the remand from the court and that they could, if they so wished, submit statements of positions with respect to the remanded issues. Thereafter, the Charging Party and the Respondent filed statements of position.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Having accepted the remand, the Board must observe the court opinion as the law of the case.

The Board has considered this case in light of the court's opinion and the parties' statements of position and has decided to apply Meyers Industries to this case and find no violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act because, based on the judge's factual findings, the Charging Party's suspected actions in connection with an OSHA complaint do not fall within the Meyers definition of concerted activity.

In Meyers Industries, the Board held that "[i]n general, to find an employees' activity to be 'concerted,' we shall require that it be engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not solely by and on behalf of the employee himself."[5] In doing so, the Board overruled Alleluia Cushion Co.,[6] the precedent on which the judge principally relied to find the Charging Party's suspected contact with OSHA to be concerted activity. Under Alleluia, "[t]he existence of relevant legislation and its invocation by a solitary employee became sufficient to find concerted activity."[7] Thus, in Alleluia, the Board found concerted activity based on a single employee's contact with OSHA, in the absence of any outward manifestation of group employee action. With Meyers, the Board has rejected the per se standard of concerted activity established by Alleluia and, instead, has returned to the pre-Alleluia "objective" standard of concerted activity.

Since the decision in Meyers issued, the Board has consistently applied the "objective" standard of concerted activity to all pending cases.[8] This retroactive application of Meyers follows the Board's traditional approach to apply the pronouncement of a new rule of law to the case in which it arose and to all pending cases, absent special circumstances.[9] To date, the Board has already retroactively applied Meyers to pending cases in which the events occurred before Meyers was decided, in particular, events occurring during 1980 and 1981, the years involved in the instant case.[10] Accordingly, we shall apply the principles of Meyers to this case.

[2] In such circumstances, the majority found it unnecessary to reach the further legal issue presented in the case, i.e., "whether Respondent would have violated the Act had it curtailed [the Charging Party's] work opportunities because it thought that he had filed a complaint with OSHA." 267 NLRB 476 fn. 16.

Applying the Meyers definition of concerted activity, we observe that the judge's findings show that the Respondent's suspicions ran only to a single employee making a complaint against the Respondent to OSHA. The judge found that Union Business Manager Burke advised Charging Party Ewing that "Respondent didn't want Ewing to work for them anymore because he [Ewing] had written a letter to OSHA complaining about Respondent."[11] The judge further found that the Respondent's vice president Shafer "confirmed that Respondent did not want Ewing back because they believed he had reported the company to OSHA." In a later conversation with Shafer in the presence of Burke, Ewing denied that he made a complaint to OSHA. According to the judge's findings, Shafer told Burke and Ewing that "Respondent had narrowed it down to three men who they believed reported the company to OSHA, one of them was Ewing, and they didn't want Ewing working for them." The judge then concluded that "[i]t is clear from this record that Ewing was not recalled from layoff because Respondent believed (albeit inaccurately) that he had complained about it to OSHA." Finally, the judge concluded that Ewing's curtailment of employment occurred "because of Respondent's mistaken belief that Ewing had filed a complaint concerning Respondent with OSHA." Thus, a fair reading of the judge's findings does not support a finding that the Respondent thought Ewing acted "with or on authority of other employees, and not solely by or on behalf of" himself. We likewise note that the record itself does not support a finding that the activity in which the Respondent thought Ewing engaged and for which Ewing lost job opportunities—individually filing an OSHA complaint—was concerted.

Accordingly, we find that Ewing was not engaged in concerted activity under Meyers Industries. We therefore conclude that the Respondent did not violate the Act by failing to recall Ewing or by employing him intermittently in 1981. Thus, we affirm our prior dismissal of the complaint in its entirety.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

For the reasons stated in my dissenting opinion in Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984), I find, contrary to my colleagues and in agreement with the judge, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by refusing to recall employee Robert Ewing from layoff because it believed, albeit erroneously, that Ewing had filed a complaint against it with the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA). Whether he had been fired because he filed such a complaint or, as here, because of a belief that he had done so, his discharge was motivated by his conduct, actual or perceived, that impliedly was concerted and therefore protected.

14 December 1984

DECISION ON REVIEW AND DIRECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 28 September 1983 the Regional Director for Region 10 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in the Petitioner's requested unit of production and maintenance employees at the Employer's Cherokee, Alabama facility, including plant operators, truckdrivers, and mechanics. The Employer had contended that the operators were not properly included in the unit because they did not share a community of interest with the other requested employees. The Employer filed a timely request for review and the Board granted it by telegraphic order of 28 October 1983. No briefs were filed on review.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case with respect to the issues under review, and reaches the following conclusions:

The Employer manufactures industrial gases by a largely automated process; the operators' duties consist principally of monitoring the equipment. The operators also fill trucks belonging to other employers, and complete various paperwork associated with those pickups. The Employer's drivers fill their own trucks and deliver the gas to the Employer's customers, spending most of their working time on the road. The mechanics work at the Cherokee facility, maintaining and repairing the trucks. There are approximately 26 drivers, 2 mechanics, and 4 operators.

The Regional Director found that the Employer's production department, employing the operators, and the distribution department, including the drivers and mechanics, were largely separate. The departments are separately housed and the employees have little contact across departmental lines, although drivers enter the production department briefly in connection with filling their trucks. The departments are separately supervised at both the immediate and facility levels. There has been no interchange, and seniority is separate. Pay is determined independently by department and paychecks are distributed separately. Each department buys uniforms on its own and furnishes them to its employees.

Drivers and operators receive the same training in operation of the filling equipment, but otherwise the skills and training of the three groups of employees are different. Operators must have experience with production equipment like the Employer's, drivers must have a class A chauffeur's license and meet Transportation Department requirements, and mechanics must have class A diesel mechanic certification. The three groups of employees also work different schedules and are paid by different methods. The drivers are paid by mileage and hourly but receive no overtime. The mechanics and operators are paid hourly with overtime; they work a 40-hour week except that 1 week a month operators work 48 hours. The two mechanics work different shifts and different days of the week. The operators work rotating shifts around the clock, and record their own time whereas the other employees use a timeclock.

The Regional Director concluded that "while . . . a separate unit of truckdrivers and mechanics may be appropriate, where, as here, no other union is claiming to represent the truckdrivers . . . they may be included in a production unit where the petitioning union so desires . . . . Further, in view of the close relationship between the truckdrivers and the mechanics and the fact that to exclude the mechanics would result in a residual unit of two unrepresented employees, I find that the mechanics should be included in the overall unit."

We agree with the Regional Director that the Petitioner's requested unit is an appropriate one, but not for the reasons he stated. His decision implies that a petitioner's desires alone will determine the placement of truckdrivers in or separate from a production and maintenance unit. We agree with the Employer that that is not the correct standard; there are no per se rules to include or exclude any classification of employees in any unit. Rather, we examine the community of interest of the particular employees involved, considering their skills, duties, and working conditions, the Employer's organization and supervision, and bargaining history, if any, but no one factor has controlling weight. See E. H. Koester Bakery Co., 136 NLRB 1006, 1009–11 (1962); Kalamazoo Paper Box Corp., 136 NLRB 134, 136–138 (1962) (severance petition).[1]

[1] We disavow the statement in Keystone Pretzel Bakery, 242 NLRB 492, 505–506 (1979), enfd. 696 F.2d 257 (3d Cir. 1982), that the placement of truckdrivers in a production and maintenance unit "depend[s] largely upon the wishes of the petitioning union." We find that the correct standard was applied in Marks Oxygen Co., 147 NLRB 228 (1964).

We will continue to consider a petitioner's desires relevant, for the reasons we stated in Marks Oxygen and elsewhere. Mc-Mor-Han Trucking, Continued

Nonetheless, Congress expressly contemplated the plantwide unit in Section 9(b), and we have held that "[a] plant-wide unit is presumptively appropriate under the Act, and a community of interest inherently exists among such employees." Kalamazoo Paper Box Corp., 136 NLRB at 136. The standard is the same but the burden is on the Employer to demonstrate that the interests of a given classification are so disparate from those of other employees that they cannot be represented in the same unit. E. H. Koester Bakery, 136 NLRB at 1011. Here the Petitioner's request includes all the Employer's employees whom Board policy allows to be included in a production and maintenance unit.

The presumption that this unit is appropriate has not been rebutted. We recognize that there are three separate groups of employees—drivers, mechanics, and operators—each of which has very little in common with either of the other two. While the drivers and mechanics are included in the same department by the Employer, they have little contact, and their skills, training, and working conditions are different. Similarly, both drivers and operators fill trucks and are trained by the Employer to do that, and the two groups have occasional brief contact in the process. While the employees in different classifications thus have little contact, it is just as true that no two employees in the same classification have much contact. That factor therefore cannot negate a community of interest sufficient to allow collective representation.

We also note that the employee complement of 32 is small, and that the three classifications are functionally integrated. The related functions of drivers and mechanics are one basis for their frequent inclusion in the same unit, and the Employer does not contest that inclusion.[2] As noted, though, the drivers here have as much in common with the operators as they do with the mechanics.

Indeed, the alternatives to a plantwide unit here are not favorable. The Board does not favor organization by department or classification, and it is doubtful that either the mechanics or operators are a craft. A combined unit of the two would be even less appropriate on community-of-interest grounds than either alone. Any of these units could thus be called residual, as the Regional Director noted, and the Board has normally preferred to avoid creating such units where possible.

For all these reasons we find the plantwide unit of drivers, mechanics, and operators appropriate. Because the Regional Director directed an election in this unit we will remand this proceeding to him with directions to open and count the ballots and to issue a certification.

DIRECTION

It is directed that the Regional Director for Region 10 shall, within 10 days from the date of this Decision on Review and Direction, open and count the ballots of the employees who voted in the election conducted 28 October 1983. The Regional Director shall prepare and serve on the parties a tally of ballots and, unless there are determinative challenges or timely objections filed, he shall issue the appropriate certification.

IT IS FURTHER DIRECTED that this proceeding is remanded to the Regional Director for further action pursuant to this Decision on Review and Direction.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.*, 380 U.S. 438, 441–442 (1965). That does not, however, obviate the need to show some community of interest on the facts of the specific case.

Chairman Dotson notes that where competing petitioners request different units, the relevancy of their desires will require a different analysis. Otherwise the Chairman finds it adds nothing to the analysis to say that no petitioner desires a different unit, as the Regional Director noted here.

DECISION ON REVIEW AND DIRECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

Upon a petition duly filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, a hearing was held on 28 March 1984 in the above-captioned proceeding. In a Decision and Direction of Election issued on 10 April 1984 the Acting Regional Director for Region 30 directed an election in a unit of all full-time and regular part-time mailroom employees, including drivers, employed at the Employer's Houghton, Michigan facility.[1] Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, the Employer filed a timely request for review of the Acting Regional Director's decision on the ground that the Acting Regional Director erred in concluding that the drivers are employees and not independent contractors within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act and therefore should be included in the unit. The Employer also filed a motion for stay of election pursuant to Section 102.65 of the Board's Rules.

By telegraphic order dated 10 May 1984 the Board granted the Employer's request for review but denied its motion to stay the election.[2] Thereafter, the Petitioner filed a brief on review.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case and makes the following findings.

The Employer is a Michigan corporation which publishes a daily newspaper called The Daily Mining Gazette (The Gazette) at its Houghton, Michigan facility. The petitioned-for unit consists of 10 motor route drivers whose status is at issue in this proceeding and 5 mailroom employees.[3]

The motor route drivers deliver the Employer's newspapers to predetermined locations in three ways: they drop off bundled newspapers for dealers and carriers, they place newspapers in coin-operated newsracks, and they insert newspapers in plastic tubes on stakes placed in front of the homes of individual subscribers. Some drivers have as many as three kinds of deliveries on their routes while others have only one.

Drivers also collect money from the newsracks, pick up damaged newsracks to return to the Employer's facility for repair, and place newsracks at locations designated by the Employer. The Employer assumes the responsibility for repairing the newsracks, but drivers will sometimes make minor repairs in the field themselves.

The Employer determines the initial composition of a route. When a route becomes available, the Employer attracts applicants for the position of driver by advertising in the newspaper. There is no written agreement governing the relationship between drivers and the Employer. The Employer informs applicants for the position of driver that drivers are independent contractors and not employees of The Gazette.

Drivers must provide their own delivery vehicles. License fees, taxes, and insurance premiums for the vehicles are paid by the drivers. Drivers also pay for the gasoline used in delivering the newspapers.

Drivers are paid a flat rate set by the Employer for each run of deliveries actually completed. In computing the "base rate" for a run, the Employer considers factors such as the mileage of the run, the length of time it consumes, and the number of tube deliveries and bundle drops it entails. Occasionally, a new driver may negotiate a rate higher than that offered by the Employer if no applicant is available and willing to accept the Employer's rate.[4]

Most drivers are required to pick up the newspapers each day at the Employer's loading dock. These drivers are assigned pickup times falling between 1 and 2:45 p.m. according to the length of their routes. Drivers who pick up newspapers in the field are not assigned pickup times but are expected to get the papers out as quickly as they can. The Employer has established a target completion time for the routes of between 5 and 5:30 p.m.

The Employer reserves the right to unilaterally change the composition of the routes. When the Employer alters a route, it recalculates the base

[1] Excluded from the unit found appropriate were substitutes, helpers, inserters, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

[2] The election was conducted on 10 May 1984, the drivers cast challenged ballots, and all ballots were impounded pending the Board's Decision on Review.

[3] The parties stipulated at the hearing that the five individuals sought in addition to the drivers, Howard Heckel, Steven Koski, Keith Abramson, Cvetko Shopp, and Sharmein Joyal, are mailroom employees and should be included in the unit found appropriate.

[4] The drivers are paid by check in the middle of the month and at the end of the month. Employees on the Employer's payroll are paid every 2 weeks, whenever that date occurs.

rate for the route by the same method used to set the rate initially. If an alteration to a route results in a change in its base rate, the Employer adjusts the driver's compensation accordingly.[5]

Before the Employer starts paying a newly hired driver, the driver delivers the newspapers for a day or two accompanied by one of the Employer's district managers to ensure that the driver has learned the route. Thereafter, the driver runs the route without supervision by the Employer. The Employer does not monitor the drivers on their daily runs nor require them to keep records of their performance.[6] Drivers may vary the order in which they make their deliveries as long as they complete their runs on time.

The drivers are free to hire substitutes and helpers without the Employer's approval. A driver who cannot make a run for any reason is required to locate a substitute. The drivers may and do make whatever employment arrangements they wish with substitutes and helpers without interference from the Employer. The Employer requests that drivers inform it of the identity of substitutes, but in practice they often do not do so. A driver who hires a full-time substitute is still paid and held responsible for the route by the Employer.

The Employer does not require that the drivers operate a particular kind of vehicle, submit the vehicle to inspection, or maintain a certain level of insurance. Drivers are not subject to work rules or a dress code and are not expected to attend company meetings.[7] Apart from noting on an "in and out" sheet how many unsold papers are returned by the dealers, drivers do not keep records for the Employer. Occasionally, drivers are asked to deliver free newspapers to nonsubscribers and prizes won in catalogue contests to carriers on their routes. The drivers receive no extra compensation for these deliveries.

Customer complaints about drivers are received by the Employer. The Employer writes a notice to the driver describing the complaint and asking the driver to rectify it. It is the driver's responsibility to remedy complaints. The Employer will follow up on a complaint to make sure that it has been resolved.

The Employer's circulation manager will warn a driver who is late picking up or delivering papers, but the Employer can take no disciplinary action against an unsatisfactory driver short of replacing the driver. The Employer cannot dock a driver's pay and has never suspended a driver. The Employer has fired one driver whose heavy drinking prevented him from making his run and another who made repeated mistakes and finally threw promotional material he was asked to deliver to prospective customers in the trash.

The Employer has placed no restrictions on the drivers' ability to hold other jobs or make deliveries in addition to the Employer's newspapers. One driver delivered laundry on his route without objection from the Employer.

About one-half of the drivers are eligible to participate in a bonus plan which provides compensation in addition to the base rate per run. A driver under the bonus plan receives 34 cents per week for every tube customer on his or her route in excess of a base number set by the Employer. Eligible drivers increase their compensation on their own initiative by soliciting new individual subscribers. Should a change in a route subject to the bonus plan result in a reduction in the number of tube customers, the Employer will decrease the base number accordingly to preserve the driver's bonus.[8]

The Employer does not withhold money for taxes or social security from the drivers' bimonthly checks nor does it make unemployment or workmen's compensation payments for them. The drivers do not receive vacation or sick time, paid holidays, or the Christmas bonus given by the Employer. They do not participate in the Employer's pension or life insurance plans.

The Employer contends that a unit including drivers is inappropriate because the drivers are independent contractors. Section 2(3) of the National Labor Relations Act specifically excludes independent contractors from coverage by the Act. Whether a person is a protected employee or an independent contractor within the meaning of Section 2(3) is properly resolved by applying general principles of the common law of agency. NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S. 254 (1968). The Board relies primarily on the common law "right to control" test in determining the status of individuals alleged to be independent contractors. See, e.g., Fort Wayne Newspapers, 263 NLRB 854 (1982). This test provides that where the one for whom a service is performed retains the right to control the manner and means by which the de-

[5] The Employer's circulation manager testified that when he has subtracted from a route he has not penalized the driver.

[6] The Employer does try to make a practice of sending a district manager with each driver once a year to confirm where the drivers are going and determine if their rates should be adjusted.

[7] Two drivers on their own initiative placed insignia of The Gazette on their vehicles, but drivers are not required to display the Employer's logo.

[8] It is unclear from the record whether the drivers must pay for lost, stolen, or damaged papers. A driver testified that when he was hired he was told he had to pay for the newspapers if they got "damaged, burnt or otherwise." The Employer's circulation manager testified, on the other hand, that he would not require drivers to pay for damaged papers.

sired result is accomplished, the person performing the service is an employee, but if control is reserved only over the end result, the person performing the service is an independent contractor. The Board's determination of the nature of the control retained turns on the particular facts of each case. A.S. Abell Publishing Co., 270 NLRB 1200 (1984).

We have carefully examined all the evidence bearing on the relationship between the drivers and the Employer and conclude that the drivers are independent contractors and not employees within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act.

We find most significant that the Employer exercises no control over the manner and means by which the desired result, daily delivery of the newspapers, is accomplished. See Air Transit, Inc., 271 NLRB 1108 (1984). Drivers are free to run their routes in whatever order they wish as long as the newspapers are delivered by late afternoon each day. The Employer does not supervise or monitor the drivers in the performance of their deliveries. Drivers are not subject to work rules or a dress code and are not required to drive a particular kind of vehicle or display the Employer's insignia. Moroever, there is no requirement that the deliveries be made by the same driver to whom the Employer originally agrees to assign a vacant route. Drivers can and do hire full-time substitutes. The Employer does not retain the right to approve the substitutes, does not dictate the terms of their employment, and frequently does not know who they are. The Employer receives customer complaints but does not discipline drivers for poor job performance. The Employer has replaced two drivers who proved unable to accomplish their deliveries, but this has little bearing on whether the Employer controls the manner and means by which deliveries are to be performed.

In addition, there are other aspects of the drivers' relationship with the Employer that are recognized at common law as indicia of independent contractor status. See Restatement 2d, Agency § 220 (1957). Drivers are hired with the understanding that they will be independent contractors and not employees. They are not offered the fringe benefits enjoyed by the Employer's employees, no provision is made for deductions from their bimonthly checks, and no payments are made on their behalf for unemployment or workmen's compensation insurance. On the other hand, drivers are permitted to hold other jobs and make deliveries for clients other than the Employer while on their newspaper routes.

Drivers supply the vehicles and gasoline needed to perform the deliveries. Moreover, drivers are responsible for their routes even if unable to deliver the newspapers themselves and must find their own substitutes. Accordingly, they do not receive leave time of any kind. The Employer continues to pay a driver even if the driver has hired a substitute who is actually running the route.

Drivers are not paid a salary or an hourly wage. Rather, they are paid a lump sum for each run completed. Some drivers can receive additional compensation in the form of the bonus offered for new subscribers they can solicit on their own initiative. The drivers' bimonthly checks represent the total of payments due for completed runs plus any applicable bonus.

We are mindful that there are factors absent in this case that, if present, would more strongly compel a finding that the drivers are independent contractors. The drivers do not have a proprietary interest in their routes: drivers do not buy and sell the routes and the Employer reserves the right to add to or subtract from them. Drivers do not purchase the newspapers from the Employer and assume the entrepreneurial risk associated with trying to make a profit by reselling them. We also recognize that the Employer's virtually unilateral control over the drivers' compensation and its ability to terminate drivers at will are more commonly found in employer/employee relationships. We find, however, that this evidence suggesting employees status is outweighed by the factors supporting the conclusion that the drivers are independent contractors discussed above.

As we have concluded that the drivers are independent contractors, we shall exclude them from the unit. Accordingly, we find that the following constitutes a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(c) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time mailroom employees employed at the Employer's Houghton, Michigan facility, excluding drivers, substitutes, helpers, inserters, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

We shall therefore remand this case to the Acting Regional Director for Region 30 for the purpose of opening and counting the impounded ballots in the unit found appropriate.

DIRECTION

It is hereby directed that the Acting Regional Director for Region 30 shall, within 10 days of this Decision on Review and Direction, open and count the impounded ballots in the above-described unit, prepare and serve on the parties a tally of ballots, and proceed thereafter as is appropriate in accordance with this decision.

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting in part.

I agree with my collegues' conclusion, contrary to the Acting Regional Director, that the Employer's newspaper delivery drivers are independent contractors and as such must be excluded from the bargaining unit sought to be represented by the Petitioner. However, I disagree with my colleagues' direction to the Acting Regional Director to open and count those impounded ballots from the 28 March 1984 election which form the unit found appropriate herein. In my view, the proper course of action is to direct the Acting Regional Director to conduct a second election.

The Acting Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election informed employees that the election would be held in a unit of "[a]ll full-time and part-time mailroom employees, including drivers, employed at the Employer's Houghton, Michigan facility."[1] Under the Acting Regional Director's decision, the unit consisted of the 10 drivers at issue herein plus the 5 mailroom employees who were stipulated to be in the unit. Excluding the 10 drivers, as the Board's decision does today, therefore has the result of diminishing the unit to only one-third its original size.

As the Second Circuit suggested in a recent case involving similar facts, Hamilton Test Systems v. NLRB,[2] employees may vote differently depending on what they know about the size or scope of the unit. Of the several reasons posited by the court as to why the employees in that case might have voted differently had they known the "true nature" of the unit (which the court found to be considerably smaller than that found by the Board), two reasons stand out as being also possible here: the five mailroom employees might have believed that a smaller bargaining unit would provide insufficient bargaining power, or they might have believed that a small unit could produce divisiveness and tension in the workplace.[3] Thus, by changing the boundaries of the appropriate bargaining unit after the election, my colleagues in the majority have effectively denied the employees in the appropriate unit the right to make an informed choice in the selection or rejection of a bargaining representative. In my view, at this stage in the proceedings only the holding of a second election can rectify the now misleading choice of the first election.

[1] Exclusions from the unit are listed at fn. 1 of the majority's decision.

14 December 1984

DECISION AND DIRECTION OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

Upon a petition filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Thomas W. Cestare on 5, 6, and 7 January 1983. On 8 March 1983 the Regional Director for Region 20, pursuant to Section 102.67(h) of the Board's Rules and Regulations and Statements of Procedure, transferred this proceeding to the Board for decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the hearing officer's rulings made at the hearing and finds that they are free from prejudicial error. They are hereby affirmed.

The Board has considered the entire record[1] in this case, including the posthearing briefs[2] of the Employer and the Petitioner.

The primary issues in this case involve the Board's statutory jurisdiction and its exercise of discretionary jurisdiction over an employer doing business in the Northern Mariana Islands. For the reasons set forth below, we find that the Board has such statutory jurisdiction and that it effectuates the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction over this Employer.

The Employer, a Northern Mariana Islands corporation with its principal office at Gualo Rai, Saipan, is engaged in providing interisland telephone services and worldwide telecommunications and telex services. The parties stipulated at the hearing that in the preceding 12 months the Employer had gross revenues in excess of $1 million and received revenues in excess of $50,000 directly from the United States, the territory of Guam, and foreign countries.

The grouping of about 15–19 islands in the South Pacific known as the Northern Mariana Islands was, together with several other island groupings,[3] entrusted by the United Nations to the United States to administer after World War II. The overall trust, informally known as Micronesia, has been known as the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (TTPI). Pursuant to a trusteeship agreement approved by the United Nations Security Council and the United States Government,[4] the United States exercises powers of administration, legislation, and jurisdiction over the TTPI.[5] The United States is also obligated thereunder to "[f]oster the development of such political institutions as are suited to the trust territory" and "promote the development of the inhabitants of the trust territory toward self-government or independence, as may be appropriate to the particular circumstances of the trust territory and its people and the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned" giving "due recognition to the customs of the inhabitants in providing a system of law for the territory."[6] The trusteeship remains in effect. The trusteeship agreement may only be terminated upon motion of the United States and approval of the United Nations Security Council. The United States has apparently taken the position that it will not seek termination of the trusteeship until the status of all island groupings is resolved.[7] To date, the status of at least one island grouping remains unresolved.[8]

Nonetheless, in 1972 the United States began separate negotiations on future political status with representatives of the Northern Mariana Islands. Those negotiations culminated in 1975 in the signing of a covenant to grant commonwealth status to the Northern Mariana Islands. The Covenant was subsequently endorsed by the legislature of the Northern Mariana Island, approved by a vote of

[1] The Employer has requested oral argument. That request is denied as the record and the briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] The Employer's motion to strike appendices A through D of the Petitioner's brief is denied. Appendices A through C were apparently attached as a convenience to the reader of the record since they are the texts of a Federal Statute, Presidential proclamation, and portions of a congressional hearing, all of which constitute appropriate cites in the brief. Appendix D is a summary of most of the Petitioner exhibits received at the hearing and the transcript pages on which they were assertedly received; there is nothing in the appendix not ascertainable from a reading of the transcript.

[3] Those groupings include the Federated States of Micronesia (Kosrae, Yap, Ponape, and Truk districts), the Marshall Islands, and Palau.

[5] Art. 3 of the agreement states that the United States may apply to the trust territories, subject to any modifications it may consider desirable, "such laws of the United States as it may deem apropriate to local conditions and requirements."

Art. 9 of the Agreement states that the United States "shall be entitled to constitute the trust territory into a customs, fiscal, or administrative union or federation with other territories under United States jurisdiction and to establish common services between such territories and the trust territory where such measures are not inconsistent with the basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System and with the terms of this agreement."

the inhabitants of the Northern Mariana Islands, and enacted into law by the U.S. Congress.[9]

Although the trusteeship continues, most of the Covenant's provisions are currently in effect,[10] including those pertinent here. Thus, while the Northern Mariana Islands will become a self-governing commonwealth known as the "Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands" in political union with and under the sovereignty of the United States only on termination of the Trusteeship Agreement,[11] the United States may currently "enact legislation in accordance with its constitutional processes which will be applicable to the Northern Mariana Islands, but if such legislation cannot also be made applicable to the several States the Northern Mariana Islands must be specifically named therein for it to become effective in the Northern Mariana Islands."[12]

In article V of the Covenant, there is a formula for determining the applicability of Federal laws in the Northern Mariana Islands. At section 502, it is stated:

> (a) The following laws of the United States in existence on the effective date of this Section[13] and subsequent amendments to such laws will apply to the Northern Mariana Islands, except as otherwise provided in this Covenant.

Thereafter, in paragraph (1), there are specific laws made applicable, including one particular section of the Social Security Act. Then, paragraph (2) makes applicable those laws not described in paragraph (1) which are applicable to Guam and which are of general application to the several States. Finally, paragraph (3) generally makes applicable those laws not described in paragraphs (1) or (2) which are currently applicable to the TTPI.

At section 503, the Covenant specifies certain laws not presently applicable to the TTPI which will not apply to the Northern Mariana Islands except in the manner and to the extent made applicable by Congress after termination of the Trusteeship Agreement. Among exclusions are the minimum wage provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act as it pertains to private employers and employees.[14] The National Labor Relations Act is not made inapplicable under this provision.

At section 504, the Covenant provides for Presidential appointment of a commission on Federal laws. The commission will survey United States laws and make recommendations to the United States Congress about which laws now applicable to the Northern Mariana Islands should be made inapplicable, which laws now inapplicable should be made applicable, and the extent and manner of applicability or inapplicability. The commission's final report and recommendations are due within 1 year after the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement.

United States judicial authority within the Northern Mariana Islands is set forth in article IV of the Covenant which became effective 9 January 1978. That article provides for the establishment of a "District Court for the Northern Mariana Islands," which has the same jurisdiction as a district court in the United States.[15] The article also provides that the Northern Mariana Islands will constitute a part of the same judicial district as does Guam, currently the Ninth Circuit.

We note particularly, with regard to the applicability of Federal laws within the Northern Mariana Islands, that the legislative history of the Covenant's enactment indicates that while the formula of Federal law applicability "does not make the Northern Mariana Islands into a territory or possession of the United States prior to termination of the Trusteeship Agreement[, i]n many instances, however, the Northern Mariana Islands will be treated as if it were a territory or possession of the United States prior to termination, for many laws applicable to Guam because it is a territory or pos-

[10] Certain Covenant provisions became effective on approval of the Covenant by the United States, by the legislature of the Northern Mariana Islands and the inhabitants of the Northern Mariana Islands. Certain other provisions became effective on 9 January 1978 upon proclamation by the President of the United States. Covenant, art. [12] Covenant, art. I, sec. 105.

[13] The effective date of this section was 9 January 1978.

[14] The legislative history of the Covenant's enactment clearly indicates that while the minimum wage provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act were made inapplicable, that Act's other provisions, including those dealing with such matters as overtime pay and maximum hours, are applicable under the formula for applicability of Federal laws. session will become applicable to the Northern Mariana Islands."[16]

The Employer argues that the Board is precluded from exercising statutory jurisdiction because of the current political status of the Northern Mariana Islands—a unique status as part of a trust territory under United States administration but not a "territory" under the sovereignty of the United States.

We recognize the "unique political relationship between the Northern Mariana Islands and the United States."[17] Nonetheless, we must be guided by whether Congress[18] clearly expressed its affirmative intention of applying the National Labor Relations Act to the Northern Mariana Islands.[19] In our view, the formula for applicability of Federal laws contained in the Covenant and enacted by Congress is a clear expression of Congress' affirmative intention to apply the National Labor Relations Act, among other Federal statutes, to the Northern Mariana Islands.[20] This view is supported by the fact that the Covenant specifically excluded from applicability certain Federal laws, or portions thereof including certain provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, but did not specifically exclude from applicability the National Labor Relations Act or any portion thereof. Further support is found in the legislative history's indications of a literal reading of the Covenant's applicability formula. Accordingly, we find that the Board has statutory jurisdiction over employers located in the Northern Mariana Islands who satisfy our jurisdictional standards, as do the operations of the Employer involved here.

Further, considering congressional enactment of the Covenant, as well as a variety of other factors, we are unable to discern a basis for using our discretionary power and declining to exercise our statutory jurisdiction to the fullest extent.

We note the following factual characteristics about the Northern Mariana Islands. Their total population is approximately 17,000 with 87 percent residing on the largest island, Saipan, and almost all of the remaining inhabitants residing on the next largest islands, Tinian and Rota. Saipan is the governmental and commercial center of the islands. There is not a substantial United States military presence in the Northern Mariana Islands at this time. According to data submitted by the Petitioner, the government sector of the economy accounts for more than 40 percent of all employment. The largest portions of the private sector appear to be service industries (including tourism, property rental, and auto repair), retail merchandising, and construction and construction supply. Agriculture remains the primary land use on Rota. Geographically, culturally, and ethnically, the Northern Mariana Islands are closely related to Guam,[21] over which the Board has specifically asserted jurisdiction.[22] Guam, which is 3792 miles from Honolulu, is the southernmost and largest island of the archipelago known as the Mariana Islands; it is approximately 45 miles from Rota, 135 miles from Tinian, and 150 miles from Saipan, which is about 3927 miles from Honolulu. There is regular air service from Honolulu to Saipan and from Guam to Saipan and Tinian and some air service at least to Rota from Saipan. There is scheduled shipping between the West Coast and Saipan and scheduled barge service from Guam to Saipan with calls at Tinian and Rota as required. The dominant ethnic group in the Northern Mariana Islands—the Chamorros—is of the same origin as the people of Guam. While about two-thirds of the Northern Mariana Islanders speak Chamorro, English is the primary language and is used in the courts and taught in the schools.

Considerations which have persuaded the Board to decline to assert jurisdiction over businesses in the Panama Canal Zone, Wake Island, and Diego Garcia do not exist here. Thus, in Contract Services, 202 NLRB 862 (1973), the Board declined to assert its statutory jurisdiction in the Panama Canal Zone because there were at the time ongoing negotiations about the scope and effect of United States presence there. Here, in contrast, negotiations about the status of the Northern Mariana Islands have concluded and resulted in an approved convenant setting forth the terms of the relationship between the Northern Mariana Islands and the United States. In Facilities Management Corp., 202 NLRB 1144 (1973), the Board declined to assert ju-

[20] In reaching this conclusion, we have not discounted the possibility that Congress may, at some future time, determine that the Act, or any portion of the Act, is inapplicable to the Northern Mariana Islands either at the recommendation of the Covenant-established commission on Federal Laws or based on its own judgment. We do not, however, believe that the creation of the commission negates the affirmative intention of the applicability formula; nor do we believe that it is productive to speculate about possible congressional action in light of Congress' existing intention.

risdiction over an employer engaged in maintenance and repair services for the Air Force on Wake Island, a 2-1/2-square-mile island in the Central Pacific on which there is only an Air Force base, there are no permanent residents, and to which there is no access without Air Force permission and no scheduled air or water carrier service. In finding that it would not effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction, the Board emphasized the absence of local permanent residents, the remoteness of the island, the difficulty of access, and the absence of anything other than a military installation. Here, while the Northern Mariana Islands are at least as distant as Wake Island, they are proximate to Guam and are not difficult of access either because of transportation or entry limitations. Nor is a local permanent population or private industry lacking here. Finally, in Offshore Express, Inc., 267 NLRB 378 (1983), the Board declined to assert jurisdiction over a naval contractor who was providing crew boat service and operating two Navy-owned vehicles in the lagoon at Diego Garcia. Among the factors stressed by the Board were once again the difficult access, restricted to military transportation and generally military personnel, the Employer's limited operation, and the fact that the island is under foreign sovereignty. Here, the Employer's operation is not similarly circumscribed and, while the Northern Mariana Islands are still under the trusteeship, the relationship to the United States has been formalized and the islands are not under foreign sovereignty. Accordingly, we shall assert jurisdiction over the Employer here.

Having asserted jurisdiction over the Employer, we now proceed to the issues of unit inclusion and exclusion. The parties have agreed that all full-time and regular part-time employees on the island of Saipan, excluding supervisors,[23] managerial employees, professional employees, confidential employees and guards and watch-persons as defined in the Act, are to be appropriately included in the unit found. The Petitioner also seeks to include full-time and regular part-time employees on the islands of Rota and Tinian while the Employer maintains that they should be excluded as managerial employees or because they do not share a community of interest with other employees. The Employer also maintains that the service order administrator should be excluded as a managerial employee, that the personnel administrator should be excluded as a managerial or confidential employee, and that the transmission supervisor, chief operator/communication center, account supervisor, billing administrator, and traffic settlement administrator should be excluded as supervisors. Finally, the Employer alternatively contends that the billing administrator should be excluded as a managerial employee.

The Employer employs one person each on the islands of Rota and Tinian, referred to as MTC representatives. Their duties involve service and clerical work—accepting applications for service and issuing and collecting bills—as well as installation of telephones and cables and routine maintenance on telephones, central office equipment, and cables. The MTC representative on Rota has on occasion attended meetings on Rota of the Port Authority in place of the Employer's general manager; his attendance at those meetings serves a public relations function. In terms of administrative duties, they may recommend to the billing administrator on Saipan, in accordance with established practice, that customers' service be discontinued and they may negotiate billing schedules which must be cleared through the Saipan main office. The MTC representative on Rota has recommended cable extension locations based on feedback from customers and knowledge of the area, but he does not engage in long-range planning. They do not directly supervise any employees; when crews come from Saipan to do major cable installation, the crews are accompanied by a stipulated supervisor or are sufficiently trained to do the work independently. The MTC representatives have nothing to do with the formulation or determination of management policies that directly affect employment relations, such as pay rates, fringe benefits, and other conditions of employment.

Based on the above and the record as a whole, we find that the MTC representatives are not managerial employees as they are not involved in the formulation, determination, and effectuation of management policies by expressing and making operative decisions of the Employer nor do they have discretion independent of the Employer's established policies.[24] We also find that they share sufficient community of interest with other unit employees[25] to warrant their inclusion in the unit. Their work duties involve a combination of the duties of different classifications of unit employees.

[23] The parties stipulated that the following individuals are excluded from the unit as supervisors: Edward Takahashi, general manager; Duke Silva, service manager; Diane Guerrero Villagomes, department head secretary; Vicenta Teregeyo, chief overseas operator; P. Pangelinan, inside plant supervisor; and Mariano Falig, outside plant supervisor. The parties also stipulated that Andy Tudela, plant accounting administrator, was to be permitted to vote subject to challenge.

[24] See Simplex Industries, 243 NLRB 111 (1979); Textron, Inc., 219 NLRB 384 (1975).

[25] Among those included in the unit are employees who install, maintain, and repair cables, telephones, and other equipment; operators; and office clerical employees.

They are paid at the same level as combination technicians, a classification of employees included in the unit, and receive the same general fringe benefits as unit employees on Saipan. It appears that additional benefits they receive are a function of their being the only Employer employees on the respective islands; thus, they live rent free in facilities leased by the Employer which also serve as offices and equipment storage areas and they have full-time use of pickup trucks because they are on call at all times whereas combination technicians on Saipan have use of trucks only when they are working or on call. Their regular work hours are similar to those of other unit employees except for their full-time on-call status, they are required to fill out timesheets. They may work overtime without prior permission in an emergency situation but they are otherwise expected to obtain authorization. They are directly supervised by the service manager who is in charge of all inside plant, outside plant, transmission, and service operations. The MTC representatives submit weekly reports on their activities and meet monthly on Saipan with the service manager, the inside and outside plant supervisors, and the transmission supervisor. Inasmuch as the MTC representatives have similar job functions and other terms and conditions of employment with unit employees and inasmuch as they are part of the Employer's overall provision of communication service on the three islands, we shall include them within the unit found here.

The service order administrator has the primary responsibility of maintaining all customer records. She also receives applications for service, prepares service orders, coordinates the installation of service, disseminates information for billing, and updates the telephone directory. She decides whether to refer requests for expedited service to the general manager, who will himself then make a determination. She has made suggestions concerning processing of service orders and information to be provided to customers, which suggestions were adopted after discussion with the general manager. She does not establish or have input into Employer policies concerning employees' wages, hours, or terms and conditions of employment. She does not exercise any discretion regarding the formulation, termination, or effectuation of employment policies. She is supervised directly by the general manager. She works the same hours as other employees at the headquarters' office. She is paid according to the administration wage schedule which also applies to some stipulated supervisors. While that wage schedule does provide for higher wages at the higher step levels than the wage schedule applied to most of the unit employees at the low and midrange step levels, the wage rates are commensurate with those paid to some unit employees. We find that her duties and administrative responsibilities do not meet the standards for managerial status; it does not appear that the service order administrator formulates policies or uses her discretion independent of established company policies. See L & S Enterprises, 245 NLRB 1123, 1126 (1979). We therefore find that she is appropriately included in the unit.

The personnel administrator has the following duties: receiving employment applications, insuring they are complete, recording her impression of applicants' appearance, and checking references; explaining new policies to employees; conducting exit interviews with employees; recording and monitoring vacation and sick pay entitlement; advising supervisors of the time for employee appraisals; completing paperwork on personnel changes; keeping documents on immigrant laborers; preparing notices of job vacancies; and generally maintaining employee personnel files. The personnel administrator neither formulates nor determines employment policies; she was described by the general manager as the "administrator" insofar as she may describe existing policies to employees or supervisors. On one occasion, she suggested to the general manager that the preexisting policy concerning bereavement leave be followed; her suggestion was adopted. She supervises no employees; she cannot hire, fire, discipline, or evaluate nor can she recommend those actions or work assignments, transfers, or promotions. Her involvement in the actual hiring of employees appears limited to screening applications for those that match the qualifications of a vacancy and, on occasion, calling the general manager's attention to an application that reflects outstanding credentials or skills. She is not involved in handling employee complaints through any formalized grievance procedure.

The general manager's letters and documents are typed by the department head secretary, a stipulated supervisor. The personnel administrator does her own typing.

The personnel administrator has her own office, is paid according to the same wage schedule as the service order administrator, and receives the same fringe benefits as all the unit employees.

We find based on the above and the record as a whole that the personnel administrator is neither a managerial nor a confidential employee. See, e.g., Washington Post Co., 254 NLRB 168, 191-192 (1981). With regard to managerial status, her duties admittedly do not involve the formulation or determination of management policies; and we do not view the one adopted suggestion she made concerning bereavement policy to be a compelling manifestation of managerial status. Further, the evidence does not demonstrate that she has substantial discretion to act independently of established policies; rather, it appears that she serves primarily routine clerical, informational, and secretarial functions.

With regard to confidential status, we note that the Employer's focus in asserting this position is upon the personnel administrator's access to employee files and payroll rate information. However, the fact that the personnel administrator has access to personnel files and is aware of pay rates and personnel changes has not been held to be sufficient to confer confidential employee status.[26] We shall therefore include the personnel administrator in the unit found appropriate here.[27]

The transmission supervisor is responsible for the installation and maintenance of all record services on Saipan, i.e., teletype services, telex services, and special circuits. He reports directly to the service manager and appears from the Respondent's table of organization to be at the same administrative level as the inside and outside plant supervisors, both of whom are stipulated supervisors. He meets on a daily basis together with the service manager and the inside and outside plant supervisors to discuss work to be done. In 1981, he was responsible for the work of three equipment technicians. Since about March 1982, he has worked with only one equipment technician who is his coequal in skill level, although at the time of the hearing the Employer anticipated filling an equipment technician vacancy. The transmission supervisor has interviewed applicants and has effectively recommended the hire of two employees. He has authority to issue verbal and written warnings to employees with whom he works although he has not done so. He has also never promoted, suspended, or discharged an employee. He has performed annual written appraisals of the employees with whom he has worked. He also is responsible for granting overtime to employees with whom he has worked and for reviewing their timecards. His wage rate is at least 20 cents per hour higher than that of his subordinate. While the evidence about the transmission supervisor is sparse, we are persuaded that his effective recommendations of hire together with his appraising functions and authority to issue warnings are such indicia of supervisory status as to warrant his exclusion from the unit on that basis.

The chief operator communications center oversees the operations of the communications center and the work of the five telex operators who receive messages from throughout the trust territories to retransmit to points throughout the world, log long-distance calls, and receive at a counter customer payments for telephone services. She does not regularly work as an operator herself; she generally fills in during absences or emergencies. She has a separate office and spends a substantial amount of her time reviewing documents concerning long-distance calls and financial payments and monitoring the operators at work; she prepares a weekly report of all transactions occurring at the communications center including the amount of money received and the number of messages transmitted.

The chief operator communications center reports directly to the general manager. She has not been called upon to interview employees and has recommended neither hire nor discharge of employees, although the general manager asserts that she has the authority to do so. She sets the five operators' schedules, reviews and initials their timesheets, determines when the operators work overtime, and has authority to permit employees to leave work early. She prepares written appraisals of the operators which are used to determine whether they receive raises and the amounts of wage increases. She has authority to recommend promotions but has not done so; she has chosen that two employees be transferred after the general manager made a decision to effect a transfer. She has authority to issue verbal and written warnings to employees and she has given at least one employee an oral reprimand. In light of the above, and particularly what we find to be her responsible direction of the work of the operators, her authority to discipline employees, and her authority to effectively recommend their wage increases and transfers, we find that she is a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

The account supervisor's primary function is to account for and report the Employer's financial data. She spends approximately 75 percent of her time engaged in that function. Her remaining time is spent directing the work of the accounting clerks and collection clerks and generally overseeing the work of the billings administrator, traffic settlement administrator, and plant accounting administrator.[28] She has interviewed and effectively recom-

[27] At the hearing, the Employer suggested that the personnel administrator may be a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. It did not argue this position in its brief. Nonetheless, it is clear that the personnel administrator possesses none of the indicia of supervisory status.

[28] Both the billings administrator and the traffic settlement administrator are contested positions and are discussed below. As stated above, the mended the hire of several employees. She has authority to recommend the discharge of employees but has not exercised that authority. She has the authority to discipline employees; she has issued both oral and written warnings. She performs appraisals for those employees whose work she directs as well as for those whose work she oversees, and she has effectively recommended at least one merit increase. She has authority to approve vacation requests and to approve absences. She has authority to grant overtime. She reviews employee timecards.

She is paid 25 cents per hour more than the next highest paid individual in the department. In view of the account supervisor's effective recommendation of hire, actual discipline of employees, and responsible direction of employees in the accounting department, we find her to be a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

The duties of the billing administrator include putting all new accounts into a customer master file, posting all payments made to those accounts, accepting credit card applications and issuing credit cards, and handling customers' billing questions. The billing administrator reports to the account supervisor. The billing administrator works with one other employee, an accounting clerk. She initially assigns work to the accounting clerk and directs the accounting clerk if there is a change in work priorities. She participated in the interview of the current accounting clerk and discussed her approval with the account supervisor who made the direct hiring recommendation to the general manager. She filled out an appraisal for the former employee in the accounting clerk position, which appraisals affect determination of employee raises; she is responsible for appraising the current employee in that position after a year of employment. She has authority to permit the accounting clerk to work overtime. She has authority to issue verbal and written warnings and recommend discharge although she has not exercised that authority.

She works in the accounting departments' open area with the accounting clerks. She is a senior employee and is paid at the maximum level of the administration wage schedule such that her wage is approximately $3 more per hour than that of the accounting clerk.

While the evidence presented with regard to the billing administrator is somewhat sketchy, and while she is asserted to supervise one employee in a rather small accounting department, we are persuaded that the evidence shows that she responsibly directs the work of the accounting clerk and has affected and may affect that employee's terms and conditions of employment. Accordingly, we shall exclude her from the unit as a supervisor.[29]

The traffic settlement administrator is responsible for the accounting of all toll calls and settlements between the various carriers, including long-distance telephone calls and telex and telegraph services. He oversees the work of two clerks, one of whom reviews all toll tickets for accuracy and time changes and enters the information into a computer and the other of whom performs the same duties with telex and telegraph information. He makes sure their work is correct and completed in a timely fashion. He has the authority to recommend hiring and discharges and to discipline employees but he has not exercised that authority. He did effectively recommend that one of the current clerks be transferred into the department based on his knowledge of her capabilities. He also effectively recommended that one of the clerks be replaced during a leave of absence. He authorizes overtime for the clerks, reviews their timecards, and schedules their vacations. He also performs appraisals on the two clerks. He has his own office next to that of the general manager.

Based on the above and the record as a whole, and like our decision with respect to the billing administrator, we are convinced that the traffic settlement administrator responsibly directs the work of the clerks who are responsible to him and has the authority to affect and has affected their terms and conditions of employment. Accordingly, we find him to be a supervisor within the meaning of the Act and excluded from the unit.

We therefore find that the following employees constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees of the Employer on the islands of Saipan, Rota and Tinian, but excluding managerial employees, professional employees, confidential employees, supervisors, guards and/or watch-persons as defined in the Act.

[Direction of Election omitted from publication.]

parties agreed that the plant accounting administrator would be permitted to vote subject to challenge; there is no record evidence concerning the status of the individual in that position.

[29] The Employer alternatively maintained that the billing administrator was a managerial employee because she recommended a policy for contacting customers before their service was disconnected for nonpayment and because she can routinely set up a customer payment plan if the amount owing is nominal. These facts do not support a finding of managerial employee status.

Heuer International Trucks, Inc. and General Teamsters Local Union No. 528, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America. Case 10–CA–19174

14 December 1984

ORDER DENYING THE GENERAL COUNSEL'S MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT, GRANTING THE RESPONDENT'S MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION, AND STAYING THE CERTIFICATION OF THE COLLECTIVE-BARGAINING REPRESENTATIVE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 21 April 1983[1] the Regional Director for Region 10 issued a complaint and notice of hearing in the above-entitled proceeding, alleging that the Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in certain unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act. Specifically the complaint alleges that the Respondent is engaged in the sales and servicing of trucks. On 8 March the Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of a service department unit that includes mechanics, mechanic trainees, service department utility man, and shop foreman/service writer at the Respondent's Kennesaw, Georgia facility.[2] Thereafter on 21 March the Union requested to bargain with the Respondent. However, on 8 April and at all times thereafter the Respondent has refused to bargain with the Union on the basis that the unit determination was inappropriate. Subsequently, the Respondent filed an answer to the complaint, admitting that it refused to bargain and again maintaining that the appropriate unit should include all parts department employees and service clerical employees.

Chairman Dotson notes that he did not participate in the underlying representation case. Member Hunter dissented in that proceeding because he would have granted the Employer's request for review of the Regional Director's unit determination.

Thereafter on 19 May the General Counsel filed with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment on grounds that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by its refusal to bargain. The General Counsel asserted that the Respondent's contentions offered no newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, and raised no issue not previously litigated.

On 26 May the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and Notice to Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. Thereafter on 28 May the Respondent filed an answer to the Notice to Show Cause and filed a further pleading entitled "Motion for Reconsideration."

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

We agree that the present case warrants our reconsideration and therefore deny the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment. Although our dissenting colleague would grant the motion on the basis that the Board previously rejected the Respondent's arguments and that our decision encourages relitigation in unit determinations, it is well settled that a motion for summary judgment should only be granted when issues of fact and law are not in dispute. Here it cannot be disputed that there exists a conflict in Board law regarding the appropriate service department unit. In International Harvester Co., 119 NLRB 1709 (1958), the Board held that "partsmen" though working with "craftmen" were excluded from the bargaining unit since they did not exercise craft skills. The Board also applied International Harvester Co. recently in Taylor Bros., 230 NLRB 861, 870 (1977). There the Board excluded partsmen from the mechanic unit. However, in Austin Ford, 136 NLRB 1398 (1962), cited by the Respondent, the Board found that the mechanics there were not a separate appropriate unit and stated that all service and parts department employees should be included in the same bargaining unit. Similarly, as noted by the Respondent, in Graneto-Datsun, 203 NLRB 550 (1973), the Board refused to separate mechanics from the rest of the service department employees and dismissed the 8(a)(5) allegation because there had been no demand for recognition in the appropriate unit. In Gregory Chevrolet, 258 NLRB 233

[1] All dates are in 1983 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] On 8 February the Respondent filed a request for review of the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election and contended that the unit should include all employees in the parts department and three clerks. It further contended that the unit was inappropriate because there was no community of interest between the mechanics and service utility man. On 25 February the Board denied this request for review, and stated that the election raised a substantial issue solely as to the unit placement of the service department's utility man. However, the Board concluded that this issue should be resolved through the challenge procedure, and amended the Decision and Direction of Election to permit them to vote under challenge. Thereafter on 4 March the Respondent filed a motion for reconsideration and reasserted its position that the clerks and parts employees should be included in the unit. On 25 March the Board denied this motion because it did not raise an issue not previously considered.

(1981), the Board included parts department employees with mechanics. Therefore, as clearly indicated by the inconsistency in the cited cases, it would be highly improper to grant the Motion for Summary Judgment when we have concluded that a clarification of existing Board law on this issue is required.[3]

The Respondent in its answer and motion for reconsideration renews its contention that the only appropriate unit consists of all parts and service department employees at its facility. After considering that argument in light of the Regional Director's decision in the underlying representation case, we conclude that a conflict in Board law exists as to what constitutes the appropriate unit for a motor vehicle service department. Accordingly, we have decided to reconsider the Board's previous determination of this unit at the Respondent's facility.

ORDER

It is ordered that the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment is denied, based on the existing conflict in Board law.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Respondent's motion for reconsideration is granted.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the certification of the collective-bargaining representative be stayed pending resolution of this issue. The parties herein may file briefs with the Board in Washington, D.C., on or before 28 December 1984.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.
